I BELIEVE there is a great deal of infidelity in the Sabbath school, as well as in our churches, as to the conversion of children, and that even many parents think their children cannot come to Jesus early in life. I fear many teachers go to the Sunday school and never think of urging upon their dear scholars the importance of immediately surrendering their hearts to Christ. I believe that if children are old enough to come to the Sabbath school, they are old enough to come to Calvary.

I was urging this a little while ago in Michigan, when an old missionary who was present endorsed all I said. His locks were grey, his pilgrimage was nearly ended. "Sixteen years ago," he said, "my wife died in this county, and I was left with several motherless children. The next Sunday, my little girl, seven years old, came to me and said: 'Shall I not take the children into the bedroom, as mother used to do?' I let her go, and she took her little brother and her sister, three-and-a-half years old, by the hand, and retired to the chamber to pray beside the bed where they had been accustomed to kneel. When she came back I noticed that she had been weeping, and I said: 'Nellie, what are you weeping about? What is the matter?' 'Oh, father,' she said, 'I could not help weeping. After I had prayed, just as mother taught us to do, little Susan began to pray.' 'Well,' I said, 'what did she say?' 'She closed her eyes, and lifted up her face to heaven and said: "Oh, God, how could you take my dear mother, and leave me no mother to pray for me? I want you to make me good for Jesus Christ's sake."' Said the old missionary: "God heard that prayer, and that little girl gave evidence of a change of heart before she was four years old."

There is a father on the banks of the Mississippi river, who would give all the wealth he possesses if he could call up his son from his last resting place, and make one prayer for him. Some time ago the boy lay dying. "Father," he said, "I wish you would pray for me. You have never prayed for me." The father cried, and said he could not pray. For seventeen years that son had been given to him, and yet he had never breathed his name in prayer. O prayerless fathers and mothers—you who never pray with and for your children! Do not suppose that the world is going to be converted that way. And teachers, parents, and children, do not be satisfied with talking in a general way to your scholars, but take them by the hand and lead them to the Saviour.

A friend of mine was urging this some time ago, upon a mixed audience of teachers, parents, and children, and he pressed upon the two former that they must not be satisfied with just telling the children about the Saviour, but must take them by the hand and lead them to Him. As he spoke, a little girl got down from her seat in the centre aisle, and stepping up to the speaker, the tears streaming down her cheeks, said, "Please, sir, will you lead me to Jesus?" How many children in the dark lanes and alleys of this great city are now reaching out their hands to you Christian people—Sunday-school teachers—and crying: "Lead me to Jesus!"

Amongst the children in a Sunday-school class in Illinois, was one girl, seven years of age, the daughter of a very ungodly man. The father was one of the worst in the country, a Sabbath breaker, a drunkard, a blasphemer. The little girl was converted, and on the next Sabbath she urged her father to go with her to the class. He went with her to the door, but he would not go in. He had never been in a place of worship or a school in his life. However, the superintendent came out and persuaded him to attend the class. This resulted in his conversion, and since then he has established 1,180 Sabbath schools, and gathered over 100,000 children into these schools. All this is the fruit of that teacher's leading the drunkard's little daughter to the Saviour, and then urging her to do something for Christ.

The Christian Temperance Campaign.

AT CHELMSFORD AND IPSWICH.

IT is, happily, a firm article of faith with very many of God's people that temperance work, for which there is such imperative and growing need, will bear large and lasting fruit only as it is prosecuted upon the high Christian level represented by the continuous, persevering and devoted labours of Dr. Henry. With this sound conviction strong upon them, the temperance supporters of Chelmsford arranged for a two days' mission at the Corn Exhange in that town, Messrs. J. Stacey Reeve and A. Hutchings being the energetic hon. secretaries of an enthusiastic and hopeful local committee of widely representative character.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE TRAFFIC.

A good beginning was made with an afternoon meeting on Monday week, under the presidency of Rev. H. A. Lake, rector of Chelmsford, who deplored the way in which drink hinders all Christian work, but rejoiced in the unifying effect of this Mission. In the name of all present he welcomed Dr. Henry and his helpers, the Jubilee Singers, feeling confident that the Divine blessing must attend such work as this, undertaken in the Master's name.

At the outset Dr. Henry laid stress upon the necessity for constant prayer, seeing that he had no confidence in this crusade nor in any other if it did not recognise God and his Church as the centre. Then Christians might help to answer their own prayers by bringing non-abstainers, and those who are in danger of falling through the allurements of strong drink within the sphere of Gospel temperance. He then passed on to observe that a mighty struggle will yet be waged in the realm of ideals between the respective forces of sobriety and drunkenness, of chastity and immorality, of insubordination and law, of right and wrong, of Christ and Belial. With all our boasted wisdom, gathered through the centuries, we have not learned to put first things first. Why should we not seek the overthrow of the infamous liquor traffic—by common consent the first and the worst foe of the individual, the family, the Church, and the State? This Christian Temperance Campaign aims to arouse the Christian conscience, to stimulate Christian effort, to unify Christian forces, and to bring the total impact of the Christian churches upon this black iniquity. Self-preservation is the first law of life; and we must fight the drink, or go down under its domination and curse.

A NEFARIOUS BUSINESS.

Good attendance in the evening was indicative of sustained interest on the part of the people in what the chairman, Mr. Herbert Marriage, rightly called the earnest and convincing eloquence of Dr. Henry, and in the quaint Gospel melodies of the Jubilee Singers, of which hearers never tire. Quoting the saying of the late Frances E. Willard that, in fifty years, men would no more think of taking strong drink than of exposing their bodies to deadly contagion, Dr. Henry said temperance people need not only to investigate the defences of an evil habit and traffic, but to derive encouragement and strength from a review of the growing forces that make for triumphant victory over a nefarious business.

Mr. Hy. S. Corder, the chairman for Tuesday afternoon, pointed out that the drink demon is dead only for those who sign the pledge. Dr. Henry found in Ezek. xix. 1-9 a strikingly suggestive Old Testament parable concerning a destructive and ruinous thing that has "learned to catch the prey, and to devour men."

For more than thirty years Rev. James Burgess, who presided at the closing meeting in the evening, had abjured alcohol; and he was glad to say the majority of the Free Church ministers abstain. Dr. Henry claimed that temperance is an essential part of the Gospel of the grace of God, and said he had no faith in the coming of a religious revival until God's people grapple with the problem of strong drink. Then followed multiplied and unanswerable arguments for total abstinence, derived from industrial and physical considerations.

EDUCATION, ORGANIZATION, CONCENTRATION.

Not only were some 164 new pledges taken in Ipswich during a three days' mission last week by Dr. J. Q. A. Henry and the Jubilee Singers, but temperance workers were greatly heartened, their total abstinence faith was strongly confirmed, and much enthusiasm was created for determined aggressive effort and continued faithful testimony against the drink curse. The visit of the missioners was due to the local branch of the British Women's Temperance Association.

The first meeting, held on Friday night at the Social Settlement Hall, was a crowded one. Speaking from the chair, Mr. Albert Ransom boldly avowed himself an "extremist" as far as the deadly drink is concerned. In the course of a stirring address, Dr. Henry contended that the time has come when the Christian Church must be held responsible for the success or failure of temperance reform. There is need to educate the people, to enforce existing law, to organize Christian effort in political and other directions, to concentrate the temperance forces irrespective of party and sect, and to promote total abstinence by example and voice.

Succeeding meetings were held in the Public Hall. There was a large gathering of children on Saturday afternoon—an inspiring and a hopeful sight. Rev. A. A. Dowsett prayed that the mission might bring enduring blessing, especially to the Churches. The chairman, Mr. Arthur Pain said they were anxious that the children should have every possible help towards sober and godly lives, as the future men and women of their town. The lively style of Dr. Henry, as he drew many a warning from public-house signs, greatly interested the young folk.

Mr. Bolton Smart, who for twenty years has done much to forward the temperance cause, presided on Saturday evening.

A wide range of encouraging facts concerning the things that make for progress in temperance reform, formed the basis of Dr. Henry's helpful discourse; and he showed that the electric light of twentieth century demonstration must be flashed upon the public house.

AN IMPRESSIVE FINISH.

Many women came to a service for their exclusive benefit on Sabbath afternoon. Mrs. W. T. Griffiths, who presided, said that so long as the public house remains open on the Lord's Day, there is certainly need for Gospel temperance addresses during the hours of "Divine service." From the suggestive story of Deborah's victory over Sisera, Dr. Henry set forth the value to man of woman's influence, inspiration, and co-operation in the fight against strong drink.

There was a full hall for the last service on Sabbath evening. In his opening remarks as chairman, Mr. W. T. Griffiths said our Lord might well say of this generation, "The drunkard ye have always with you." Cordial thanks were conveyed in an informal manner to Dr. Henry and his helpers, for their ministry in speech and song. Dr. Henry then amplified in solemn and impressive manner a saying he heard from the lips of a girl, "Drink is the Judas Iscariot of the present situation"; and, in addition to the frequent vocal contributions of the Jubilee Singers, their leader, Mr. F. J. Loudin, gave strong testimony from personal experience in favour of total abstinence.

FUTURE MEETINGS.

March 13, Bradford (Free Church Council); March 23-27, Alloa; April 1-3, Macclesfield; 4-6, Redhill; 8, 9, Helensburgh; June 14-23, Edinburgh Castle, Limehouse.

Rev. F. B. Meyer's Bible Classes.—The Bible classes for young men conducted by Rev. F. B. Meyer on Saturday afternoons at three, at the Aldersgate Y.M.C.A., have now been resumed. The present series will be continued until March 22.

State-Regulated Vice.

AN encouraging report on the attitude of American opinion regarding the abolition of the State-regulation of vice was given by Mr. Maurice Gregory at a meeting held on Friday last in the Church Parlour, Westminster Chapel, S.W.

The gathering was called by the British Committee of the International Federation, in order that friends might hear from Mr. Gregory some account of his recent visit to the States as delegate to the Convention of American Social Purity Alliances, which took place at Chicago. Mr. Gregory said that he had been accorded a hearty reception at the Convention. The letter from Mrs. Josephine Butler, of which he was the bearer, was listened to with deep and respectful interest, and was fully reported by the American press. In addition to attending the Chicago meetings, Mr. Gregory devoted time and energy to the cause at a number of important centres, interviewing prominent men and disseminating Abolitionist literature. He had a striking conversation, in company with an influential American delegation, with President Roosevelt, who expressed earnest sympathy with Abolitionist views, and promised inquiry into the contention that State regulation is enforced in the Philippines. Mr. Roosevelt referred to his experience while director of the New York police, and, commenting on legislation which penalizes the woman while excusing the man, described it as "mean."

Copies of Mrs. Butler's "Reminiscences" and other instructive works were accepted by the librarians of several universities; while at Boston Mr. W. Lloyd Garrison (who, following in his father's footsteps, is a leader in all good work) introduced Mr. Gregory to an important gathering of friends interested in religious and philanthropic work, who heard Mr. Gregory's account of the English movement with much satisfaction. Leaders of the medical profession, also, were interviewed; they evinced especial interest in particulars of the European Congress, held at Brussels, and in the general abandonment of confidence in State regulation, which was so marked a characteristic of that assembly of scientific authorities and government officials and representatives. Mr. Gregory found that the New York Medical Association had formally condemned State regulation as an outcome of the tabulation and study of an immense amount of statistical information gathered, with great care and industry, from 800 medical men of New York tate.

Proceeding, Mr. Gregory said, in reply to questions from friends in the audience, that regulation is in force in Cincinnati and some other important cities, owing chiefly to the attitude taken up by the rural population and the large measure of freedom in the matter which is accorded to the police authorities.

Professor Stuart, who followed, voiced the sympathy of English friends with the workers throughout the United States, and went on to say that, although State regulation is now generally admitted by European authorities to be a miserable failure, it is to be feared that at the next Brussels Congress there will be an effort made to popularize plans miscalled "new" which are only a revival of old, one-sided endeavours to secure the immunity of men.

Other speakers included Rev. J. P. Gledstone, who presided, Mr. H. J. Wilson, M.P., Chairman of the British Committee, and Professor Aldis, and before the meeting closed it was resolved to send a message of greeting, and of sympathy in her present indisposition, to Mrs. Josephine Butler.

Self-Support in Missions.—The Church Congress speech of Bishop Tucker of Uganda on "Self-Extension, Self-Support, and Self-Government in Missionary Churches," as illustrated so remarkably in Uganda, Toro, and the surrounding countries, has been reprinted in pamphlet form for free distribution to all English-speaking Evangelical missionaries. The various missionary societies are accepting supplies of copies. Any friend of missions will receive a copy post free by writing to Box 423, Post Office, Manchester.

Conference at West Norwood.

THE eighth annual convention on "The Lord's Return" was held at Lansdowne Hall, West Norwood, February 17-20. In a very marked manner the Holy Spirit was present at all the meetings, and, in God's providence, they proved a time of refreshing and blessing to Christians of all denominations.

Captain F. L. Tottenham was chairman, and his services were heartily appreciated. Pastor W. Fuller Gooch (Convener) opened the Conference on Monday evening with a most helpful address on "The Anointing by which we Know all Things" (1 John ii. 20-27). The other speakers were Revs. J. J. Luce, R. Middleton, Dr. Morris, W. R. Mowll, F. Paynter, H. C. Sturdy, J. P. Watts, and J. Wilkinson. Three meetings were held daily, and in the evenings questions were dealt with.

Rev. Robert Middleton (Norwich) gave a most practical address on Neh. iii. and iv., pointing out how every one helped in building the wall of Jerusalem, from the high priest downwards. The only exceptions were the nobles of the Tekoites, and because "they did not put their necks to the work of their Lord" they were cursed (Judges v. 23). From this he drew a most striking lesson, showing how everyone is expected of the Lord to do something for Him. This address was very greatly appreciated by all.

Many had reason to thank God for Rev. F. Paynter's addresss on "The Marriage of the Lamb." We feel sure that the result of this address will be the increased desire of all present to be always in the attitude of the five wise virgins of Matt. xxv. Rev. J. J. Luce dwelt on a very different aspect, viz., "What does it mean for Him?" On Thursday evening Dr. Morris spoke on the "Practical Aspects of Life in View of the Lord's Return"; and Pastor W. Fuller Gooch gave the closing address, entitled "Coming Judgments; their Course and End" (1 Peter iv. 17-19). He said people regard the Epistles of Peter as not written to the Christian Church; but that, if that were the case, he did not know which books in the Bible were written to Christians. He showed how in the three verses there are four kinds of people mentioned—viz., the watchful Christian; the indifferent Christian; the mere professor, who is no Christian; those who profess nothing, and refuse to have anything to do with the Gospel. The closing words were a solemn appeal to all present, as to whichever class they belonged.

The attendances at all the meetings were very large, and in the evenings between 800 and 900 people were in the building.

The Care of Women Inebriates.

THE quiet, unostentatious work carried on at West Holme, Hounslow, by Miss Pollock, in the cause of reclaiming women inebriates continues to be maintained with encouraging results. In the annual report we read: "The brightest part of our story is the steady increase, year by year, in the number of those who have passed out of the Home to live useful, happy Christian lives, every year leaving the dark past further and further behind.

"There have been an unusual number of difficult cases during the past year; the patients, nevertheless, have, on the whole, been more willing to settle down and stay out the year than they sometimes are. We often find that those who cost us most while here do best after they leave.

"Very touching it is to think of those who go back to hard fare and scanty meals, with the strain, always heavy, of the life of a poor mother or a lonely bread-winner. Still harder sometimes is the struggle of women who have little outward conflict, but no sympathy.

"There are, unfortunately, only too many who need the shelter of West Holme and its kindly Christian influence in order to be rescued from ruin, and saved from their former selves." Miss Pollock may be addressed: West Holme, Hounslow.

Bible Society of Scotland.

AT the annual meeting—held in Glasgow on Tuesday of last week—the report presented by the secretary (Mr. William J. Slowan) showed that financially the year 1901 had been one of the most successful in the history of the National Bible Society of Scotland. The income of £34,644 7s. 9d. had only been exceeded twice before, and as the expenditure had amounted to £28,855 3s. 6d., the balance on hand had been increased by £5,789 4s. 3d.

There had, however, from various causes, been a considerable falling off in the number of copies and parts of the sacred volume placed in the hands of readers. The Scriptures issued had, however, numbered 692,603, comprising 115,862 Bibles, 156,258 Testaments, and 420,483 portions. The number of colporteurs employed abroad was 493, and the total issues since 1861 had been 20,672,495 Scriptures. In Scotland, Ireland, and the colonies 174,423 Scriptures had been issued. At the Glasgow International Exhibition 20,230 Scriptures were sold, and 4,131 distributed, in thirty-two languages. The Gaelic issues included 5,679 Bibles and Testaments, Ireland received 22,708 copies, and the special grants at reduced rates amounted to 33,397. The colonial issues were 21,783 Scriptures. In Germany and Holland 49,002 Scriptures were circulated, and eighteen colporteurs were employed; in Austria, Hungary, Belgium, Brazil, France, Italy, Portugal, and Spain, 145,653 Scriptures were circulated, and 153 colporteurs were employed; while in Turkey, Syria, India, China, Japan, Africa, and New Guinea, 323,525 Scriptures were circulated, and 313 colporteurs employed.

Speaking as a member of the School Board of Glasgow, the chairman (Sir John Neilson Cuthbertson, LL.D.) said: "That while they had no Government grant for education in religion he was delighted to believe that in the great majority of public schools in Scotland the Bible was taught efficiently and well. They could not expect that the teaching of doctrine should be gone into so minutely as it was in the Sabbath schools, but with the day school teaching the text of Scripture—more particularly the historical parts of Scripture—and with the Sunday school impressing the great truths upon the minds of people of tender years, even of those growing into manhood, he had great confidence that the Bible would still remain, as it had been in Scotland, the bulwark of success and progress."

Among others who took part in the proceedings were Rev. J. T. Forbes, Mr. Alexander Kenmure (Seoul, Korea), Mr. Walter Milward (South China), Rev. Alexander Smellie (Carluke).

Welsh Notes.

THE monthly meeting of the Calvinistic Methodists of Lower Montgomery has decided to erect at Dolanog a memorial chapel to Ann Griffiths, the great Welsh hymn writer. An appeal is now being made to the Calvinistic Methodists of Wales to support the deserving movement. It is hardly possible to speak in exaggerated language of the productions of the gifted Welshwoman whose memory is now sought to be honoured in the manner we have mentioned. According to Professor O. M. Edwards, of Oxford, Ann Griffiths was the greatest female hymn-writer this world has ever seen.

Possibly no county in the kingdom has shown greater activity in connection with the Million Pledges Scheme than Merionethshire. Temperance meetings have been held in almost every district in the county, and a large measure of faithfulness has been shown in distributing and collecting the pledge-forms. The results already to hand are decidedly cheering. In some of the smaller towns of the county the proportion of total abstainers to the total population is decidedly high. Penrhyndendraeth comes first with 1,524 total abstainers; Dolgelly comes next with 1,112; then come Festiniog with 998, Bala with 980, and Corris with 832 pledged abstainers.

Obituary.

PASTOR FREDERICK MARSHALL.

ON the morning of his eighty-second birthday (February 18), at Bampton, Oxon, Pastor Frederick Marshall passed away in sleep. He had been a believer for sixty-five years, and a minister of the Gospel for more than forty-five years. For a long period he was a deacon of Gower Street Baptist Chapel, London, and supplied pulpits of strict Baptist churches all over England. During the last twenty years of his life Mr. Marshall was the pastor of churches at Clifton, Beds., and Downham, Norfolk. Many souls were saved and built up through his faithful and comforting ministry. He was the author of several volumes of religious poems. It was a joy to Mr. Marshall that three of his children—two sons and one daughter—were engaged in foreign mission service, while other members of his family served the Lord in Gospel testimony at home.

MRS. COLIN VALENTINE.

In a message from Cannes, Dr. Colin Valentine says:—"My dear wife went to be with Jesus on the morning of the 25th inst. Pray for me."

The esteemed lady, it will be remembered, was on her way home with her husband after long and devoted service in the foreign mission field. She had been a true helpmeet in the labours of Dr. Valentine in connection with the Medical Missionary Training College at Agra. In the measures of famine relief, which Dr. Valentine organized for the benefit of wanderers from the affected districts, in combating the cholera epidemic which followed the famine, and in the care of famine orphans, Mrs. Valentine rendered valuable aid, while she co-operated heartily with her husband in the work at the well-known Beggars' Church at Agra. The departed lady was a sister of Major-General Oldfield, R.A. of Cheltenham.

Personalia.

Mr. Charles Inglis has been greatly encouraged in his work in America. He hopes to reach England about March 23.

Mrs. W. Brealey, widow of the late Mr. George Brealey, has changed her address to 4, Bridge Road, South Tiverton, Bath.

Mr. W. J. Taylor, who was compelled by ill-health to resign the secretaryship of the Hanley Christian Mission, has now undertaken work as resident evangelist at the Mission Hall, Primrose Hill, Chelmsford.

While Mrs. A. R. Saunders is in great measure restored to health, she is obliged under medical advice to remain for some months longer in this country, while Mr. Saunders goes forth alone to take up their work at P'ing-yao, Shansi, China.

Many will learn with regret that Dr. Samuel Kinns has been very unwell for some months past, and has therefore not been able to continue his lectures in the Assyrian and Egyptian galleries of the British Museum. Dr. Kinns has been seized with nervous debility, which has assumed the form of paralysis agitans. From this Sir Thomas Barlow fears the patient will not recover, although he may yet live for several years. Champion of the truth that he is, Dr. Kinns suffers a great trial in being thus incapacitated from lecturing and preaching in defence of the Bible—work in which he has taken great delight during the past twenty years.

Evangelistic.

In Somersetshire Villages.

A fifteen-days' mission in connection with the National Mission to Young People, has been held at Fivehead and Isle Abbotts, near Taunton, by Mr. Ernest Bailey. The blessing of God rested upon the meetings at Fivehead from the beginning, and there was rejoicing over a number of seekers. The meetings were continued during the following week at Isle Abbotts. Mr. Bailey's visit will long be remembered by those who were privileged to hear his earnest appeals.

G. A. J.

Rev. James Sprunt at Trowbridge.

A fourteen days' mission at Bethesda Baptist Church, Trowbridge, was conducted by Rev. James Sprunt with much acceptance and blessing, February 14-28. Mr. Sprunt's addresses were clear, forceful, and eminently Scriptural, and a good work has been done, especially among young men, some of whom have decided for Christ. Members of the church have been encouraged by the earnestness and spiritual teaching of the speaker. A special feature of Mr. Sprunt's services is the impressive way in which he sings the Gospel.

S. H. F.

Union Tabernacle, Wandsworth Road, S.W.

A fortnight's mission at Union Tabernacle, S.W., was concluded on Friday last by Mr. G. W. Neatby. On four evenings, Mr. Densfield with his brass band paraded the streets, playing, singing, and inviting the people to the services. "During the mission," writes Rev. D. M. Cameron, "we had personal dealing with the awakened. At the close of the meeting on Friday night, a working man, who had been at business till late, came in to tell us he had found peace." A spirit of devotion was manifested by the earnest workers at the Tabernacle, and the mission was accompanied by many tokens of blessing.

The Boy Preacher.

The conclusion of Mr. Jack Cooke's mission at the West London Tabernacle awakened many regrets, for the young preacher had won many friends by his earnestness and zeal. On Sunday week the building again proved too small to accommodate the people who thronged to hear. Friday last was the final evening of the mission. Prior to the public meeting Mr. Cooke, with Rev. J. R. Coutts and Rev. E. M. Todd (pastor) met the inquirers. Over 120 were present and received the counsels of the speakers with earnest attention. The friends at the Tabernacle have been much encouraged by the good effect of the services. The audiences have been large and representative, and on Lord's Day last, when the services were taken by the pastor, the congregation was considerably beyond the ordinary. Mr. Cooke begins his mission at the Edinburgh Castle, Rhodeswell Road, Limehouse, E., on Sunday next.

Shelley, Huddersfield.

Very fruitful evangelistic services have just been held at Shelley, Huddersfield, by the Methodist New Connexion and Congregational Churches. The meetings extended from February 16 to March 2, and were conducted by Mr. Chas. Lazenby, of the Evangelization Society. Good congregations gathered night by night, and on the three Sunday evenings the church was well filled. The services have proved seasons of much blessing to the members of both churches, and our hearts have been gladdened by the knowledge that many persons have given in their names in token of their decision to serve the Lord. A good many of them are young men and women varying from seventeen to twenty five years of age, for whom many prayers have been offered, and who it is expected will prove valuable helpers in the work of God. We gratefully acknowledge that in Mr. Lazenby we had a most excellent missioner.

F. G. Stopard, Secretary.

Mr. W. H. Jude in Liverpool.

Mr. W. H. Jude conducted "Services of Gospel Song" at the Y M C A., Mount Pleasant, on Sunday and Monday, February 23, 24. The hall proved far too small for the numbers who crowded to hear the good news of the Gospel, and hundreds were unable to gain admission. The music was taken from "Music and the Higher Life" and from the "Liedertafel" series of hymns and songs. A feature of the evenings was the way in which the congregation sang Mr. Jude's "I Shall Know Him," and his arrangement of "Count Your Blessings" from the "Preacher Musician" series. These were the first services conducted by Mr. Jude since the serious illness which compelled him to give up public work nearly a year ago, but the great success attending the effort has encouraged the committee to invite him to repeat his visita month hence. The arrangements were carried out by the members of the "Music and the Higher Life" Society, which was formed out of Mr Jude's congregation when he removed to London some two years ago.

Rev. John McNeill in Paisley.

Paisley, often spoken of in commercial circles as Threadopolis, being the seat and centre of the great thread-making industry with which the names of Clark and Coats are associated, is at present being missioned by Rev. John McNeill. The people in the town take more than a general interest in Mr. McNeill, as the village of Houston, where he was born, is only some six miles away. Ten years ago, just after he had severed his connection with the stationary ministry and launched out as an itinerant preacher, he conducted a great mission in the same place, and the present visit bids fair to stand on a level with it, if not to exceed it. The meetings are being held in the George A. Clark Hall, a spacious building, central, and easily get-at-able. It has seating accommodation for nearly 3,000 people, and on the opening night of the mission, Sunday, February 23, was crowded to excess shortly after six o'clock. At ten minutes before the advertised time for beginning the service, Mr. McNeill, who had taken his place on the platform, announced that though the time proper had not arrived, the people had, and he would begin. An earnest address was given on the words, "Lord, I will follow Thee whithersoever Thou goest;" and a deep impression was made.

Over and above the evening meetings, to which great crowds are flocking, Mr. McNeill is giving afternoon addresses in the Middle Parish Church, and hundreds are attending.

The Evangelization Society.

The work of the Society continues to be greatly blessed by God, and gives cause for thanksgiving and praise on the part of all who are privileged to be in any way associated with it. As a considerable extension followed the amalgamation of the Scottish Evangelistic Association with the Society several years ago, so we are happy to report a like extension in connection with the merging of the Liverpool Evangelization Society with our own organization a little over twelve months ago. A central office has been established, and the year has been one of happy and blessed service. In addition to the regular staff, a number of gentlemen have kindly placed their services at the Society's disposal, and have been busily engaged in taking meetings on Sundays, and on occasional week-evenings in and around the city. We are thankful for the encouraging beginning, and look forward to a sphere of increasing usefulness amongst the toiling millions of Lancashire and Yorkshire. We wish it to be understood by clergymen, ministers, and others that it is our great desire to help them in their work, and to strengthen their hands by sending gifted and true evangelists—men called of God and fitted by Him for the special work of aggressive evangelization.

We are making arrangements to place over forty tents, the property of the Society, in various centres of England and Scotland, and these tents will be at work from May to September. In addition, we also hope to supply preachers for other tents belonging to County Evangelistic Associations, Tent Missions, and private friends. For this work alone the sum of £4,000 will be required.

John Wood.

Mrs. Baeyertz at Sevenoaks.

The most remarkable evangelistic mission that has been held at Sevenoaks within the memory of the oldest residents was conducted by this converted Jewess at the Baptist Chapel (Rev. C. Rudge, pastor), from February 9 to 24. The people of this town knew little or nothing of this remarkable lady, but her mission has left an abiding influence for good upon all denominations.

The visit of Mrs. Baeyertz had been preceded by united prayer, and from first to last her afternoon Bible readings and evening evangelistic addresses attracted the people in an unprecedented manner. She opened with this motto: "Jesus saith unto her, Said I not unto thee, that, if thou wouldest believe, thou shouldest see the glory of God?" (John xi. 40); and from beginning to end this vision was realized. Prayers have been answered in the salvation of souls, and in the revival of hundreds of believers. God who is so gracious, even to the "Little Faiths" among his children, has done for them exceeding abundantly above all that they asked or thought.

Although associated with the church life of this town for thirty-five years, the writer has never before witnessed such manifest power of the Holy Spirit. How truly did our Lord fulfil his words, "I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me," Full of faith, confidence, and joy in the Lord, our sister always held up Christ in all her meetings, and it was delightful to see how the attendance increased daily, till at length the chapel was full at an afternoon reading, and more than crowded of an evening. All was accomplished with much calmness, without excitement or confusion, but she gatherings were all pervaded by a spirit of awe and delight in the Holy Ghost.

The mission is over. What can we do more but pray that the Lord who has shown us so much loving-kindness will open doors for like missions in many other places, so that this honoured daughter of Judah may go through the length and breadth of the land proclaiming to sinners salvation through Jesus Christ and the coming of the Lord for his people. God bless Mrs. Bacyertz, and make her continually useful!

John Jackson (Baptist Minister).

Mr. A. Y. McGregor, Edinburgh, brought to a close on February 28 a fruitful mission at Largo, Fife, held under the auspices of the Baptist Church C.E. Society. Both the preaching and the singing of the missioner proved attractive and impressive. A number professed to have accepted Christ during the services, while God's own people were also greatly blessed.

William Pulford.

Under the auspices of the East Ham Free Church Council, the churches in the Central Ward, comprising the Congregational, Primitive Methodist and Wesleyan, have just held a three weeks' mission, the preacher being Rev. J. F. T. Hallowes, M.A., of Cambridge. Great blessing has attended this effort, the life of the churches has been revived, and quite a number, especially of young people, have professed conversion.

H. G. B.

An inspiring and helpful ten-days' mission has just been concluded at the Congregational Chapel, Boxford, Suffolk. The church has been blessed, the neighbourhood roused by open-air demonstrations, while as a result of the efforts upwards of thirty inquirers have professed salvation. Pastor Cecil R. Blunden, of Bildeston Baptist Church, was the missioner, and was ably assisted by Rev. J. A. Foster (pastor) and a few zealous workers.

The meetings for theatrical women conducted in the provinces by Mr. William Forbes have been continued by a number of friends. From Sheffield a lady writes to Mr. Forbes:—"One of the Christian ladies gave each a text sent by the young women in her Bible class. Many were quite affected." Rev. S. Johnson, of Leeds, says:—"We have had four meetings of the pantomime girls, and I believe these gatherings will be made a blessing." A lady in Glasgow writes:—"All the young women signed the pledge of the B.W.T.A. They gave me their addresses, and I am going to call on them."

About Books.

TEXTUAL CRITICISM.

BEFORE any ancient work can be translated into a modern tongue, the text itself must be carefully scrutinized, and if that text is preserved in two or more written copies then critical comparison and collation of variations are a prime necessity. As the manuscripts of Holy Scripture, both in the Old and New Testament, are very numerous, and testimony to the condition and features of the text in the early centuries of our era is borne by many primitive versions and writers, the science of Textual Criticism has assumed a first-rate importance in Scripture study, and the results of its application demand the attention of every careful translator or scrupulous commentator. A very impressive witness is borne to this fact by the substantial Handbook to the Textual Criticism of the New Testament, which has been given us by Frederic G. Kenyon, assistant keeper of manuscripts, British Museum. (10s. net. Macmillan.)

The book is designed to supply the needs of students who are comparatively new to the subject; and we cannot but believe that it will prove a great service in that direction. The work is comprehensive in range, and explicit in statement and description. It gives the main facts in readable form, and points out where fuller details may be found. The principal controversies with regard to textual questions are set forth with eminent fairness, whether or not they agree with the author's own views. The student who goes through this book will lay a good foundation of facts and principles, and possess in the same covers admirable descriptions of manuscripts and versions, also of patristic writers in whose works the New Testament Scriptures have been quoted. There is a succinct sketch of textual criticism in the past, also a luminous study of the textual problem in its latest developments. A number of facsimiles add to the practical interest and value of the work, and there are full indices (1) of subjects and persons, and (2) of passages exhibiting various readings and noticed in the work.

An interesting story of missionary life is told in Her Dearest Friend (8d. Marshall Bros.), by Caroline Grant Milne.

A great biography, written in brief and in language which boys and girls can understand, is The Father of the English Bible—William Tyndale. (6d. Robert Culley.)

A devotional spirit breathes in Nature's Benedicite, a graceful poem by "A. E. W.," which reverentially recognises the Divine handiwork in the beauties of nature. (6d. Simpkin Marshall.)

For youthful readers especially, President McKinley (1s. A. Melrose), by David Williamson, is a most readable record of the noble and upright life of one who served his day and generation in the fear of God.

Mr. W. J. Forster continues to write books of travel for juvenile readers. Bernard's Holidays in London, Paris, and Rome is well written and admirably illustrated, and intelligent children will greatly enjoy the pages. (2s. R. Culley).

A Happy Mothers' Meeting is a volume of addresses to mothers, evangelical as to teaching and unpretentious in style. It contains some suggestive thoughts for workers. Each address is followed by a prayer. (2s. Religious Tract Society.)

An attractive booklet which may be of great service on account of its direct yet simple message is The Mastery of Life; and Living Water (6d. Paternoster Printing and Publishing Co., 5, 6, Paternoster Square), by the late Rev. G. H. C. Macgregor.

The Four Last Things, by Rev. F. C. Spurr, is a series of addresses, needless to say, on Death, Judgment, Heaven, and Hell. (1s. Drummond's Tract Depôt, Stirling.) The treatment befits the subjects—explicit and serious. This little book should be placed in the way of the indifferent. .

The Story of the Calabar Mission. Written for Young People. By Jessie F. Hogg, late of Old Calabar (6d. Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier). This deeply interesting narrative is embellished with portraits of Revs. Hope M. Waddell, William Anderson, Hugh Goldie, the Christian King Eyo and others, as well as illustrations of native and mission institutions.

A true message for the century in which we now live has been expressed by Rev. A. T. Palmer in Thoroughbred Patriots. (2s. A. H. Stockwell.) The "thoughts and resolutions" are on a rising scale, passing through positiveness, determinateness, whole-heartedness, and aggressiveness to "the Reign of the Saints." The quotations and references show a wide range of reading, and bring to the reader the words of many of the great and good.

A Bit of Shamrock (1s. Horace Marshall & Son), by Rev. Mark Guy Pearse, is an interesting short Irish story, with attractive illustrations. Its quaint dress is sufficient alone to constitute it a work of art.

The British College Christian Union have added to their useful series of "Bible Studies" two admirable hand-books dealing with The Book of Acts (i.-xii. and xiii.-xxviii.), by Mr. H. W. Oldham. The division into daily sections will commend itself to many busy students, besides those whose names are on college class rolls.

Messrs. Cassell are issuing a new and enlarged edition, in fortnightly parts, of Familiar Wild Flowers, by Professor F. E. Hulme. F.L.S., F.S.A. The work will contain 280 coloured plates, including forty specially prepared for this new edition. It will be completed in twenty-nine parts, the first of which is already out. (6d. nett each part).

The terrible experiences of a missionary's family during the recent rising in China are detailed in the little volume, A Tale of Red Pekin, by Constancia Serjeant. The story is a touching revelation, and throws many sidelights on the deadly work of the rioters, and the effects of the movement on Christian missions. (1s. Marshall Bros.)

Messrs. Longmans have added to the Rivington Devotional Series a volume of selections from Rutherford's Letters, arranged by L. H. M. Soulsby, and entitled Christ and His Cross. (2s. nett.) Those who would know something of the spirit of Rutherford, should study this handsome little book. The excerpts will, it is hoped, send many to the complete edition of the Letters, which occupy a place all their own in devotional literary. The preface is a capital sketch of Rutherford and his testimony for Christ.

Writing from a Church of England standpoint, Rev. Arthur Galton draws reassuring conclusions from his historical examination of Our Outlook Towards English Roman Catholics. (2s. 6d. nett, Stock). In his summing up, he expresses the belief that "the whole tendency of the future appears to be slowly, though surely, setting away from the Papacy, as we have known it in the past and see it in the present." The volume will fill a useful place in the study of this aspect of English Church history.

The Seven Words from the Cross. By George S. Barrett, D.D. (1s. 6d. Jarrold.) There is much that is good in these pages; but we regret that it should have been deemed proper now and again to digress from expository "improvement" in order to maintain positions which, to say the least, are earnestly controverted. The "Seven Words" are larger than the discussion of human theories and ecclesiastical aberrations. Though the devotional character of the book is thus qualified, these pages are replete with thought and instruction.

The Young Preacher's Guide, by Thomas Champness (1s. 6d. "Joyful News" Depot, Rochdale) is a singularly practical book, written by one who is eminently qualified to act as guide to young preachers. It is not exactly a new publication, but a revised and greatly enlarged issue of a familiar friend. There is light and leading in the pages—not one page dull; and young preachers are strongly recommended to read it. Possibly some preachers who are not young, but would gladly make a new start in the hope of doing greater things, would find in this "guide" words of encouragement and counsels of wisdom suited to their special needs.

The Baptist Pulpit. Three more volumes of this series are before us. Volume xviii. is the most attractive, Sermons on the Book of Ruth, by Rev. Henry Briggs, Todmorden. The outstanding lessons of the charming narrative are presented in a striking manner. The next volume is entitled The Gospel: What It Is, and What It Does, and is by Rev. W. Ingli-James, of Barry. The first discourse gives the title; the remainder are somewhat general, but all are well worth reading. Volume xx. is Christ the Centre, by Rev. H. C. Williams, of Corwen, North Wales. Here also, though more numerous, the sermons are on varied themes, the first alone being on Christ "in the midst" of his disciples. The discourses embody the results of wide reading. (2s. 6d. nett. A. H. Stockwell.)

Taking sixteen incidents from the Gospels and the Book of Acts, Rev. Dr. F. A. Noble (Chicago) has demonstrated in Typical New Testament Conversions (3s. 6d. net. James Robinson, 24, Bridge Street, Manchester) "that the actual experiences of men in turning from sin to righteousness, or to the purpose to live a righteous life, differ very greatly." Case after case is minutely examined, and as the elements which differed are eliminated, the reader is brought face to face with the true essentials. Those who have been puzzled at a conscious lack of such experiences as they hear others relate, or who in seeking souls have been surprised it finding no other cases exactly like their own, may find the secret in these pages. The book will be a valuable acquisition, especially to Christian workers who have not deeply pondered this question.

In a prefatory note to Home in the World Beyond (2s. 6d. Marshall Bros.), Rev. Dr. George Philip (Edinburgh) says truly that the "desire to look into the world beyond is natural, universal, and strong." The reader with quickened spiritual perceptions will find in these chapters much that will lead him by green pastures and still waters, while still keeping on the safe side of wholesome limitations; and though he may not be able to express in words what he has learned by the study, his enrichment of soul will be none the less real. This is one of the "books of the heart" whose can only be appreciated by those accustomed to quiet hours of communion.

To meet the growing demand for Dr. Tyndall's useful work, Object Sermons in Outline, a new edition has been prepared. The volume betokens a great amount of research and observation, and is comprehensive in its range of subjects. The discourses are of a simple nature, and combine conciseness with sustained interest, while there is no danger of the object presented to the eye overlaying the truth it is intended to convey to the mind. The introduction of an object sermon will undoubtedly be effective where the ordinary method of communication has not been sufficient to gain access for the Word. Where it is not possible or convenient to employ the objects accompanying the text, these addresses and outlines are so arranged that by means of the description given in every case the actual object can be dispensed with. (3s. 6d. Allenson.)

In the opening volume of "The Nineteenth Century Series" (5s. each, net. Chambers), Dr. W. H. Withrow presents an excellent, though necessarily brief review of Religious Progress in the Century. When we say that the volume deals in turn with contrasts and phases of the century and its predecessor, missions, progress of the churches, progress of religious thought, and special religious activities and philanthropies, it will be easily understood that it will be a valuable addition to the reference shelf at the elbow of many a busy worker. American origin guaranteed that the book would not be exclusively European; but no undue preponderance is given to the United States, while we welcome specially the chapters on Continental countries. The book is no mere collection of facts and figures, but a well digested presentation of the more important. We are shown not only how matters now stand, but the lines along which progress is being made in each respect, proving how unsafe it is to conclude hastily that the former times were better than these.

The year's Scottish "Monthly Visitor" Tracts when gathered (3d. 40, Hanover Street, Edinburgh), show the care which is taken in the selection of the tracts.

In a booklet Mr. A. H. Stockwell answers the question, Should I go to the Theatre? (1d. 2, Amen Corner, E.C.) with an emphatic "No," after looking at it from different points of view.

Two booklets of special value are Unto Him: A Simple Study About Coming to Jesus Christ, by John H. Vincent; and For Eyes That Weep: A Message to those who are bereaved, by Samuel G. Smith. (3d. each. Partridge.)

Nobility's True Badge is a book of thoughts for daily reading compiled by E. Adeline Smith. (Paper, 2d.; cloth, 6d. Partridge.) It is intended principally for the use of members of societies for the prevention of cruelty to animals.

A careful examination of the position with reference to the Royal Declaration will be found in Our Roman Catholic Neighbours and Their Plea (1d. C. J. Thynne), a sermon by Rev. E. Mansel Townshend, of Llanvapley, Abergavenny.

Nineteenth Century Lotto consists of questions on the most interesting events of the nineteenth century, and also on prominent characters. This is a capital game for children (1s. 1½d. post free. Miss A. Monck Mason, 41, Cherriton Road Folkestone.

Life's Journey, by J. J. (3d. Partridge), is an attractive booklet, containing an allegory of the journey of a company of pilgrims to the Better Country, with experiences by the way. The emphasis throughout is on the True Guide, which is the Word of God.

A Frank Talk About Gambling and Betting. By Robert E. Speer, Secretary of the (American) Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions. (3d. Partridge.) A valuable booklet, for which, by the assistance of those who combat great social evils, we bespeak a large circulation.

A booklet which will have a deep interest for our readers is, The Word of God versus the "Higher Criticism," by Pastor W. Fuller Gooch. (2d. Bible League, 186, Aldersgate Street, E.C.) It comprises a lecture delivered at the Great Assembly Hall last October.

A Short Life of Anne Askew. By Mary E. T. Stirling. (2d. Church Association, 14, Buckingham Street, Strand.) Good! Let the story of the martyrs be rehearsed to the glory of God. Such publications should encourage the strong and give strength to the weak.

Among timely and useful booklets may be mentioned Pleasure Seeking and The Drink Traffic, by Rev. Sidney Harris. (1d. each. Partridge.) Also A Way to Escape, being a temperance sermon preached by Archbishop Temple. (Manchester, Salford, and District Temperance Union, 20, Cross Street.)

An Appeal to the Jews on the Claims of Christ. Mr I. Julian Grande, Director of the Irish Mission to the Jews has issued an open letter with this title, printed in Yiddish and English, for distribution among Jews. Christians interested in such work may have copies free on application to Mr. Grande, 12, Wellington Place, Belfast.

No. 18 of the White Cross League Church of England Society Papers for Men is entitled The Duties and Responsibilities of Married Men (3d. League Offices, 7, Dean's Yard, Westminster). It is not easy to treat the subject for the popular reader: but we doubt if it could have been treated better than here.

Three of a series of sermons by Rev. W. Wright Robinson, on Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, on Scenes at the Dark River, The Hill Difficulty, and The House Beautiful (3d. each. J. Bracket, Hemel Hempstead), form booklets in which the true lessons of the Great Allegory are commended to the interest and understanding of those in search of help for the daily life.

The Y.M.C.A.

THE Bible Class of the Clevedon (Somerset) Association, which is comparatively new, numbers already over 150 members.

The Belfast Association reports an average weekly attendance, during the present winter's work, of 2,300 persons at its five Gospel meetings, three of which are for young men only. It has not had a similar experience since Mr. Moody's visit in 1874.

The annual meeting of the Bath Association was held on Thursday last, the Earl of Aberdeen presiding. The report showed that the spiritual work has been kept well to the front with encouraging results. Among the speakers were the Rector of Bath and Mr. Quintin Hogg.

Mr. W. M. Oatts, of Glasgow, has conducted a successful mission under the auspices of the Sunderland Association. The annual public meeting was presided over by Mr. Friend Lamb. The report showed that the membership roll reached 921. The late Mr. C. Stansfield Wilson has left the Association a legacy of £500.

The Y.M.C.A. and Y.W.C.A. have had formally conveyed to them the buildings in Rotterdam Street, Thurso, known as the Christian Institute, along with large garden attached. This gift, valued at £500 to £600, the Associations owe to the generosity of the the Misses Henderson, Ormlie Lodge, who have always manifested a very deep interest in the work.

An Association formed among the Boer prisoners at St. Helena is reported by De Jongelingsbode, organ of the Netherlands Associations, to number 165 members. A Boer correspondent of that journal says: "Many here declare openly that it has been for their good that they were sent to St. Helena, for they have found there a treasure that they did not possess in their own country."

The Earl of Aberdeen presided at the annual meeting of the Totterdown, Bristol, Association on February 28. The report, read by Mr. J. G. Marsh was of an encouraging character. The past year's work has been of a highly successful character, but a debt of over £1,000 remains on the institute, and operations are hampered by the want of a hall to hold about 800 people. Mr. J. Storrs Fry referred to the value of the Y.M.C.A. to the nation, and Mr. Quintin Hogg emphasized the importance of the spiritual side of the work.

The report for the past year of the Metropolitan work of the New York Associations is unprecedently satisfactory. Mortgages have been paid off five branch buildings, amounting to over £60,000. The work of the Central Association is to be removed to another site in Twenty-third Street, involving an outlay, on site and building, of more than £157,000, towards which will be forthcoming the proceeds upon sale of the old premises. The year closed with a membership of over 10,000, a gain of about 1,000 over the previous year at the same date.

The Southport Association celebrated its jubilee on Feb. 25, when, in addition to a special sermon by Rev. Dinsdale T. Young in the Mornington-road Wesleyan Church in the afternoon, a demonstration was held in the evening in the Cambridge Hall under the presidency of the Mayor, the Bishop of Liverpool, Mr. Dinsdale Young, and Mr. W. H. Mills, of the National Council, taking part therein. The Bishop and other speakers bore eloquent testimony to the great usefulness of Associations in providing for the religious, social, educational, and physical wants of young men in this and many other lands.

The Abergavenny Association recently held its first annual meeting in the new premises. This is the twenty-eighth year of the Association's existence. A large number came together to tea, and the commodious hall was crowded for the meeting. The reports of the treasurer, secretary, and building fund treasurer, were of a most gratifying character. The increased interest in the Sunday afternoon men's meeting was considered very satisfactory, and since the opening of the New Year over thirty new members of that meeting have been received, and over 120 men have been present every Sunday (the population of Abergavenny is under 8,000). The Association has done well as far as clearing off the debt on the new premises is concerned, only about £170 now remaining. The meeting was addressed by Mr. W. A. Baker (Newport) and Rev. A. Warris, the president of the Hereford Y.M.C.A. The Association has sustained a great loss in the death, at Port Said, of Mr. W. H. Charles.

"Board School Children's Free-Dinner Fund."—During the last eight weeks, wherever poverty is chronic, distress has gravely deepened. Our tables have been crowded; the appeals for children in need have been too pathetic to deny. Our funds are therefore exhausted. The causes of this increase of distress are the constant interruptions to work from inclement weather, slackness of work in many trades, and the fact that, in poor districts, many women accustomed to earn their living by charing have found their employers unwilling to give them work in their houses, owing to the dread of small-pox.—Anna Pennington, Hon. Secretary, 16, Crossfield Road, South Hampstead, N.W.

The Churches.

Church of England.

Rev. D. A. Smith, curate of St. James' Holloway, has been appointed to the vicarage of St. Paul's, Canonbury—patrons, the Islington trustees.

The Whitechapel Guardians have just voted a grant from the rates in aid of the Church Army Labour Homes, thus following the example of several similar bodies throughout the country.

The Church Missionary Society has received donations of £1,000 each from Captain Cundy and Mr. W. D. Cruddas. "F.H." has also given the society a sum of £1,000 as a special donation for Coronation year.

It is announced that Count Enrico di Campello of Arrone, in Umbria, Bishop of the Reformed Catholic Church in Italy, has sent in his resignation to the Bishop of Salisbury, who is described in the quarterly report of the Italian Church Reform Association as his Ordinary.

At the request of the Home Office, Colin F. Campbell (Hon. Social Sec. of the Church Army) makes quarterly visits to all the convict prisons. He has just interviewed twenty-seven men at Borstal, who are about to be discharged on licence, and has arranged for their reception and assistance by the Church Army Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society.

The Times has reproduced from its columns for 1802 the following statement: "All the married clergymen of the Diocese of Peterborough, or who are widowers with children, and possessed of a small income only, are invited to apply to the Bishop of that Diocese to obtain relief." The year 1802 was a period of great distress. The price of the four-pound loaf stood for a time at a shilling.

It is pleasant to find that the voluntary offerings of the members of the Anglican Communion continue to increase in several directions, the amount for the past year reaching £7,778,134, the sum given for foreign missions being £824,137. The amount raised parochially and locally for the support of the clergy was £828,624, a fine amount, taken in connection with the recent strictures made by the Bishop of London, but one which in face of the painful facts which he urged, will bear a considerable increase yet.

Congregational.

A Bank of England note for £500 has been anonymously dropped into the letter-box of the London Missionary Society to be applied to the reduction of its debt.

Rev. Principal Scott has accepted an invitation from the Congregational churches of Cornwall to preach the sermon at the centenary celebration of the formation of the county Association. The meetings are to be held next month in Penzance.

The new Sunday-schools in connection with the Blackburn Road Church, Bolton, have been opened by Mr. W. H. Lever. They are among the finest schools in England, having a frontage of 140ft, and a depth of 81ft. The central hall will hold over 1,000 people. The two wings contain twenty-nine class-rooms, an infants' room for 250, a lecture hall, kitchen, &c.

At the annual meeting of Magdalen Road Church, Norwich, it was stated that the membership is 287. The Sunday schools number 650 scholars, with sixty teachers. The temporary iron church is to be removed to the back of the site, to make room for the new church, which will be commenced as early as possible. The building is to seat 850 people, and will cost about £5,000.

On February 27, the London Congregational Union had before it a proposal representing an entire change in regard to the work of the denomination in South London. Rev. Thomas Stephens, of Camberwell, submitted a scheme for the federation of six or eight churches that are now, as he describes it, "practically empty." These, he suggests, should be organized on the same lines as those of the well-known and successful Wesleyan London Missions.

Baptist.

Rev. J. P. Clark, M.A., of Eastbourne, has accepted a unanimous invitation to the temporary pastorate of the church at Stanton Road, Barnes, S.W.

No fewer than 1,003 churches in Great Britain have intimated to Rev. Dr. Maclaren, president of the Union, their intention to unite this month in the simultaneous collection on behalf of the Twentieth Century Fund. The actual receipts to date are £151,721.

At the annual meeting of the church at Yalding, Kent (pastor, Rev. W. H. Tomkins), most satisfactory reports were presented from the various departments of church work. The Sunday school has almost doubled itself during the year. Upwards of £100 has been raised for the reduction of the debt on the chapel buildings.

The third annual festival of the North London Baptist choirs was held on Wednesday, February 26, at Vernon Chapel, King's Cross, N. Under the direction of Mr. G. E. Arundel (Devonshire-square) the choirs rendered excellently various anthems, the soloists being Miss E. Potter and Mr. A. Holder. A short address on "Praise" was given by Rev. D. H. Moore.

At the East London Tabernacle the first thank-offering day with the new pastor, Rev. Edwin H. Ellis, was held on Monday week. Mr. Ellis was in the vestry from seven o'clock in the morning till nine in the evening, and received as freewill offerings from the people the total sum of £284. The work at the Tabernacle is making good progress; thirty were proposed for church fellowship last month.

Methodist.

In the interests of Primitive Methodist local preachers it is proposed to establish a Summer School of Theology at the Livingstone Hall, Edinburgh. The sessions are to continue from July 27 to August 2, and at the reception Dr. Cameron Lees will address the students.

One of the most prosperous circuits in the Primitive Methodist Connexion is Middlesbrough. For over two years it experienced a revival, in which some hundreds of persons were converted at the ordinary services. Two new chapels are to be erected forthwith in the town. Rev. J. G. Bowran is the superintendent.

Rev. H. T. Meakin, of the Wesleyan South London Mission, has made arrangements by which the lower part of the Central Hall, Bermondsey, will be utilized between 11.30 a.m. and 3 p.m. as dining-rooms for work-people. Facilities for dining 400 persons under healthy and cheerful conditions are being provided, with separate rooms and entrances for men and girls. The system is arranged on the same lines as the Alexandra Trust.

The West London Mission has transformed its magazine, "Advance" now appearing as a quarterly, price threepence. The most interesting feature in the new issue is an appreciation of the late Sister Edith Gresham, with portrait, and other photographs. There are also several articles illustrating various aspects of the work.

In the Wesleyan body the grouping of small and scattered country circuits into one large circuit, worked sectionally as missions, is winning acceptance, though not without some misdoubtings. It is believed that this arrangement is solving the difficulty of securing concentration of pastoral oversight with a strong central circuit authority. The success secured hitherto has more than justified the experiment, and the Home Mission Secretary has many applications for these new Missions.

Presbyterian.

The Sunday-schools raised last year for missionary purposes, home and foreign, £2,454, an increase for the year of £40.

The Church Extension Committee of the North London Presbytery is to be congratulated on the success that has attended its latest enterprise at Harrow. After only two weeks' services, a congregation of 120 had gathered. At Enfield, too, a hall is in course of erection, and will be opened in the summer.

There was a large gathering at Trinity Presbyterian Church, Notting Hill, on the occasion of the annual congregational meeting recently held. After a social hour in the lecture hall, an adjournment was made to the church, where Rev. Hugh Falconer presided. Mr. J. E. Mathieson dealt, in a clear, incisive way, with the difficult problem of mission work in China, and spoke in encouraging terms of the work being done by the Jewish Mission in the East End. Mr. Walter B. Sloan, of the China Inland Mission, gave a short, stirring, helpful address on "Spiritual Life," and the meeting was brought to a close by Mr. Falconer with a word of earnest exhortation and encouragement.

Society of Friends.

A new meeting-house, called Bradley Hall, Station Road, Wood Green, N., has been opened for worship. John Henry Quinn, of Chelsea was present at the first meeting, when several took part in the vocal service. Meetings for worship are to be held on Sundays at eleven, a.m., and there is a prospect of a women's branch of the Wood Green Adult School being held in the hall on Sunday afternoons.

William George Hall and his wife revisited Henley-on-Thames, the scene of their former labours, and took part in the meetings on February 16 and 17. They were delighted to find Friends enthusiastically engaged in all the varied departments of work. Testimony to lasting benefits received through these Friends' former residence was given. In addition to the adult school and mission work, there is a solid Friends' meeting, a Band of Hope of upwards of 100 members, and a large and well-attended mothers' meeting.

The Brixton Gospel Male Choir has been formed for the purpose of rendering help at missions and evangelistic services, free of charge, within a two-mile radius of Brixton Station. For distances beyond train fare would be asked. The secretary is Mr. C. Green, 67, Barnwell Road, Brixton, S.W.

Kent Street Sunday and Ragged Schools, S.E., are situated in the midst of the poorest and most densely-populated parts of Southwark and Bermondsey, and has met the needs of those who are driven by poverty to reside here, by providing schools on Sunday morning, afternoon, and night, attended by an average of 300, as well as meetings for parents and adults, and by welcoming within its doors on week evenings those who have no other place of refuge but the streets. There are many departments of Christian effort in operation. The old main building being decayed, has been replaced by a simpler, suitable structure, which is to be opened by the Marquis of Northampton on March 12. Towards the expense of the new building the sum of £850 has been subscribed, leaving £150 still to be raised. The treasurer is Mr. G. H. Payne, 350, Kennington Road, S.E.

Fallen Asleep.

Aged ninety-two, Mr. H. S. WILDE, one of the founders of the C.E.T.S.—Aged ninety-two, Mrs. DUTHOIT, the oldest member of Union Congregational Chapel, Islington. Mrs. Duthoit remembered being taken to Union Chapel, as it then existed, in the year before Queen Victoria was born. Before Dr. Allon began his notable ministry, which lasted for nearly half a century, she was one of the leading helpers of Mr. Lewis, the first minister of the church. Until quite recently she was hardly ever absent from a Sunday or week evening service.—At Glasgow, on February 24, Mrs. THOMPSON, the wife of Rev. Peter Thompson, of the Wesleyan East London Mission. She has always been a splendid helper among the East End poor. During the last few years she has been a great sufferer.—On February 24, Rev. JOHN HUGHES, D.D., of Bangor, the head of the Welsh Wesleyan Bookroom, and the president-elect of the Welsh Wesleyan Assembly. Dr. Hughes had been in the Wesleyan ministry for nearly thirty-five years. He was widely known in Wales as a preacher and writer.—Rev. G. D. R. MUNRO, senior minister of Jordanhill U.F. Church, Glasgow.—Rev. W. W. BUTLIN, vicar of Penponds, Camborne, where for forty-six years he maintained an evangelical ministry.

Notes & Comments

Self-Support in Missions. On every hand it is felt that considerable extension of foreign missionary work must depend on the possibility of the development of the self-support principle. As stated in our last issue, the Church Congress speech of Bishop Tucker, of Uganda, on "Self-Extension, Self-Support, and Self-Government in Missionary Churches," as illustrated so remarkably in Uganda, Toro, and the surrounding countries, has been reprinted in pamphlet form for free distribution to all English-speaking Evangelical missionaries. The facts that this has been done by a Nonconformist, and that the Missionary Societies, regardless of denomination, are heartily co-operating in its circulation, is a hopeful sign that this important aspect of missionary effort is forcing itself upon the Christian conscience. Any friend of missions will receive a copy post free by writing to Box 423, Post Office, Manchester.

Nature's Call to Repentance. All pain and disease are nature's call to repentance. They are a signal that the Divine laws have been violated, and that amendment is necessary. Sharp and unpleasant as are the warnings given by nature, they are really most merciful, and we ought to be thankful for them. The present small-pox epidemic in London is an unmistakable indication of the extent to which men have ignored the first laws of life. This repulsive disease flourishes most, according to the returns, in the crowded areas of the poorer districts, and there can be no reasonable doubt that the dirty conditions of life amongst the poor offer a favourable soil for the dreadful scourge now in our midst. The epidemic is nature's call to governing bodies, landlords, and private individuals, to enforce the laws of health and cleanliness. There are tens of thousands of people in the crowded districts who rarely, if ever, bathe, and whose dwellings are never sweetened by the pure air of God. Such people need instruction in the first principles of health. But what do the landlords need who become rich upon the misery, and dirt and overcrowding of the people?

Speaking to the Heart. There is a marginal rendering more than once found in the Old Testament Scriptures, which is full of suggestion to all who would speak for God:—i.e., "Speak ye to the heart of Jerusalem." And it is noticeable that the prophets who are thus exhorted had themselves learned, through pain and sorrow, some of the deepest lessons of the heart. That was their qualification for speaking to the hearts of others; for he who has never been deeply moved in his own heart can never have any message for another. In all teaching and preaching there must of necessity be a large place for the operations of the mind. We are to love God with the mind, and we are to give reasons for the hope that is in us; but the largest place is reserved for the operations of the heart. "Love never faileth." Beneath many a crusty surface there is a vulnerable place which love alone can reach. The simulation of love will only repel people, for they will discover the imposture at once. The man who means effectively to reach other hearts will have most carefully to discipline his own, and to keep it in abiding touch with the heart of Jesus.

The Peril of Familiarity. Rev. J. H. Jowett in his sermon last week called attention to the peril which ever menaces ministers and other workers, who are frequently dealing with holy things, of losing fineness of touch and sympathy of spirit through their very intimacy with spiritual things. The proverb, "familiarity breeds contempt," has an application in the spiritual as well as in the social sphere. And it is very easy to see how injurious is that state of soul which has substituted mechanics for free and healthy life. There is an inner unreality in the personal life which leads to automatic and soulless service. Mr. Jowett instanced the case of a prominent preacher, who, feeling this danger, always uses for private devotion another Bible than that in which he has conserved the results of his exegetical studies; in doing so there is no association with technicalities of language, &c. We know of some who make a practice of reading devotionally from a foreign Bible, the novelty of the language compelling them to think as they go along. Anything that will prevent spiritual benumbment in devotion should be welcomed.

The Limits of Union. The much-advertised lectures in the Parish Church, Eccles, to be given by various Nonconformists upon the message which each body has brought to the whole Church, were marred by the proposed contribution to the series by a Unitarian minister. Such an one was to tell what his body had done for the Church. The engagement ought never to have been made. Christian union is an excellent thing, and much to be desired, but the limits of union must be respected. It is really of no use to pretend that when men are hopelessly divided upon the very fundamentals of Christianity, there can be any sort of Christian union between them. It is better all round that the gulf which divides Unitarians from Christians should be seen to be a gulf. To attempt to bridge it with lath upon which flowers are strewn, is perilous for any who essay to cross the chasm. We are glad that Canon Cremer afterwards saw his way to alter the arrangement.

A New Movement for Young Men. We are pleased to learn that the Committee of the Central Y.M.C.A. is engaged upon the problem of providing something like a home life for the young men who, in London, are now left to shift for themselves in lodgings and boarding-houses. So far, young men have been introduced to suitable lodgings in various parts of the metropolis, but now the desirability of providing a kind of residential club or hotel is before the committee. For our part, we think that it would be a good thing if an institution something like one of the Settlements could be founded—modified, of course, in certain of the details. There is room, undoubtedly, for such an institution, where young men might obtain, as far as possible, the comforts of home life, together with certain educational and recreational advantages—all under one roof; an institution also which might train young men to do Christian work in spare hours. We can conceive of nothing more healthy, more happy, and more useful than such a home. Financially, there should be no difficulty in founding it, whilst the moral and social advantages are patent to everybody.

An Impossible Situation. Romanism in the Church is deeply exercising the editorial mind of several of the more moderate Anglican newspapers. The Record is specially apprehensive of the tendency towards "antagonism, and possibly disruption," and affirms that "no reasonable plea for comprehension will now cover the present condition of the Church of England," where Unitarians and Romanists are included in an unquiet and scarcely honourable bond of "union." How long this unreal state of things will last, and what harm to conscience it involves, does not yet appear; the time must come, however, when the slumbering forces will break into open opposition, and important results may then be expected. The present situation is anomalous in the highest degree, and must cause deep anxiety to those who have the true interests of the Church at heart.

Loyalty and Conscience. The immense audience that assembled in the City Temple last Thursday morning sympathized with Dr. Parker in the delicate task he felt called upon to discharge in criticizing some of the recent movements of the King. It is, as the venerable preacher said, an unpleasant thing to say a single word that has even the semblance of disloyalty to the Sovereign, and yet because the King is the King and not a private individual, his actions are the more open to approval or disapproval. Of course, we do not expect sporting and publicans' papers to understand the Christian attitude towards beer and Sunday concerts, but we do expect respectable journals to understand that English society contains a vast number of notable people and moral citizens who have a right to be heard in the affairs of the nation. It is a gratuitous insult to brand as "cant" the many respectful criticisms recently passed upon some of the King's movements. The country would do well to ponder Dr. Parker's quiet but searching sentences:—

> If the King brews beer, the people will not need encouraging to drink it. If the King patronizes Sunday concerts, the people will feel free to do the same. . . . The King may not enter a Nonconformist Church, but he may wound a Nonconformist heart.

Army Reform. Mr. Brodrick's Army Reform programme is to take the form of increased pay to the private soldier, in order to raise the status of the army, and so increase the willingness of men to enlist. No true patriot would for a moment grudge the soldier a living wage, especially in the case of married men with families. But the permanent enlargement of the army, together with increased pay, is likely to weigh heavily on the community. The scheme is put forward as the only alternative to conscription. Anything that staves off that crowning calamity will be welcome, but the reality of the alternative is an open question. The trend of events is a serious one, and it is more than doubtful that so drastic a course is necessary, even on the ground of expediency. On the highest grounds of all, it may lead to a set-back to the peace sentiment, which may have the gravest consequences.

Drink and Suicide. After ten years' experience as a prison chaplain, Rev. J. W. Horsley has just stated that during his service at Clerkenwell Prison he had each year about three hundred prisoners under his notice who had been charged with attempted suicide, and that of these cases, in a certain twelve months, he recorded 145 as due to drink. It may safely be assumed that a similar proportion holds good in regard to the fatal cases, although in many of these direct evidence is not obtainable. Mr. Horsley thinks that, as suicide is so prevalent, repressive measures are imperative. Better begin with the brewer—accessory before the fact in so large a number of cases.

A Haven of Refuge. It is unhappily true that enthusiastic individual effort frequently is more successful than State effort in regard to matters of social reform. A striking illustration of this may be found in Lady Henry Somerset's work at the Duxhurst farm, in Surrey. At that place she has gathered a colony of women inebriates, and it is gratifying to learn that about 150 of these have been totally reformed, and saved from a life of intemperance. Unfortunately, however, only about sixty can be received at a time in the seven houses grouped upon the farm, a very painful condition of things seeing that the applications to Lady Henry Somerset average nearly 3,200 per annum! It has often been suggested that the Government might with advantage follow the noble example of this Christian philanthropist, and it would better become the State to cease fostering the manufacture of the unhappy inebriates whom it is found necessary to remove out of the way of the terrible temptations to drink.

The Prison Cell. Sir Robert Anderson, K.C.B., late Assistant Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, protests vigorously against the incarceration of untried prisoners in the ordinary prison cells; and he maintains, further, that to punish criminals by deliberately depriving them of influences fitted to soften and humanize them is not only "false in principle but practically barbarous." We have gone far enough along the path of prison reform to prove the desirability of going still further.

Theatres and Music-Halls. The London County Council is to be congratulated on its courage in electing Mr. McDougall to its chair for the coming year. A short time ago Mr. McDougall was one of the most abused men in the country, because he undertook to expose and denounce the filthy condition of the music-hall stage in London. Every possible channel of vituperation was directed against him. In spite of this he persevered, and has had the double reward of seeing the evil to a large extent removed, and his own good name vindicated. Our theatres and music halls are still far from being fully cleansed, and it seems doubtful if they ever will become so; but it is to the interests of everybody that they should be swept clean of the verbal and other garbage, against which Mr. McDougall's action was directed. The L.C.C. has done many signal services to morality, but none greater than to deal with this tide of obscenity in public places of amusement. Incessant watchfulness is still the only safe policy.

Gambling and Betting—the "Other Side." One of the sporting papers has been commenting on the Lords' Inquiry into the gambling mania. The present increase in the vice among working-men is traced to the spread of universal education. Before the present system began, this class was composed "almost entirely of ignorant men without aspirations [!], and content with the lot in which they were placed," but are now "filled with laudable ambition to be a little better than they are," and bet in order to "get on all fours with their superiors." The opinion is also hazarded that betting is "the easiest method of obtaining the bit of extra that all want." If this is so, we should like to know where the bookmakers' commission comes in, and how working-men can "better" their position by winning each other's money? The working-men must be but little improved by education if they can swallow such arguments as this. The only persons who improve their position by betting are the professionals who hoodwink people to play into their hands. But for this, it would cease to-morrow.

Cruelty and "Sport." The House of Lords did not show to advantage in discussing the Cruelty to Wild Animals Bill. Lord Newton characterized the attempt to suppress the hunting of carted stags, the coursing of bagged rabbits, pigeon shooting, and the slaughter of battues of tame pheasants as "canting sentiment"; while another noble lord denounced the Bill as an attack on the sports of the poor! The opposition was so determined that the Bishop of Hereford, who introduced the Bill, withdrew it before it went to a division. It is difficult to see the connection between the poor and such "sports," which are peculiarly the diversion of the moneyed classes, and which would at once be discontinued but for their support. There is much room for the education of the humanitarian sentiment when so beneficent a measure receives such scant mercy from the highest classes in the land. Such a debate is a gross revelation of callousness and cruelty in high places. What other term than "cruel" can be applied to "sport" which tames animals in order to turn them out and hunt them down, or which permits the deliberate breaking of a rabbit's leg before allowing it to run, in order to help young dogs the better to hunt it?

The Claims of Dumb Animals. The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals has done excellent work in creating a humaner treatment towards suffering creatures; but that there is much yet to be done is shown by a recent case of cruelty towards living fish exposed for sale in a tank, for which a magistrate inflicted a substantial fine on a dealer. It is an instance of the great suffering caused by want of thought rather than want of heart. It is more difficult to realize that cold-blooded creatures are capable of keen suffering than in the case of higher orders; but that needless pain is caused by the lack of imagination is certain, especially in the case of fishermen who neglect to kill their victims when caught, but leave them to suffocate in nets and baskets while they continue their sport.

The Art of Preaching.

By Rev. J. F. T. HALLOWES, M.A.

DISCONTENT with the modern pulpit, which is now so common, is by no means without some excuse. Even good men who have preached for years have often found that practice has not made them in any sense perfect. The pew groans partly because the pulpit drones. I should like to emphasize three important points which may be useful, especially to young preachers.

I. Possess yourself with your subject. C. H. Spurgeon once said, "The best way to preach is to cram yourself full of your subject, and then to get up and go ahead." Mr. Gladstone defined the preparation for preaching as "the accumulation and thorough digestion of knowledge. It was only," said he, "out of a full heart and likewise out of a well-furnished mind that good extemporary preaching could proceed." St. Paul, addressing Timothy, says, "Give heed to reading, to exhortation, to teaching."

The lives of some preachers are too external to enable them to preach with freshness of thought. We cannot be stale in private and fresh in public. Exhortation becomes platitude, and teaching twaddle, unless spiritual things are diligently compared with spiritual; unless we have some right to the title given to certain Puritan divines of "painful preachers," which did not mean that they were painful to listen to, but that they took pains to find out appropriate, acceptable words.

II. Parry all assaults of the fear of man, of love of applause, and of self-consciousness. We must have not only boldness to announce the truth as far as we understand it, but to denounce sin; the sins of modern life, respectable, money-making, fashionable iniquities. He who would make full proof of his ministry must not speak with bated breath about the alcoholism, which is quieting the consciences of thousands of our people, quenching their reason, and quickening their passions, so that virtue becomes more difficult, vice more easy, and mighty barriers are built up betwixt themselves and the Kingdom of God.

And the preacher must get rid of all self-consciousness, for this is like a cloud, and will dim the light of God upon his spirit, and will tend to prejudice his auditors against him.

III.—Press home the truths taught, by an earnest personal application of them in the power of the Spirit of God.—Many a good doctrinal discourse is woefully deprived of its full effect because of its lack of application to the hearts and lives of the hearers. Masterly expositions of Scripture, pregnant thoughts, well-expressed arguments, and apt illustrations, cannot save a sermon from being a mere essay, unless it is actually brought to bear upon the hearers with a view to their edification or conversion, or both. Those sermons of the Apostles, which were preached under the full force of the Pentecostal baptism, were personal in a very high degree. "With great power the Apostles gave witness to the resurrection of the Lord Jesus," and with great faithfulness they urged home upon the consciences of the Jerusalem sinners the monstrous crime of having killed the Prince of life.

There is one note which successful preachers all have in common, though they may differ immensely in learning, magnetic power, grasp of thought and of language. They are all able to apply the truth, and drive it home in the power of the Spirit of God. Savonarola, Segneri, Martin Boos, Whitefield, Wesley, Rowland Hill, John Elias, Christmas Evans, Charles Finney, Moody, Spurgeon, Catherine Booth were all dissimilar from one another in numbers of particulars, but they all had the power of so forcefully presenting the great verities they proclaimed, that men and women felt their consciences gripped by the Word. And this special power was actually a power not their own, namely that of the Holy Spirit, and hence accomplished results beyond themselves. They undervalued the most shining talents, the most commanding oratory save as a channel for the Spirit of God. Let us aim not so much at originality as at echoing far and wide the voice of God in testimony of his Son.

The True Melchizedek.—III.

"Such a High Priest became us" (Heb. vii. 26).
"We have such a High Priest" (viii. 1).

IT has already been noted that no mention is made of Melchizedek's parentage or genealogy, because he is the type of the Great Priest having neither beginning of days nor end of life. Also that no mention is here made of burnt-offering, peace-offering, or sin-offering; because He of whom Melchizedek is the type was declared of Jehovah a Priest on the basis of a finished work. Not in the days of his flesh, but on the morning of his resurrection was He named of God a High Priest after the order of Melchizedek. Very early in the morning of that first day of a new week, it became true that the types and shadows of the law are all fulfilled, and now withdraw.

Let us briefly review the characteristics of the priesthood exercised by our Paraclete; our Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the Righteous; the true Melchizedek, King of Righteousness, and King of Peace; our great High Priest, who ever liveth to make intercession for us.

He was greater than the prophets; greater than angels; greater than Moses the apostle, and than Aaron the high priest of Israel; greater than Joshua, who could not give the people rest though he led them into the promised land; greater than David, the man after God's own heart, the sweet Psalmist of Israel, by whom the Holy Spirit appealed to them, and through them to us: "To-day if ye will hear his voice harden not your hearts."

He was in all points (i.e., in body, soul, and spirit) tempted, tested, like as we are, apart from sin: and in that He hath suffered being tempted, He is able to succour them that are tempted.

He is able to sympathize with the ignorant and erring. In the days of his flesh He offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears to Him that was able, mightily able (see Eph. i. 19, 20), to save Him out of death, and was heard for his godly fear. "God raised Him from the dead."

He needed not daily to offer up a sacrifice for sins . . . this He did once for all when He offered up Himself.

Being the brightness of God's glory, and the express image of his person, upholding all things by the word of his power, when He had by himself purged our sins, He sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high.

On the day of his resurrection He was declared by Jehovah a Priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek.

He has entered as our Forerunner within the veil.

Having been perfected through suffering, He became the Author of eternal salvation to all them that obey Him.

Because He is God, He knows the minutest experience of every human being. Because He is Man, and as man was tested, tried, tempted, like as we are, He has a human experience of every temptation possible to man.

By virtue of his own blood He entered once for all into the Holy Place, having obtained eternal redemption for us.

Through the Eternal Spirit, He offered Himself without spot to God—how shall not his blood purge our conscience from dead works to serve the living God?

Having offered one sacrifice for sins for ever, He has sat down on the right hand of God.

Because He continueth ever, his priesthood is untransferable. He is therefore able to save to the uttermost and evermore them that come unto God through Him.

He shall appear a second time, apart from sin, to them that wait for Him, unto salvation.

He is the same yesterday and to-day and for ever.

"Lo, these are but the outskirts of his ways; and how small a whisper do we hear of Him!" (Job xxvi. 14, R.V.).

To our suffering and glorified Lord we owe the outpouring of the Spirit. But for his having put away, by the sacrifice of Himself, sin, which separated between us and God, the Spirit could not have been given without measure, nor could rivers of living water have flowed forth from us.

It is of Him the Spirit delights to testify. "He shall take of mine and shall show it unto you." It is to Him the Spirit delights to lead us.

Very briefly and cursorily the characteristics of the everlasting priesthood have here been partially enumerated. The subject is commended to the reader's meditation, with the conviction that as "HOLINESS TO THE LORD" was engraved on the golden plate on the turban of the Aaronic High Priest, so it is essential for those who would follow holiness, without which no man can see the Lord, to draw nigh to God through the ministry of our Melchizedek Priest. He, our Paraclete, speaking on our behalf to the Father in heaven, is as necessary to a life of holiness as the other Paraclete whom Jesus has sent to speak to us from God, and to dwell in us. M.

Nuns and Nursing.*

"DR. LILIAN HAMILTON and Dr. Félix Régnault have just published a book of documentary evidence, containing a complete history of nursing. Commencing with that of the Middle Ages, and coming down to the present time, they deal particularly with the work done among the sick by the nuns. Without ignoring certain qualifications of the nuns, Doctors Hamilton and Régnault point out how contrary to all rules of hygiene are the rules, customs, and obligations of religious communities.

In the first place, the nuns are untrained and perfectly ignorant of nursing, and yet to their care is confided the most precious of all things—human life. Those Crimean hospitals which were served by nuns were hotbeds of infection, and the death-rate was so high that thirty out of fifty-two nuns succumbed, while there was only one death among the regularly-trained nurses of the English Ambulance. Doctors Hamilton and Régnault cite a case which occurred two years ago, where a nun who had no previous experience of nursing was put in charge of thirty beds!

IMPORTANT QUESTIONS.

What use is there in trying to explain antiseptics to those who do not observe even the smallest cleanliness in their own persons? The nuns are forbidden to brush their own teeth; they can have no idea of superintending the cleanliness of their patients' mouths. Even their nails are neglected by them.

Then there are certain rules of ultra modesty to be observed. It is contrary to order, and only by dispensation of the Red Cross Society, that the nuns are allowed to turn back their coarse serge sleeves and show their arms. Their great collars and caps, too, are receptacles for microbes; but to do without them would be incompatible with the spirit of religious orders.

Some surgeons being unable to effect the disinfection of the Sister, remove her from the invalid. What use also is it to speak to these nuns on the benefit of ventilation, and the necessity for removing all curtains and drapery, when their own rules compel them to have curtains, and to shut themselves within them at night?

Doctors Hamilton and Régnault cite numerous instances in support of all their statements, proving the absolute impossibility of having efficiency in any hospital while in the hands of nuns.

HOSPITALS FOR THE INSANE.

Dr. Marie, in a report on the work of nursing sisters, describes his visits to the asylums for the insane in the west of France, and eloquently advocates, on the facts he gives, the necessity of taking the management from the nuns, and placing properly trained lay nurses in charge. He declares that the subordinates of the nuns of the Bon Sauveur are incapable. M. Andrée Téry, reviewing this document in La Fronde, pities these unhappy girls, who do the hardest and most repulsive of the work for a miserable salary of twenty or thirty francs a month, and are condemned to slave or vegetate permanently in the lowest office.

Dr. Marie states that medical authority is very secondary in these asylums. The doctors, having no control over the religious communities, are unable to introduce a modern and scientific system. Quite recently access to certain dormitories was not permitted, except with the consent and in company with the nuns, who alone held the keys. These nuns have the profoundest disdain for the new methods of hygiene, ablutions, antiseptics; and means for lighting and airing the cells are, as a rule, wanting. A common practice in these asylums is to shut up the poor epileptic or violent patients in a sort of bed or cupboard made in the wall, railed in like a cage, and leave them there—"menagerie cages" Dr. Napias calls them. But, if the Sisters are to be believed, the patients have a remarkable liking for these cages! These little impromptu arrangements do not hinder the nuns from using and abusing severer modes of correction. They have too frequently recourse to handcuffs, straitwaistcoats, and other instruments of torture and inquisition.

As regards food, "The evening meals are everywhere insufficient, particularly for the workers." For there are a great many invalids obliged to work, and Dr. Marie writes very strongly upon this point. There is no need to read between the lines to see what he thinks of the apparent disinterestedness of these ladies.

His criticisms are sufficient to characterize as vices the régime of these religious houses in establishments for the poor and suffering, especially in the amount of work extorted from the patients, the insufficient salaries paid to the subordinates, and the commercial advantage derived by the religious houses.

Spring Again.

We felt no mighty shaking,
And we heard no startling sound;
We did not mark its waking,
But the Spring is all around.
In gentleness and silence
Its loving footsteps glide,
And we turn with sudden gladness,
To the crocus at our side.

Now the sunlight groweth stronger,
In its warm life-giving ray;
And the daylight lingers longer,
Just a little every day;
And we find the welcome violets,
Though we scarce believe them there,
Till they woo us down to seek them,
By their sweetness in the air.

Very often comes the saying,
From the weary bed of pain,
"I shall get a little better
When the spring-time comes again."
And we say, "It soon is coming,"
For of that we have no fear,
Since God's goodness never faileth,
And again 'tis surely here.

Oh, how wondrous is the kindness
Of the everlasting God;
And how great his tender mercies
Over all his works abroad.
Let us thankfully adore Him,
For his seasons as they roll;
Praying for the greater blessing,
Of his spring-tide in the soul.

Samuel and Saul.

The Voice of Circumstances.

By REV. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

"WHOSO is wise and will observe these things, even he shall understand the loving kindness of the Lord." In these words the Psalmist sums up his five tableaux of human life (Psa. cvii.). The track of the pilgrim-host, the experience of the prisoner languishing in his chains, the recovery of the sick from long depression, the deliverance of the storm-tossed crew from the angry breakers, the evolution of a smiling paradise from an arid and parched wilderness—all these things, if carefully observed, yield their testimony and assurance that God is in all events, permitting, directing, controlling, and causing all things to work out his perfect plan.

In all Scripture there is no passage more illustrative of this than the chapters before us, which show how clearly and mightily God is in the circumstances of our lives.

It was the spring of the day. With exquisite clearness and purity the dawn was breaking in the Eastern sky, when three men descended the steep ascent on which Ramah stood, and emerged from the city gate (vv. 11, 12, 14, 27). The group was a remarkable one, comprising the aged seer; "a young man and a goodly," who was the king-elect, though he did not realize it; and a herdsman, Doeg, so tradition states, who afterwards attained such an unhappy notoriety, but was at that time simply a servant in attendance on his master's son. When the city gate had been left behind, the servant was sent on in front, that he might not be a witness to the solemn transaction, which inaugurated a new epoch in the life of Saul. "As they were going down at the end of the city, Samuel said to Saul, Bid thy servant pass on before us, but stand thou still at this time, that I may cause thee to hear the Word of God."

I. The Circumstances that Led up to this Incident.—(1) The asses of Kish, Saul's father, were lost. But they were too valuable to lose. "And Kish said to Saul, his son, Take now one of the servants with thee, and arise, go seek the asses."

But when they left home they little realized how far their search would lead them. "And he passed through the hill country of Ephraim, and passed through the land of Shalisha, but they found them not; then they passed through the land of Shalim, and there they found them not; and he passed through the land of the Benjamites, but they found them not." Three days were consumed in this fruitless search, stopping every traveller, asking many questions, scrutinizing every trail—but all to no purpose.

Lost she-asses! Well, what of them! Let them stray! Yes, but they are worth seeking, not for their worth only, but because the man who tracks them will presently come on a kingdom! Be faithful in a little, and God will promote thee to be faithful in much. Do what thou hast to do for God, and He shall call thee for the highest service! Often the finding of the hid treasure depends on the care with which we drive the plough of lowly labour along the common furrow of daily toil.

(2) By God's providence, which some call chance, the seekers found themselves in the land of Joseph, and there the thought of his father's possible anxiety arrested the steps of the young farmer, and he said, "Come, and let us return, lest my father leave caring for the asses, and take thought for us." This remark indicated a good and commendable trait in Saul's character. On the whole, a man who cares for the feelings of those nearest to him in the ties of natural kindred is likeliest to be a good ruler of men. Would that all our young men and women, especially those who are away from home in our great cities, would be a little more considerate of the heart-strings stretched even to breaking, and the eyes that often brim with tears because the tidings of their welfare are so scanty and intermittent! Saul feared the effect of three days on his father. What would he have thought of three weeks or months without tidings?

(3) Having arranged for the offering of the piece of shekel (about 2s. 6d.) which was discovered in the bottom of the servant's pocket, as their gift to the Seer, the two men made for the gate of the little city, "which was set on a hill," its white houses glistening in the intense sunshine. The maidens of whom they made inquiries, the fact that Samuel was in the city, and on his way to a feast in the high place, the encounter with Samuel himself in the main street, and the tidings that the asses were found, were like so many signposts that pointed them by the way that they should go, till they came to the place that awaited them, the seat and portion which had been prepared by the Prophet.

The Guidance of a Divine Hand.

How evidently a Divine hand was in all these circumstances! They could not have happened by chance. Clearly every separate detail had been wrought out in a designing mind with the express purpose of driving Saul into the precise position where he might stand still, and hear the Word of the Lord.

But if it was so with these circumstances, must we not believe that as much may be said of all circumstances? If a hair cannot fall to the ground from our head, or a sparrow from the tree, apart from God, can we say of anything that it is too trivial to come into the Divine plan? Even let it be granted that many incidents happen at the instigation of evil men, yet they are permitted to reach us by the will of God, and therefore we may as much trace God's will in them for our own discipline and ennoblement, as in those others which are evidently of his direct sending. God's purpose ran through the wicked deeds of the betrayers and murderers of our Lord. There was not a single event on all those fateful days that was not marked on the chart of Divine Providence; and since God is everywhere the same, and the same infinitely, so that we cannot say that He was more present there than here, or more powerful then than now, we must admit that He is still as much in every circumstance of our lot, as on those memorable and awful days when creation herself beheld the scenes of Gethsemane and Calvary with evident emotion.

Let it never be forgotten that straying asses, an unexpected encounter in the street, the presence of a coin in the pocket, or its absence, are all part of a Divine plan. He who has opened eyes may read the Father's handwriting, and take the direction of his path, as though angels had flashed before his eyes to direct him. And the prepared path always leads to the vacant seat, and the waiting portion. The road may be long, and the tax on patience and strength considerable; but the Father never leads his trustful and obedient child into a quagmire, or leads him out on the moorland to perish of exposure to the cold. There is always a destination to which the road leads, and it only awaits the quick eye, the ready ear, and the obedient heart, to detect the things that God hath prepared for them that love him.

II.—The Incident of Saul's First Anointing.—Saul slept at Samuel's house that night, and on the housetop. The Prophet had prepared his couch there with a special purpose, which burnt like a clear flame in his heart; for when the house was quiet, he stole up to the young man, which was pondering the strange events of the day, and "communed with Saul on the housetop."

He longed to stir his soul with a profound sympathy in his own passionate and patriotic longings. He may have poured into the listening ear the story of his hopes and fears, of hopes that had been frustrated, of fears that seemed on the point of being realized. He told the story of his own rejection, and of the failure of his sons. He may have whispered into those young ears his longing that some one might appear at this juncture who would gather up the frayed and tangled threads and work out the Divine pattern. Thus, with careful skill, Samuel awoke the sleeping soul of the young son of the soil, who probably had lived in a narrow, circumscribed sphere, interested in flocks and herds, in vines and crops, in the talk of the country-side, but with few thoughts of the national welfare.

He was awoke by Samuel before the breath that announced the dawn had stirred the leaves of the sleeping woods. "Samuel called to Saul on the housetop, saying, Up, that I may send thee away." Then on the descent at the end of the city the servant was sent on, and as the two stood together, Samuel took from out of his breast the vial of oil, and poured it upon the strong young head, bent beneath his hands, giving him the anointing which designated the king, and kissing him in token of his own fealty. "It is not," said he, "that the Lord hath anointed thee to be prince over his inheritance?" It was

A Great Hour in Saul's Life.

No wonder that "when he had turned his back to go from Samuel," it was with "another heart." The chronicle does not say that he received a new heart; there was no seeming regeneration or conversion, no such radical change as comes over the soul at the hour of the new birth, or he would never have perished, as he did, on the field of Gilboa. But he had new aims, new conceptions of the importance and significance of life, new determinations and resolves. In a sense, though not the deepest, old things had passed away, and everything had become new.

Let us prove this distinction. It is possible to have another, but not a new heart; to be arrested by some stronger mind and inspired by a fresh ideal; but beneath the rapid sprouting of the seed there is a slab of impenetrable and unchangeable rock. The work has been only on the surface, but the dew has sped before the sun, and the cloud which seemed to presage rain has dissolved again into the sky. See that you make sure work for eternity.

III. The Circumstances that Followed.—When we are on God's path, we may certainly count on the corroboration of outward circumstances. If, in travelling by the railway, one questions whether one is in the right train, it is a comfort to consult the time tables, to see if the names of the stations, as we hurry through them, are those which are mentioned in the list. So, when questions arise as they will, when we are confronted by difficulties and obstacles, of whether we are in the line of God's will, it is an immense re-assurance to meet with corroborating circumstances, which tell us that we are right. Is not this what is meant by the words, "I will make my mountains a way."

It is interesting to trace how this principle is worked out in the story of this memorable day in the life of Saul.

The Last Command.

Matt. xxviii. 16-20.

By Mr. D. CRAWFORD, garenganze.

MIGHT we not indeed say of this last that it shall be first? How often have we wronged this behest of our Lord by altogether failing to note that its associations in Matthew are those of nascent hope—hope always and hope everywhere. Lo, this is the Gospel on the crest of the wave!

Take, for instance, Christ's well-known four "alls" in his charge. Far too forebodingly hath the Church viewed these two subjective alls, "all nations" and "all things," when there in glorious juxtaposition stood his two objective alls—God's highest heights to meet the world's deepest needs. Yet what God hath joined man would put asunder, albeit the distinctive glory of this and all other commands is its Divine symmetry and equipoise. "For lo," here is "all power," as God's offset to "all nations," even as his "teaching all things" has the goodly fellowship of such a phrase as "all the days"—"I, the Teacher, am with you."

Here, then, love's arms encircle the globe, and at one stroke this "all nations" in its geographical sweep puts all the maps out. All the world's long alternation of ridge and hollow, island and continent, rolls far away in the phrase, and the map is not yet designed that encloses it; nay, nor the traveller born that discovered it, nor the human mind created that ever remotely conceived it! Yes; the "all" of Christ belts the world, precisely as his light does; to wit, light for all, and light in abundance.

And now note the Divine counterpoise of all this. As vast this geographical "all," even so vast, and vaster, is his "all power." Where, in all this vastness, the human mind would be lost, and the human foot grow weary, even there will be needed this "all power." Thus, God's deep calleth unto deep! The precept "all" is echoed by the promise "all," and, as ever, God's promise o'erwhelms God's precept. Quite a thousand years before the Cross, David had hymned God's power as being seen in the world's remotest isle. But here is not merely God's power in Creation, but his "all power" in Redemption; and that, too, with the ends of the earth as its sphere of exercise. As, then, faith reads these her marching orders, one, and one only, deduction is the inexorable result—to wit, that he will know little of Christ's "all power" who has little to do with Christ's "all nations."

THE CHOSEN RENDEZVOUS.

And now for a scrutiny of this primal and final charge. Note well the Divine significance of the choice of a rendezvous in Galilee. For this, as to its jibe-name, is "Galilee of the Gentiles;" and now, indeed, will it earn the jibe! True, the "Light of the Gentiles" had dwelt there, and what if the Gentile commission will be issued there — so often used with scoffing by Jerusalem Pharisees, how gloriously resplendent now!

For He had met them hurrying back from the open sepulchre, the substance of all his Gospel being in the greeting, "All hail! Go, tell my brethren that they go into Galilee." "Then the eleven disciples went away into Galilee," speeding north with joy in their hearts; north to "Galilee of the Gentiles"! Every step leaves orthodox Jerusalem behind—dark Jerusalem, slayer of the prophets, "which is spiritually called Sodom and Egypt, where also our Lord was crucified." Yes, north to "a mountain where Jesus had appointed them."

There, on that mountain-top, He would point them far away to the great lands yet unpossessed, and utter the command to be passed on from lip to lip down the ages: "Go ye into all the world!" And here, too, on this mountain-top, we know not if there is not a vivid contrast between the beginning of our Lord's ministry and its end. Now, He stands with the little nucleal band, looking out on the kingdoms of this world. Then, at the beginning, we read that the devil taketh Him to "an exceeding high mountain and showeth Him all the kingdoms of this world and the glory of them." A contrast indeed! Alas! Satan knoweth ALL the kingdoms of this world too. In truth, there would have been no need for Christ's "Go ye into all the world" if Satan had not been there before already. He, indeed, the world's enemy, had shown Christ all the glory of them; but Christ here on the Galilee mountain can only point to their misery and blackness. What Satan called glory, Christ will call hell.

Nay, the contrast does not yet exhaust itself. "All these will I give Thee," said Satan; and the blessed Christ in his holy person gives just such a promise to his own. "Make disciples of all nations" is both precept and promise. Surely, this resembles spoiling the strong man indeed; for Christ here not only disarms Satan, but adopts, practically, his own phrase—"All these will I give you." Then the words were a lie; now they leave the lips of Christ THE TRUTH! "All these will I give you, for all power is given unto Me."

THE DISCIPLE'S REWARD.

We have noted, then, the hopeful significance of the surroundings of this command. The Victor Christ is risen with the incentive greeting—"Rejoice!" "Galilee of the Gentiles" is the chosen rendezvous, and that, too, a high mountain in Galilee. The crest of the wave indeed! Yet it is true that God's lovely foreground is ever dependent on his background. As fair and luminous as is the former; so dark and lowering is the latter. And here it is, too; not in some remote corner of the chapter, but hard before our command. "So they took the money, and did as the were taught." The Christ—"God who cannot lie"—would propagate his truth, and that to all climes. The enemy also propagates his lie! Saith Satan, "Say ye his disciples stole Him away by night, and if this comes to the Governor's ears . . . I will stand by you. I will not desert you!" "So they took the money and did as they were taught!" The Lord also proposes to reward his witnesses. They get Himself; He is their inheritance; a salary with abounding surplus and no arrears.

If Satan promises not to desert his liars, will the Christ do less to his truth bearers? And the liars—see how well they worked for their pay. Zealous indeed, they compass sea and land to make one proselyte; and when he is made "ye make him twofold more the child of hell than yourselves." The lie begets many lies, even as Adam senior begat many an Adam junior. This Resurrection-Lie, then, Christ would combat in Person. This is the head and front of all Satan's offending, and its antithesis will be the head and front of all Christianity, Love for the Truth will alone combat zeal for the lie. For, "Lo! I am with you!—this will settle whether they stole Me away!"

Again, let us repeat it: this whole matter of the Gospel to the heathen, "How many are to go, and where?" is surely all a matter of mere altitude. If we live little local lives, then, of necessity, our horizon is contracted down to a few miles. And if, on the contrary, we are up on the heavenly mountain top, then the far-stretching mileage is immense down below. Then ALL the earth, as a lost unit, is in full view, no one part more lost than another, and also no one part more entitled to a hearing than another.

The Transfiguration.

"When they had lifted up their eyes they saw no man, save Jesus only."

No man save Jesus there;
Prophet nor princely semblance marked they then;
But One, exceeding Fair,
More than the sons of men.

No man save Jesus; they
Who soon must weep a lonely Cross beside Saw in transfigured day
The Sufferer glorified.

No man save Jesus now.
Mourners, who watched the noontide sun grow dim,
Abide on Hermon's brow;
Rest there in light with Him.

THE LATE

Rev. Dennis Osborne.

THE home call of the distinguished Indian missionary, Rev. Dennis Osborne, has awakened many vivid memories of the man and his work. We give extracts from the large number of touching tributes and reminiscences that we have received.

HIS LAST HOURS.

The final scene of Mr. Osborne's life is pathetically described by one of his sons, who writes:—"He had been ailing for some time, and went for a change to Bangalore. There he was quietly regaining his health and strength, when, feeling that his work needed him, he started back for Poona. He felt well for a time, but then complained to his youngest son, who was with him, of a violent headache. After an hour's intense suffering, he lay down to sleep, saying that he was feeling better. He never woke from that sleep. He was carried out unconscious from the train, his wife, and two other sons, who had gone to meet him with glad hearts, attending him. Medical aid was summoned, and he was removed to a hospital where, in an hour, he quietly passed away."

Writing in an Indian paper, Mr. ROBERT HAWTHORNE says: "In my journalistic capacity I have had to do with men of all sorts and conditions, but I have never met a more straightforward, conscientious, good man. His wisdom was great, his judgment of men and matters extraordinary; but it was the moral beauty of his character which has stricken with genuine grief, thousands of hearts throughout the length and breadth of India."

A WINNER OF SOULS.

Illustrating Mr. Osborne's devotion as a winner of souls, Mrs. Lee (mother of the six children who were lost in the Darjeeling disaster) writes:—"Mr. Osborne used to hold tent meetings (at Allahabad) to catch the railway people and young men who did not attend church. In one of these meetings there sat in front of me a young man who had run away from his home in England. He had been a wicked boy, and had had a hard life. He wandered to the tent, half-intoxicated, to see what was going on. While Brother Osborne was preaching, God's power was felt in our midst. When the preacher asked for seekers, this young man arose. Mr. Osborne urged him to give his heart to Jesus, and said to me, as we left the tent, 'Let us pray for this young man, that he may be saved.' I replied, doubtfully, 'I smelt liquor; I fear he does not know what he is doing.' The next evening the young man was back at the tent under deep conviction, and became brightly converted, subsequently joining our mission and working earnestly. On another occasion I saw in Mr. Osborne's house a man whom he had picked up in the gutter and brought to his own house to keep him away from the drink. Mr. and Mrs. Osborne nursed him like a child until he left their dwelling trusting in Jesus. This man lived a consistent life, faithful in Christian duty, so long as I knew him. . . . When I think of India and her needs, my heart is full of sorrow, the loss is so great."

EVANGELIST AND PASTOR.

In the course of a long and appreciative biographical sketch, the Indian Witness, Calcutta, says:—"Mr. Osborne's services in connection with the recent famine are so well known as to need no comment. No person did more to open the fountain of private benevolence in England. He excelled as a preacher of the unsearchable riches of Christ. He was at home in the pulpit, and never was more edifying than when expounding the Word of God at conferences. In the councils of his church Mr. Osborne showed to the best advantage. The rare evangelistic gifts which he possessed were early recognised by his brethren, and turned to good account. His services were in constant demand for churches, special missions, &c. But he loved the pastorate, and in that he probably did his best work. We have learned from many sources how mutually delightful his last pastorate, at Poona was to himself and to his people."

Other Lands.

Some Indian Problems.—II.

BY THE EDITOR.

EXPRESS OPINIONS CAUTIOUSLY.

WHEN Dr. G. H. Rouse came to India forty years ago, he had resolved to write nothing about it for two years. Scarcely had we landed in India before our old friend, Mr. Mody, a regenerate Parsee and an evangelist, warned us that if we expressed our opinion one day we should have to change it the next. A missionary of long experience says that he no longer speaks of India, but of his own corner of it. An observant American with a journalistic commission told us that he had made a note to the effect that it is easy to build here, for a deep foundation is not necessary. But the next place he visited led him to a different conclusion. He found his host preparing to build a house, and he had to dig for a foundation through 16ft of loose earth and sand. The old adage applies, "Circumstances alter cases." As the physical circumstances alter in India, as elsewhere, so the environment, the antecedents, the idiosyncrasies of workers differ, and consequently also do the methods they pursue, and the kind and degree of apparent result which they obtain.

For example: In one place the rescued orphans and widows all sleep on the ground; in another, on a raised platform of bricks covered with plaster; in another, on boards laid on the earthen floor; in another, on a roughly-constructed wooden bedstead; in another, on a cheap iron bedstead.

The reason why in one locality it was found necessary to raise the sleepers above the ground was that the scorpions came up and stung the children. Then the idea of the native workers generally is to provide for the children on the lines of the village life to which they have been accustomed, while that of their friends from the west is to lead them on to improved conditions.

INDUSTRIES AND CASTE.

Thus with regard to industrial methods, native workers, and perhaps some others, seem rather disposed to teach the famine orphans the use of the few simple native tools; while European, and, especially American, missionaries are inclined to adapt and adopt the latest inventions leading on to a general improvement and advance. The former say, "The greater part of the Indian populations live in villages. If we teach the use of the primitive Indian tools, those whom we are training in Christianity, and teaching Indian methods of living and work, will go back to the villages and communicate Christian truth and earn their living by native modes of work." On the other hand, it is replied: "If they go back as Christians they will be out-castes and not allowed to work or live there. In a word, they would be boycotted. In order to remain, they would be under the greatest temptation to return to heathenism; though even then they would be in a very difficult position as having lost their caste." The situation finds a feeble analogy in the stone-raising industry in our Purbeck Hills, into which no stranger is allowed to intrude.

India is passing through a transition period. All the various ideas and methods contribute to a common issue. And, perhaps, it is best for each who is seeking the welfare of the country to make his own experiment, and bid the rest God-speed in making theirs.

THE QUALITY OF MISSIONARIES.

For one result of the famines we may be profoundly thankful. They have proved the quality of the missionaries and the stuff that, with small exception, they are made of. Should there be a return of the like calamity, there is no doubt that moneys contributed will be more wisely and faithfully distributed by them than by any other means. More wisely, because they are in more personal, more intimate, more sympathetic touch with the sufferers than Government officials can be. More faithfully, because they could not if they would, and would not if they could, appropriate a garment or a grain of corn to any other purpose than that for which it was intended.

But too many of them have already fallen, for the same work to be undertaken by them in the immediate future, unless their numbers are largely multiplied. This is needed, for their own proper evangelistic work; and if they are to interest themselves—and they must—in the new problems as to the employment of thousands whom the famines have thrown upon their hands and hearts, then their numbers will need to be increased beyond all precedent. Wherefore "pray ye the Lord of the harvest that He will thrust forth labourers into his harvest." But let none pray that prayer who are not willing (if the Lord will) to go themselves, or to let their best-loved children go.

A MOHAMMEDAN ON EDUCATION OF GIRLS.

In the Mohammedan Anglo-Oriental College Magazine (October to December, 1901), Karim Bin Rahman, of Bangalore, propounds "A Scheme for the Education of Moslem Girls." After boldly expressing his conviction as to the sovereign importance of educating the mothers of the future generations, he says as to their religious instruction:—

> In teaching our girls the Holy Koran, while they are still in their early teens, I would not make them enter too deeply into the fables, parables, or allegories, wherein abstract pains and pleasures have been given concrete garbs, in order that they may be readily grasped by not only the philosophic, but also the illiterate, or into its laws, civil and criminal. These figurative portions of the Koran would leave many queer impressions on their tender minds, which it would be almost a Herculean task to efface in after life. I would teach our young girls only the ethics of the Koran—only the very essentials of our religion.

It stands to reason that a book that needs so much careful elimination of its contents, in order not to be hurtful to womanhood, is condemned by its very defenders. What a difference in the remark of Sir Andrew Wingate, K.C.I.E., in his address at the annual meeting of the Calcutta Bible and Tract Society, on Monday, January 27:—"As long as England places the Bible in the hands of her youth, we can confidently predict that each generation will renew its strength!"

THE MISSIONARY PROBLEM.

I have been reading Dr. Andrew Murray's "Key to the Missionary Problem." This problem is surely the most burning question in the world to-day. The tone and quality of the missionaries are far higher, and their work is far more fruitful than might be expected, as representing bodies so little obedient to the Redeemer's last command, and so little enthusiastic in desire for the evangelization of the world, as are the Protestant churches generally. But, in comparison with the greatness of the need, the urgency of God's desire that all may be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth; and the fact that every saved one is constituted a witness of Jesus and the Resurrection—is not all the missionary work but as a drop in the ocean, a mere sample of what the Great Commission intended it to be, and which it might be and ought to be, considering the powers with which God has supplied us?

On the Upper Zambesi.

IN a recent letter, Rev. F. Coillard speaks of the varied anxieties of recent years. Bereavements have been many and keen, and with financial stress at home, there has been much sorrow on the field. The Barotsi Mission itself, within three years, has lost nine members by death, while nine others have been invalided home, leaving but a small staff to man the seven stations of the Mission.

"What is Christ's is ours. It is our inheritance and our wealth—the unsearchable riches of Christ. Are we to be pitied for being one with Him, not only in communion, but also in his work of redemption, and in his sufferings? . . . 'To you is given grace,' said Paul to the Philippians, 'not only to believe on Him, but also to suffer for his sake. A grace! and what grace that binds us so closely to the Man of Sorrows! Oh to know Him! To know always more, always better, 'the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, being made conformable unto his death.'

"People write to me that our religious journals and a great many friends, shaken by our losses, criticise the Zambesi Mission very severely. That neither surprises nor moves me. The scalpel of criticism does less harm than the perfume of praise. It is good to be humiliated. God will give us grace to receive, without bitterness, however severe they may be, the lessons people want to teach us, and to cling all the more closely to the immutable promises of God when we feel human props failing us. Fixed on the Rock of Ages, we can look calmly down on the froth of the waves dying at our feet. God will accomplish his work and glorify Himself.

"For us the continuation of the work is a question which cannot even be raised, even if our most valued helpers abandoned us. We have too profound a conviction of the Master's call. . . . Undoubtedly, the harvest is delayed; but what wonderful transformations have already taken place in this country of darkness, murders, and unspeakable sufferings. Who shall say what evils we have ameliorated, what lives we may have saved, what abandoned existences we have put on the right course?

"One thing that strikes me is that people do not see the hand of God in our losses; people will see nothing but our imprudences. Such there may have been, but why exaggerate them? Have you not in Europe men remarkable for the ardour of their youth, the wealth of their talents and activities, who succumb? Careers full of promise and hope broken at the start. Men who seem to us indispensable, and whom God takes away in the zenith of a blessed service. What names, what facts pass before my mind, and crowd under my pen!

"During my canoe voyage I was absorbed the other day in the Chinese Martyrology of M. Broomhall.* Will it enter the mind of timid people to abandon China in its darkness? What the Chinese, the cannibals of New Guinea, the savages of Uganda have been for those heroes whom the Church honours, the climate of the Zambesi is for us. Show me the map of the world, and on it the corner—a single one—which the love of God does not cover, and for which Jesus Christ did not die! If you cannot, then do not bid us hand over to others—because people die there—a Mission which God has so clearly and peremptorily pointed out to us. It would be cowardice and disobedience. The extraordinary death-wave, a real scourge, which is devastating without as well as within our circle, and felling so many victims of whom the world does not speak, will pass; and how should we regret in the coming day of triumph any unfaithfulness on our part which delayed the hour of victory!"

A party of six workers sails for Barotsiland on March 22 in the Scot. The latest news from Paris unfortunately tells of a serious deficit (over £4,000) in the Barotsi Fund. Romanism in Brazil.

We quote the following paragraphs from a translation in Help for Brazil (copies of which may be had from Mrs. Kalley, Campo Verde, Tipper Linn Road, Edinburgh) of an article contributed by Dr. Valentine Magalhaes—a leading Brazilian author—to the newspaper, Paiz.

IN this civilized, populous, and important capital of the Republic of Brazil, I was spectator about three weeks ago of a strange sight, which produced a profound impression upon me. This spectacle was a procession through our streets and squares of the "Congregation of the Holy Heart of Jesus," composed of many hundreds of women, women only, marching two and three deep, decked with religious badges, blue ribbons crossing the chest from shoulder to waist, or re-crossed upon the breast, medals, crosses, rosaries, &c. They walked on the pavement, accompanied in the middle of the road by some priests in cassocks and barretes, the officials of that sacred battalion. From time to time a voice was heard above the rest chanting an Ave Maria, to which hundreds of others replied in a melancholy and indistinct chorus.

Suddenly a laugh of scorn came from a man of the street, who, standing by, jibed with his rough and solid commonsense at that unexpected sight: "Look at the black beetles! It would be better if they'd go and work!" And the murmuring and black procession continued its winding way.

A friend, to whom I communicated the undefined oppression of spirit which that new sight in the daily life of our great city had made upon me, told me that for some little time past these exhibitions, these pious excursions, have been frequent, with destination to the arch-episcopal palace; and that "sisterhoods" and "congregations" are multiplying and developing prodigiously. From that day I have paid more attention to the manifestations of this social phenomenon—the growth of Catholic ceremonials among us—and I am convinced that it is becoming awful, irresistible, submerging, like a terrible tidal wave.

RESULT OF THE REVOLUTION.

In Brazil, the advent of the Republic, and the separation of the Church from the State, which was its immediate consequence, were for the Catholic religion, which was decadent and languishing in the last years of the empire, a vitalizing and powerful elixir. Since then, from year to year, Catholicism has been growing stronger, flourishing, fructifying, throwing out branches and taking root like a gigantic oak; religious enthusiasm has increased, doubled, and trebled the attendance at the confessional, altars, and centres of miracles; sisterhoods and religious orders have multiplied and grown, the use of the host, rosaries, images, charms, mass books, and other liturgical objects has augmented prodigiously.

Nevertheless immorality is spreading with a consternating parallelism, social customs have sunk to the lowest depths of degradation, the want of shame has lifted up victoriously its impure breast, cheating has spread rapidly through all classes of society, suicides, murders, impurity, thefts, forgeries, lying, crimes of all sorts; indeed, all forms of violation of the Golden Rule, "Do unto others as ye would that they should do unto you," have multiplied terribly. From this fact, verified among us, I conclude that if the flourishing propaganda of the Catholic worship has not prevented the vast procreation of evil, and that if evil, on the contrary, is exerting itself as a direct consequence of the diffusion of the Catholic religion, then the Catholic religion is impotent either to impede the evil or to defeat it.

"But meditating and observing the facts intently, I believe I have discovered the cause of this sad phenomenon. And the cause is this: that it is only the accessory, material, and ceremonial part of Christianity that has been propagated in Brazil, as in almost all other parts of the Catholic world, for centuries, leaving in complete and erring abandonment the essential and fundamental part—the moral. If the opposite course had been pursued, the result also would have been different; but the practice pure and exclusive of Christian morality does not suit the purpose of the Catholic Church, thirsting as she is for temporal power, and ambitious of earthly wealth, and of authority over the nations."

Drink in Hungary.

HUNGARY has been spoken of as one of the loveliest spots on earth. The nation's history is no less interesting than the country. Coming, in the first place, from the Far East, the barbarous tribes pushed their way into the heart of Europe, and there has been a continuous struggle for liberty, lasting through ages, until they have finally settled down as a separate kingdom, governed by a popularly-elected Parliament, at the head of which is the Emperor of Austria, but only as crowned King of Hungary.

And now another struggle has begun among this interesting people, viz., to free themselves from the bondage of King Alcohol. Some time ago, a section of the Blue Cross (the equivalent of our Gospel Temperance Movement) was founded in Budapest, where, as well as in other places in Hungary, evangelistic temperance meetings are held weekly, with excellent results.

The late Temperance Congress in Vienna awakened the attention of scientific people to this subject. As missionaries of the Good Templar Order on the Continent of Europe, Miss Charlotte A. Gray and Miss Fanny Bonner (daughter of Rev. Carey Bonner, of the S.S. Union), came to Budapest to follow up the work begun as the effect of that Congress. In the beginning of August they were able to form a small Good Templar Lodge, and many doors have been opened to them for meetings, at which information has been given as to the nature and effects of alcohol, the curse of strong drink, and the aim of the I.O.G.T. Everywhere the people have been astonished to learn that natural wine, as they call it, contains alcohol. Miss Gray, a lady of much experience and success in this work, from whom preceding particulars of this work have chiefly been obtained, adds that "Literature has been largely distributed (mostly paid for), and there is every prospect of the work going forward if it is not abandoned too early.

"Although at times subdued and almost swallowed up by the surrounding nations, the Hungarians, or Magyars, have yet retained their ancient language. Our work hitherto has only been carried on in German, which is largely spoken in some of the towns, but before leaving the country it will be necessary that everything be prepared for carrying it on in the language of the people. This naturally involves time and expense, but has been so eminently blessed in other countries that we have felt it our duty to stay here until this object has been accomplished, believing that all necessary expenses will be met. Anyone interested to know more can write to Councillor Joseph Malins, Birmingham, who will be happy to furnish information."

At home we deplore and contend against the excessive drinking which abounds, and sometimes think that Continental countries are far freer from this curse than we. It is, however, not altogether so. The drink habit increases in Europe. In one village, while we stayed there, a woman was buried who had been a drunkard from her youth; her parents had put spirits on her bread instead of butter. Next door, on the other side, lived a married woman, also a confirmed drunkard. Everywhere our friends deplored the increasing habit. The sight of a well-dressed matron at a public dining table, with a full-sized cigar between her lips, was a novel but unedifying sight. The appreciation of the men is thus expressed:—"The heavier the cigar, the lighter the lady."

Feeling the need of a more directly Gospel element than the usual magazine afforded, he stitches along with it occasionally The Herald of Mercy, substituting missionary papers on other occasions.

China's Hope.

AN interesting meeting in support of the work of training Biblewomen, which was carried on by the late Mrs. Robert Stewart, of the Fuh-Kien Mission, was held at 16, Ladbroke Grove, W. (Miss Rumney's), on Saturday afternoon last.

After the massacre of Mrs. Stewart, her husband, and other workers, in August, 1895, the operations were somewhat broken up, but centres are now re-established, and operations are maintained with many evidences of God's blessing. Miss Rumney read a long and vividly-written letter from Miss Crumpe, who, with Miss Bell, is engaged in work at Duai-u. It was evident that the educational and evangelical mission of these friends is bearing rich fruit, particularly among the native women and children. "China's hope," Miss Crumpe wrote, "is in its women."

An additional feature of the gathering was the presence of Dr. Edwards, of the Sheo-yang Medical Mission, whose story of vicissitudes and dangers, of sufferings and deliverances, in Shan-si, commanded earnest attention. Dr. Edwards described the isolated condition of missionaries in the province during the recent troubles, and the atrocious conduct of the Governor, who gave orders for the general slaughter of Christians. It was, indeed, a reign of terror. Edicts were issued ordering all native Christians to forsake their religion. The most devoted were ruthlessly slaughtered, and it is worthy of note that the officials and Boxers accepted opium-smoking as sufficient evidence of recantation.

Proceeding, Dr. Edwards gave a touching recital of incessant toil in the interests of the missions and missionaries. One gleam of light in the dark cloud of persecution was found in the humane conduct of one official who, after receiving a command to slay all the missionaries within his power, gave them timely warning, and was thus the means of saving the lives of twenty-six workers. This same official expressed the strongest desire that England should take action against the opium traffic; he also issued an edict ordering his subordinates to forego the use of the drug.

The mournful events of the days of trial have tended, Dr. Edwards said, to a clearer appreciation on the part of the Chinese officials of the spirit of Protestant missions. The rapacity shown by the Roman Catholic authorities in seeking the payment of enormous indemnities contrasted strongly with the moderation of Protestants, and the Governor of Shan-si expressed hearty thanks to Dr. Edwards for his self-abnegation in the question of reparation for the dismantling of the mission premises at Sheo-yang. The Governor adopted a sympathetic attitude in the dissemination of collecting books for making good the damage caused in the outbreak.

A particularly sad interest attached to one of the relics shown by Dr. Edwards. It was the memorial scroll of the young martyr, Wellesley Pigott—a long piece of red silk, embroidered in Chinese characters, and borne aloft at the funeral service—which described the youthful servant of the Lord Jesus as "Heaven's Treasure."

Romanism in America. — "A Wesleyan Minister," writing to a leading Roman Catholic journal, has pointed out that there is a leakage from Romanism in the United States greater even than that which, it is admitted, is going on quietly in Great Britain. He states that in 1901, in a population of 75,000,000, the Roman Catholics numbered only from 10,000,000 to 12,000,000, a proportion less than that of this empire, the increase not having been in proportion with the population, to say nothing of the huge migration from Roman Catholic countries. These statements have been unconsciously corroborated by Father Shinnors, who, writing in the Irish Ecclesiastical Record, after a mission to America, complains that "the number of converts, who are many, is more than counterbalanced by the number of the apostates." This writer states that if all the Irish emigrants and their children had remained faithful there would to-day be in the States a Roman Catholic population of twenty instead of ten millions. Certainly it would bode ill for freedom in the United States if such a development had taken place.

A Consecrated Record.

"Not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called: but God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise."

THESE words find a striking fulfilment in the lives of the two persons whose portraits are given on this page. Mr. John Williams and his wife have, for twenty years, laboured for God in the populous district of Brynteg, situated some four miles from the picturesque town of Wrexham in North Wales. A collier by trade, unable to read when converted, John leaves a record of service which many a minister of the Gospel might envy. We call him by his Christian name, for we have known him long and love him well. Yea, we shall thank God for ever that we met him. To John Williams, through the Holy Spirit, we owe our very souls, and it is a happy task to pen this short memoir of his devotion and of that of his wife. In his efforts to win souls he has found in his wife a true helper, and it was she who taught him to read.

John was converted in early life, and suddenly. We have often heard him tell the story with great power. Invited by a friend to attend a meeting in Liverpool, he was asked if he believed Christ had died for him. He replied, "Yes." "Do you," urged the devoted evangelist, "believe that He died to save you, and has saved you?" This was going too far for John, who went home full of thought. The result was, he sought God's salvation in his own room, and the light broke in, so he tells us, as he lay in bed. The influence of his conversion upon his life-long testimony is very marked.

It would seem that before John began his evangelistic work he had a period of relapse. For a few weeks, or even months, his old enemy, the drink, overpowered him, and there was a fierce struggle in his heart. How eagerly the devil watched it we are assured; but God had begun the good work, and ere long his child was freed from the tyranny of his old foe.

THE POWER OF PRAYER.

He was now walking in light and liberty, and God soon moved his heart to seek the salvation of others. His active service for God had a striking commencement, and illustrates most forcibly the power of prayer. "What things soever ye desire, when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them," has been the motto of his Christian life. His early work gathered round his own house, which he used as a mission room taking down the partition between his kitchen and parlour, and it started with the conversion of at least two young men. The circumstances were these. He had saved a little money and proposed building two houses, one for himself and wife, and the other for the purpose of letting. He dug the foundations himself, and knelt in them asking God to make his houses a place of prayer. For twenty years his house has been used as a mission room, and public prayer offered there almost daily. When the houses were completed, John prayed to God to send in some young men, who should start the work with him. On Sunday evening, August 20, 1880, the writer and four others—of whom one only was converted—called on John, knowing him to be a devoted Christian (the writer was under conviction and eager for a talk). Never shall we forget the look of joy on John's face as he entered the room. He told us at once of his prayer, and asked us there and then to pray with him. Two of us at least yielded to Christ, and thus the work began.

Space forbids a full description even if it were possible to sketch twenty years of strenuous labour. But house-to-house visitation in the neighbourhood was commenced, open-air meetings held, gatherings of colliers on the pit bank arranged for, and aggressive work of almost every kind set in motion. One scene is indelibly imprinted on our mind. The writer was only eighteen, and had pledged himself to meet John, when he came up the pit, and speak to the colliers in the cabin. The latter was crowded with begrimed men. As the Gospel was preached, and the men urged to flee to Christ, the tears coursed down their cheeks and made white furrows. Those were holy times, and we have never quite seen their like since. The entire neighbourhood was roused, and "John Williams" became a household name.

To-day, as the outcome of his work, there is a new church, with schools attached, built in a neighbouring district, and, better than all, souls saved from death are scattered throughout the country, and others already gathered home. As the result of a close communion with God, maintained amid arduous toil, John's personal influence was very great. All who came in contact with him felt the power of his goodness. His zeal seemed never to tire.

A FAITHFUL WITNESS-BEARER.

After his day's toil in the mine, he was ready to walk three or four miles to a meeting, and would sit up until midnight to encourage his young converts. Not least among his graces was his remarkable faithfulness. We give the following as illustrations:—There was a company of card players who met regularly on the Sunday afternoon in the fields for play. John found them out, and startled them one Sunday by appearing on the scene with his Bible. After an earnest appeal he prayed with them, and from that time the intimation that John was approaching was sufficient to disband them.

On another occasion he met a man on a Sunday afternoon who was a notorious Sabbath-breaker. After a solemn warning on the danger of desecrating God's day, John bade the man kneel down with him on the roadside and seek God's forgiveness. A striking illustration of his faithfulness in another direction was his rebuke of the teacher of a Bible-class. The teacher had been to a local race-meeting, and in the Bible-class, held on the same evening, spoke of the presumption of saying, "I am saved." He contended that we could never know, until death, that our sins were forgiven. John was roused, and pleaded that a man who attended a race-meeting was not likely to enjoy the peace of God. This rebuke was well received by the teacher, and a warm attachment between them was the result.

John has been endowed with tact in a marked degree. None know better than he how to deal with men. Take the following as an illustration. Colliers are noted blasphemers (thank God for the very many noble exceptions), and frequently when gathered at the "eye" of the pit awaiting their turn to ascend to the surface, the language is anything but chaste. It was John's duty to see that the men did not overcrowd the cage in which they ascended. So well known was he among them, and so highly respected, that very rarely would anyone use an offensive word. However, one day a stranger happened to be present, and, while waiting his turn to ascend, made some obscene jest. John said nothing for awhile; but, when the offender stepped forward to the cage, John cried, "Men, we will let him go up alone; the rope may break!" It is not likely the man ever forgot the rebuke.

FOR CONSCIENCE' SAKE.

John's addresses had always one aim—a present salvation offered to faith in Christ; and if he often spoke as if men might die to-night, he did not forget that God expected them to live for Him to-morrow. One of the darkest days in his life was when he felt obliged to sever himself from the church of his first love. For many years he had been a member of the Established Church, and by his zeal had done much to fill the building in which he worshipped. A few years ago, however, the placing of a brass cross on the Communion table led to an earnest protest from John. As will be gathered from the above, he is a staunch Protestant, and a hater of all "show" in worship. His protest being futile, he felt it his duty to sever his connection with the Church, and he and his wife joined a Presbyterian congregation in the neighbourhood, where they still worship, and where John is now an elder.

"We can do no other," they said, "it means the sacrifice of very much; but our conscience forbids us to stay, and come out we must." Their action was misunderstood by their friends, but it was characteristic of them both. They have never swerved when duty was clear.

The passage of years has brought a change of circumstances. Mrs. Williams has recently developed a cancer in the breast, and she feels her work is over. With a calm assurance she awaits God's call, the peace of God and the joy of the Holy Ghost being revealed in her face. John is the same courageous, calm, stolid soldier of the Cross. Owing to Mrs. Williams' affliction, the mission room is closed, but the light shines from their quiet resignation to the will of their Father. "God has been with us in the summer of our life, and He will not forsake us in the winter," were some of John's last words to us on a recent visit.

Faith in God and devotion to Christ have been the master motives in these two lives, and when closed, they will still speak (at least to some of us) of a hope that grows brighter as the years pass, and of a peace that only deepens as the shadows gather.

Free Churchmen in Council at Bradford.

ANOTHER year of steady progress has just been reported, at the Seventh National Council of Evangelical Free Churches now being held at Bradford. The number of local councils affiliated has grown to 796, being seventy-six more than the number reported at Cardiff last year. The spiritual aim of the movement has been again abundantly vindicated, the special efforts of the councils in all parts of the country having been mainly directed to the holding of united evangelistic missions. The three special missioners—Gipsy Smith, Mr. W. R. Lane, and Rev. J. Tolefree Parr—have been fully occupied, but only a small part of the ground could be covered in this way, and numerous other workers have been doing splendid service. A special development has been the large number of regular ministers who had not been accustomed to conduct such services, but have done so of late with much blessing to themselves and to the churches.

One of the chief lessons learned during the Simultaneous Mission was the value of parochial visitation, and the thorough house-to-house canvass then undertaken by practically all the local councils has laid the foundation of a system which promises to accomplish much in the reclamation of the lapsed and indifferent masses. Special literature on the subject has been prepared and widely circulated, with beneficial results.

Close attention has been paid to temperance work; and while the National Council did not see its way to assume the direction and organization of the Million New Pledges Crusade, the heartiest sympathy and help have been extended to those who took charge of it, and the local work has to a considerable extent fallen on the leaders and members of the councils.

The King's Declaration and Oath have also been the subject of earnest consideration, and the Council intends to be prepared for any emergency that may arise through the action of the Roman Catholic community.

THE NEW PRESIDENT.

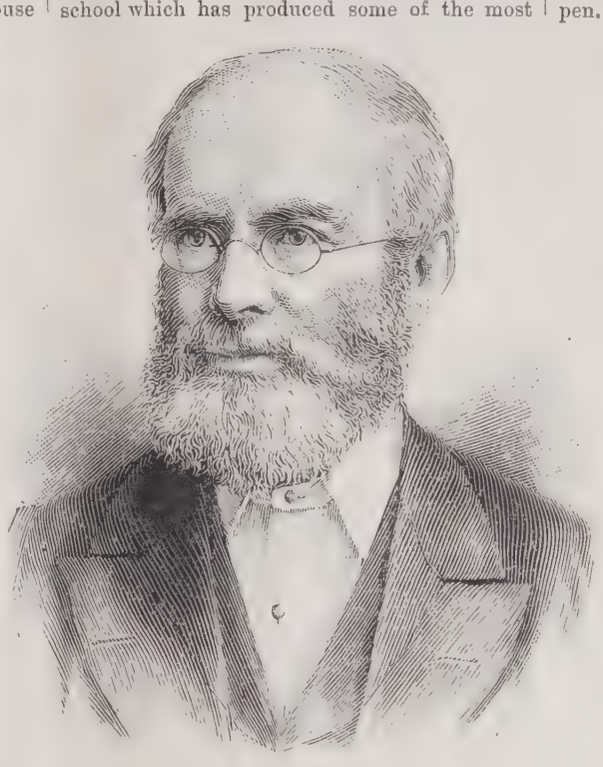
For the first time a minister of one of the smaller Methodist bodies has been elected to the presidency of the National Council. This honour has come to Rev. Dr. William John Townsend, who is probably the best-known minister of the Methodist New Connexion.

He was one of the first to welcome the suggestion of the Federation, and, during the ten years of its existence, has given unstinted service in manifold ways. At the initial conference held in Manchester, in 1892, he read a paper on "The Comity of Missions." The hymnals of the Federation were issued under his editorship. For the Oliver Cromwell Tercentenary Celebration he prepared a popular life of the Great Protector. Throughout the land he has travelled for the furtherance of the movement. Of his fitness and worthiness for this, the highest honour which can be conferred on a Nonconformist, there can be no doubt. He succeeds some of the most distinguished of the Free Church leaders, and his selection is the guarantee of the maintenance of the standard already set.

Dr. Townsend is a Tynesider, having been born in Newcastle-upon-Tyne in 1835. His parents were members of the Salem Church of the Methodist New Connexion in that city. The home of the Townsends was the home of the preachers. His father, indeed, had been a minister, but had been compelled to relinquish his position through a serious throat trouble. Engaged in business, his sympathies and services were nevertheless centred in the church to which he belonged. The ministers were ever-welcome guests. Dr. Townsend recalls many a famous preacher in the home of his boyhood.

When a boy of seven years, death robbed him of his father. He was left, with five other children, to the care of his mother. A wonderful woman she seems to have been. Her father had been converted under the preaching of John Wesley, and had been one of the teachers in the old Orphan Home at Newcastle. He became one of the makers of the Methodist New Connexion, seceding from the old Methodists with Alexander Kilham, the first Methodist reformer. Mrs. Townsend's strength and resource of mind, her high courage and resolute faith, were evidenced, in the way in which she grappled with the difficulties which her husband's decease and subsequent financial complications brought to her. Business tact of an exceptional order she displayed. Dr. Townsend tells with justifiable pride of his mother's exploits in this direction. In the after years she built up a prosperous business, cleared off her own liabilities, and refunded many poor creditors of the earlier loss.

The business somewhat interfered with the education of the boy. He was needed in the shop when he should have been at school. Eventually the opportunity came for making up the lost time. He became a pupil in the academy of Dr. John Collingwood Bruce, a school which has produced some of the most eminent men in the North of England. Robert Stephenson and Lord Armstrong were educated there. William John Townsend had as his fellow-students many men who have since achieved distinction. At one time he was able to name fourteen members of Parliament who were schoolfellows with him in Dr. Bruce's Academy.



REV. DR. TOWNSEND.

At the age of fourteen he entered business, and was thus employed till his twenty-fourth year. Salem Church was his religious home. When still a youth he had charge of its infant class, and in his sixteenth year received his first ticket of membership. He was already a student, making the time he needed for his books. Beginning to preach when twenty years of age, he fulfilled the duties of a local preacher until, in 1859, he entered the college at Sheffield as a ministerial student. Here for twelve months he was under the tuition of Dr. Stacey.

Dr. Townsend was in the active ministry of the Methodist New Connexion for forty years. He has travelled in some of the most important circuits of that communion. Beginning at Birmingham, where he stayed for two years, he passed to Leicester for the two years succeeding. Here he distinguished himself in a crusade against low music-halls, and had the satisfaction of seeing some of them closed. Three years were spent in Chester. Halifax was his next residence, and here he laboured for ten years, serving each of the circuits in that town for the maximum time permitted. A ministry in Stockport preceded his stationing to his home circuit in Newcastle. For a second time he was a Birmingham minister. In later years he was appointed to Sunderland, and closed his years of active service at Forest Hill, in South-east London.

Dr. Townsend has received the highest honours conferable by his own people. While superintending the Newcastle circuit he was elected to the Presidency of the Conference of 1886, which was held in the city of his birth. For five years he was the secretary of the Connexional Missionary Society. In 1893 he was appointed to the editorship of the magazines, discharging this onerous duty for four years while prosecuting his work as a circuit minister.

For many years Dr. Townsend has exercised a ministry in the Press as well as in the pulpit. A voluminous contributor to the periodicals of his own church, he has also published several volumes. His biographical works are well known. Two Lives of the Pioneer of Chinese Missions—Dr. Morrison—have come from his pen. "The Missionaries and Martyrs of Madagascar," "The Life of Alexander Kilham," "The Life of Rev. James Stacey, D.D.," are others of a biographical character. "The Great Schoolmen of the Middle Ages," his first book, published in 1880, was a great success. His "Handbook of Christian Doctrine" has had a wide vogue, and has been extensively used as a text-book. Though on the retired list of the ministers of his church, he has this year taken up the editorship of the magazines again, and has just published in the Students' Series of the Wesleyan Book Room, "The Great Symbols."

That Dr. Townsend was recognised as a representative man in the Methodist New Connexion was proved by his selection as one of the body's delegates to the Washington Œcumenical Conference of "the people called Methodists." At that great assembly he read a paper on "Missions in Heathen Lands." It was during this visit that the Senate of the Western Maryland University conferred upon him the D.D. degree.

Throughout the land Dr. Townsend is known as a speaker of rare oratorical gifts. He is a master of assemblies. With a full mind and singular powers of language, he has all the orator's vivacity and passion. He is a lively man in the pulpit and on the platform, and compels assent by the vigour of his thought and the mastery of his appeal.

He is supposed to be living in semi-retirement at Prestatyn, in North Wales. The soul of the Federation's president is shown in the fact that, since taking up his residence at Prestatyn, he has built a church and regularly ministers to its congregation. He is one of those who work because they cannot do other. Free Churchmen in England and Wales may be well assured that in the new president they have a man who will toil in the interests of the Kingdom of God upon earth till he is summoned to the higher service.

OPEN-AIR DEVELOPMENTS.

The past year saw the inauguration of the National Council's first Mission Van, with the happiest results.

Under the charge first of Rev. C. Escritt, and then of Rev. Jesse Mayo, it visited Findon, Ashington, Storrington, Pulborough, Rogate, Stedham, Lodsworth, Fittleworth, Petersfield, and Haslemere. Several of the places were visited more than once. It is confidently believed that this van is the precursor of a long series, which will prove of the greatest value in evangelistic work among the rural districts. There is no intention of using the vans for the purpose of starting new causes, except in connection with ordinary denominational work. Perhaps the most striking experience took place at Lodsworth. The van was placed on a small piece of land in front of a public-house, ten paces from the bar door, and looking into the bar parlour. At night, from his bedroom window, the landlord talked with the missioner as he stood on the platform of the van. The people came from miles round to listen to Mr. Mayo. The publican supplied forms for the people to sit on. As the missioner addressed the gathering round the van, he could see the bar, and speak to the men there. Perfect quiet and order were maintained during the preaching. The only interruption occurred when a request came from the bar to sing, "Tell me the old, old story."

Last May a circular, sent out to all the local councils, urged the importance of holding open-air services during the summer months. It was pointed out that if all the councils took up this work in an organized way, tens of thousands of people would be reached who are untouched by the religious agencies now in operation. In most cases, systematic arrangements were made for this, and generally the campaign was carried on from the centres which arranged for the Simultaneous Mission.

OPENING PROCEEDINGS.

The proceedings opened on Monday evening with an enthusiastic and largely-attended reception, at which Councillor James Hill gave expression to the sense of true unity of spirit with which Bradford welcomed the representatives of every shade of Evangelical Nonconformity, and proposed for earnest consideration whether the policy of "the clean slate" might not be made the basis of a bringing together of those who differ only on what are merely minor points.

In more than one direction the opinion was expressed that the progress of the past year found its impetus in the excellent gatherings at Cardiff, with an earnest hope that the days to come might be yet more abundantly fruitful, through the outpouring of the spirit of prayer and brotherhood on the assembly.

The opening sermon was preached on Tuesday morning by Rev. J. G. Greenhough, the retiring president. Propounding the greatest of all questions, "What think ye of Christ?" he began by discussing it in view of its presentation to the Pharisees. Claiming that it is the supreme question of theology, religion, and life, he showed the necessity of a kindly but emphatic protest against every conception which makes Christianity a creature of State policy, against every attempt to rob Christ of his priesthood, and against joining in prayer and worship with any who speak with reserve about his divinity. Regarding Christ as Prophet, Priest, and King, it was proved that we find Him pre-eminently in the Cross and in the great atoning fact and mystery. If we do not think of Christ in some such way, our thoughts of life and society and the world are all uncertain. Christ was no demagogue or champion of a class, but the Saviour—King of sufferers, divinest priest, and God's saving power in the Cross.

With expressions of deep gratitude for the experiences of his year of office, Mr. Greenhough made way for his successor, Rev. Dr. Townsend, who, after taking the chair, delivered a stirring and instructive address on "The Free Church of England—its Divine Call." He sounded a great note of hope for the future, founded on the progress which is being made by means of the National Council towards the realization of the Saviour's prayer for the unity of his people. Looking to the future, he saw in the education of the young the most pressing question to be faced and settled, which he said must be done by a system that would heal divisions. Following close on that, must come the subject of the redemption of our lapsed masses, associated as they are with slum-life, which is a crying disgrace to England, as well as an ever-increasing peril to our civilization. Hindrances and obstructions to true well-being must be removed, and definite aggressive efforts for the salvation of the people must be prosecuted, not at intervals, but continuously and permanently.

The Christian Temperance Campaign.

THE spirit of co-operative effort shared by representatives of the various Christian denominations in Watford and by the temperance workers there has been most marked during the inception and progress of the recent Mission in that town by Dr. J. Q. A. Henry in conjunction with the Fisk Jubilee Singers. It has been delightful to find the fact that temperance reform constitutes an integral part of Christian work and worship so well illustrated in the conditions under which the Mission has been held.

Councillor Geo. Longley, treasurer of the Watford United Temperance Council, assisted by Mr. James Freshwater, its secretary, has spared neither time nor effort in promoting the success of the Mission, and these officials have found brotherly and active sympathy in the same direction on the part of Rev. H. A. Hunt, secretary of the Free Church Council, and other members of that body. The Temperance Council is a growing organization of eleven months' standing, which holds monthly and quarterly open-air meetings, each followed by a service in some one of the local churches.

Ministers and their people, local temperance leaders and their followers, have all united in earnest and hearty endeavour to further Dr. Henry's special work. The mission was ushered in and continued with much prayer; and, under the Divine blessing, Dr. Henry's stirring, eloquent, and convincing appeals to conscience and to reason, concerning the imperative claims of a rational and Biblical temperance reform, commanded sustained popular interest for the meetings in Clarendon Hall from Tuesday to Friday of last week.

"A SUPREME INIQUITY."

The cheerful confidence of faith, accompanied by strenuous endeavour, brought many under influences which must tell for time and for eternity. At the opening service on Tuesday afternoon, Rev. J. Scott James took the chair; and Rev. H. G. Button led in prayer. Then came a song exhortation by the Jubilee Singers, to "Rise and shine and give God the glory," after which Dr. Henry poured forth a growing volume of awful, but fully justified, impeachment of strong drink as a universal obstacle to God's kingdom among men. He desired to promote thought, stimulate conviction, unify the forces of righteousness, and inspire recruits to do more for the overthrow of a supreme iniquity. We have no great spiritual revivals in this land and in that across the sea because the conscience of the people is chloroformed through the influence of strong drink.

Faithful ministry of the truth in speech and in song found favour with a large concourse of people in the evening. The chairman, Mr. Colin Taylor, of Rickmansworth, wished Dr. Henry God-speed in the great work which, by Divine blessing, he is doing throughout the country, dwelling upon the subtle antagonism that subsists between organized Christianity, with its spirit of love to man, and the public-house with its tyranny over a carnal, besotted and debauched humanity. Dr. Henry declared that never, until we can unite all the temperance people in all the churches and in all the parties, shall we be able to repress and suppress the ruinous alcoholic habit and traffic; for, as Edmund Burke said, "When the wicked combine, the good must associate." In concluding, the speaker submitted this simple but striking syllogism: The curse, drunkenness; the cause, drinking; the cure, total abstinence.

MINISTERS LEAD THE WAY.

On Wednesday afternoon Rev. G. W. Thomas presided. Individual Christian responsibility touching the progress of temperance reform was again set forth in convincing manner by Dr. Henry. It is estimated, he said, that if Great Britain and the United States were, in proportion to their Christian populations, to send missionaries to the foreign field, there would be 400,000 new workers; but the necessary money is not forthcoming because of the £160,000,000 spent annually in intoxicants, in addition to the vast expenditure incurred in rescuing the victims of the traffic. Christians, too, ought to have clean hands in respect to the profits and dividends of the brewing and distillation of strong drink. At the close the chairman called for one of the pledge boards, and, after signing, said he was more than ever decided as to his position on this question, and, would try to be more active in the cause. It is known that at least one other minister signed against the drink during the mission in Watford, as well as business-men of influential position.

In the evening, the chairman, Mr. Arthur Trewin, said he was there by way of personal protest against the legalized drinking system of the country. Four hopeful aspects touching remedies for the drink evil were amplified by Dr. Henry: namely, growing temperance sentiment among women; the success which has attended the provision of substitutes for the dram-shop; increased legislation and restriction; and the industrial crisis faced by the Christian nations of the world, with the more general conviction that it can only be met by sober, clear-minded men and women.

Councillor Henry Kingham presided on Thursday afternoon, when Dr. Henry's argument was based upon the assumption of what he believed could be proved beyond a peradventure, that there are three things which are never associated in the Bible, and never can be: intoxicating drinks, man's use of them, and God's approval of that use.

FRUITFULNESS OF THE CAMPAIGN.

Including in his official capacities, presidency of Free Church Council, Temperance Council, and School Board, Mr. E. M. Chater, was an ideal chairman for Thursday night. Rev. J. A. Wood led in prayer. The physical aspects of the drink question afforded full scope for Dr. Henry's eloquence as he adduced a varied and accumulated volume of testimony that would be irresistible but that men reason according to their will, and do not will according to their reason.

The Mission was to have closed on Thursday, but by general desire an extra meeting was arranged for Friday night, with Mr. J. K. Riggall in the chair. There were many signs of enthusiasm for Dr. Henry and his work, as well as for his helpers, whose songs gave the people such delight. Dr. Henry spoke of ignorance as one among many causes of intemperance and the necessity for that informing which must transform the attitude and lives of the people. Councillor Geo. Longley and others dealt with a resolution declaring that this was the brightest and most fruitful campaign that Watford has ever seen; and, owing to the early departure of Dr. Henry, Mr. F. J. Loudin replied.

IMPORTANT OUTCOME OF DUBLIN MEETINGS.

It will be remembered that a conference of the committee and guarantors of Dr. Henry's recent mission in Dublin was held on Thursday, February 13, Very Rev. the Dean of the Chapel Royal presiding, and Dr. Henry being present, at which it was unanimously decided to request the general committee to continue its operations, and to make such arrangements as might be advisable to further the work. At an important meeting of the executive committee, held on March 5, it was formally decided, recognising the great value of united action in seeking to advance the moral, social and spiritual well-being of the community, to recommend the continuance of the present united committee under the title of the United Protestant Council. The Council (which will have power to add to its number) will proceed to elect an executive, and its general objects are—to organize and carry forward United Temperance Missions and Conferences in Dublin and the provinces, to be conducted on a distinctly religious basis, and to take such action as may be deemed necessary to bring the temperance cause into active operation in the various Protestant Churches.

FUTURE MEETINGS.

March 13, Bradford; 15-21, Kirkcaldy; 23-28, Alloa; 29-30, Edinburgh; April 1-3, Macclesfield; 4-6, Redhill; 8, 9, Helensburgh; 12-18, Dumbarton; 19-25, Airdrie.

"Our Daily Bread."

SUNDAY, March 16. Genesis l.

THE grave of Machpelah seemed to hold the land of Canaan, solemnly mortgaged for Israel. It was as though, in death, the bodies of the patriarchs were deposited in sure and certain hope that the land must certainly, according to God's promise, revert to their children. This is what is meant by Jacob's solemn insistence that he should be buried there, and by the amount of space given to the story of his burial. He died in faith, knowing that one day his remains would be amidst his own people, to whom the land would certainly be given.

The fear of Joseph's brethren illustrates well the insecurity of a position, which is given only by the tender caprice of love, apart from satisfaction being given to law. As Joseph had pardoned, so he might forego his pardon. No satisfaction had been rendered for their far-away sin. How could they be sure that he would not now require it? Might not such fears have arisen in our own breasts had not the Divine forgiveness rested on the finished work of the Cross? When our Saviour died, He met the demands of a broken law, and satisfied them. He gave an equivalent for the penalty, which we deserved. He fulfilled and magnified the law. Thus God is just and the Justifier—the Justifier, because He is just.

Joseph's faith was shown in another way than Jacob's. He dwelt more especially on the fact of the exodus. The words which were the inspiration of his hope contained the assurance "And I will bring you up again." Whatever might be the difficulties, hardships, and experience of the chosen people, he desired to share them also. What a testimony his unburied bones must have been in that land of pyramids and ornate graves! As the Israelites saw them, or thought about them, they would say to one another, "Joseph, at least, expected that God would surely visit us. Let us be ready to arise and depart, for this is not our rest." Oh, that in death we may contrive to speak for God!

MONDAY, March 17. Exodus i.

What wrongs and sorrows man has inflicted on his fellow man! The land of Egypt, as I saw it last summer, seems specially fashioned by the Divine hand for the happiness and supply of man's nature, but there is hardly a square yard of it that has not been saturated with the tears and tilled by the enforced labour of myriads of slaves. From the earliest dawn of history to the construction of the Suez Canal in our own time, the cry of the down-trodden has protested to high heaven. But let us not suppose that Israel's sufferings are the only ones that have attracted the notice and secured the interference of the Almighty. Wherever wrong needs righting, and injustice needs arresting, there his Spirit broods, noticing all, and preparing deliverance.

How wise was the King of Egypt to begin his attack on Israel by a crusade against the lives of the children. The powers of darkness have always followed this policy, endeavouring to get children under their influence. This has been notably the policy of the Roman Catholic Church; and lately we saw how severe the conflict was over the children and the public-houses. If we tamper with the children we destroy the nation; if we win them, we win the nation. Every tyrant knows this. Herod destroyed the babes at Bethlehem; and in Europe to-day they teach the children of oppressed countries the language of the oppressors, that they may forget their nationality.

TUESDAY, March 18. Exodus ii.

Some forty years are crowded into this chapter (Acts vii. 23). The Divine purpose is hurrying towards the story of the Exodus, and cannot tarry over the many striking and interesting incidents which were filling the annals of Egyptian scribes. But the incidents related on this page, though simple enough, are of thrilling interest.

Good men reproduce what is noblest and best in their mothers, and we are not surprised to learn that the mother of Moses was animated by an heroic faith. She hid him three months, without fear, so sure was she of his wonderful future; she felt certain that the tiny bark in which she placed her treasure would outride the storms that threatened it; she continued her household work, quite sure that God had a plan, and only eager to see "what would be done," and the road by which the deliverance would arrive. That her child would rest again in her arms she knew, but that the Princess Royal should place it there was absolutely hidden. So still, we may trust God with our lives, we need not hesitate to believe that He will evolve that concerning which He has spoken to us; but as to how and when—we know not. He has something in store which will surprise us, not only by its blessedness, but by its ingenuity.

In the begining of his career Moses evidently trusted in the arm of flesh. Learned as he was in all the learning of Egypt, and mighty in deeds and words, it is hardly to be wondered at that he supposed himself able to effect the deliverance of his people by his own right hand. He had to learn that by might no man can prevail. He was greatly in need of those long, quiet years which he spent in the desert, and in which his self-reliance was drained away, until at the end of forty years, when ambition had died in him, when all thought of redeeming his people by the strong hand of his might had vanished, when his soul had learnt to see Him who is invisible, the voice of God summoned him to the work of his life.

WEDNESDAY, March 19. Exodus iii.

"The bush burned with fire." That fire was not the symbol of pain, but of the Divine Presence. In after centuries it was known as the Shekinah; it burnt in the flame-cloud which lit the desert-march, and shone between the cherubim. The bush was not consumed, because when God settles down in majesty and love on a nation or an individual, taking in hand the care of his people, He needs nothing in return. He will be gracious to whom He will be gracious, He will show mercy to whom He will show mercy. Oh, this is a great sight; let us turn aside to see. It is a great sight when God is not deterred by the lowliness or forlornness or sin of his people, but comes down to deliver. Art thou but a poor acacia bush, be of good courage; to thee God comes, over thee He spreads his pavilion, in thee He dwells.

God's name, as given here, is above every name. He alone is self-contained and self-sufficient. There is no equivalent to Himself but Himself. Stand right with Him, and you can face a world in arms. Give yourself to Him, and you have an infinite sufficiency. Pharaoh may refuse and rage; God knows beforehand that He will; but when He sets his mind on a thing, it shall be done.

> The thing impossible shall be,
> All things are possible to me.

THURSDAY, March 20. Exodus iv.

Moses began to look unto himself, and estimate his own powers of effecting the liberation of his people. This is what Philip did, when he stood face to face with the great multitudes of hungry people. He took out his pencil and began to figure thus: "Two-hundred pennyworth of bread is not sufficient that every one should take a little." We all act on the same principle, and immediately our soul falls into darkness and despair. Do not stand counting your barley loaves and small fish, and obtruding the stammer of your tongue-tied speech; but remember Him who brought you into the difficulties which confront you, that, being emptied of all self-confidence, you may become the instrument in the hands of the Eternal.

The unbelief of Moses necessitated the addition of his brother Aaron to his mission, and Aaron became afterwards a source of weakness. The people worshipped the calf that he made. How glorious it would have been if Moses had dared to go on his Divine mission, relying on God to touch his stammering tongue with a Divine music! But his want of faith limited the Holy One of Israel. He could not do what He would have done. Oh, let us trust Him! He can tread down the serpent beneath his feet; He can make leprous hands as white as snow; he can inspire stammering lips with eloquence; He can take lives on which failure seemed written, and make them instruments for marvellous blessing.

But before you begin your life-work, you must be circumcised in heart, putting away all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, and perfecting holiness in the fear of God.

FRIDAY, March 21. Exodus v.

"Pharaoh said, Who is Jehovah?" If this Pharaoh, as in all probability was the case, was named Menephtah, he was the son of a king who had set up his own image to be worshipped side by side with those of Ammon, Phtah, and Horus, three of the greatest Egyptian deities. Perhaps he had never heard of Jehovah; or he asked the question in scorn. This question gives the key to all that follows, in which God sets Himself to answer the question—who He was. Each miracle showed that He was greater than the gods of Egypt, and each removal of a plague indicated his mercifulness and readiness to forgive.

At first the demand for freedom made the case of Israel more desperate. Before the devil goes out, he tears his miserable victim. It was the early spring, just after the corn had been cut. Chopped straw was needed to mix with the clay for brick-making; and Pharaoh determined that these discontented rebels should scatter themselves over the country to get their own. What an awful strain was put on the faith of Moses and Aaron when this took place. Well might Moses pour out his heart in the bitter words of vv. 22, 23, which should not be separated from the first verse of the following chapter! He had enjoyed a brief popularity when first coming to his people, but that was now turned to grievous depression and agony of spirit. But this stern discipline drove Moses to prayer. It is good when a man returns to the Lord, and dares to plead with Him.

And why this delay? There were several reasons for it. First, it drained Moses of the last vestige of reliance on himself; next, it turned the attention of the people from himself to God; and lastly, it gave time for the illumination of Pharaoh also, so that he was not cut off without receiving adequate instruction first.

SATURDAY, March 22. Exodus vi.

God was known to Abraham, in the birth of Isaac (Rom. iv. 17-22), in his care over the patriarchs (Gen. xxviii. 15), in his provision for their needs (xlv. 5-9). But here was a higher revelation, to meet the more urgent needs of the chosen people. The greater our need, the sublimer and fuller is the Divine revelation.

Trials and temptations prepare us to receive deeper and fuller revelations of God.

Let us ponder well the words of this covenant. The people were not remarkable for their faithfulness or godliness, yet God had set his love on them, and was faithful to the promises He had made to their fathers. Count the I wills which are based on the majestic announcement I AM Jehovah, which is repeated twice, once at the beginning, and once at the close, of the enumeration of the seven things which God would do for his people. Jehovah is not only the name for the Divine self-existence, but of God in his redemptive purpose and his redemptive power.

Compare this covenant with the second (Heb. viii.); and take hold of that blessed assurance, repeated in each, and true not only of Israel, but of all the spiritual seed of Abraham: "I will take you for a people, and will be to you for a God." Oh, what a union is this! Indissoluble in time and eternity! Implying infinite resource! There is no problem He cannot solve, no mountain He cannot level, no unworthiness He cannot make good.

*A Chalk Talk.

By Mr. NEWTON JONES.

"Thou God seest me" (Gen. xvi. 13).

THE text chosen for this study is one with which we are all familiar; yet I wish to take it out apart from all its setting, to enable me to give an outline Evangelistic Chalk Talk for young people.

First we must notice that it is a question of God and Me—

GOD ME

God desires to have dealings with me; but the question is, Am I willing to have dealings with God? What does He require of me? What does He know of me? What do I require of Him? What do I know of Him? These are questions worthy of our consideration.

He wants my trust, my love, my loyalty.

He knows me as no one else knows, and is in sympathy with me, though He hates my sin.

GOD SEES Everywhere Everybody Everything.

God sees; that is, He knows me. He sees everywhere (Psa. cxxxix). He sees everybody—little people as well as big folk, poor folk as well as rich people, the ignorant as well as the educated. He sees everything about everybody everywhere. Nothing in our life transpires but what He knows all—every step we take, every trial, and every joy.

Then it is equally true to say

THOU GOD US SEEST

Thou God seest us. By the eye is conveyed to our minds the thought of sight. We have often sung about the ear that is never shut, and the eye that never sleeps.

By the rays of light from the eye is conveyed the idea of vision. That suggests that God sees us from head to foot. He knows our thoughts, our motives, our actions.

What hinders us from seeing God? I would suggest my SINS, my unbelief, my selfishness, my envy, my jealousy. We will put them down and see for ourselves as to what comes between us and God.

GOD Jealousy Envy Self Unbelief Sins US

But wait; what does God see? He sees and gives JESUS—and in his life alone we find one "in whom was no sin."

The chalk I use is white—this suggests to me purity. Yes! Jesus was the pure, holy, meek, and lowly One. Around the letters that spell his name we will put red chalk; for it is the fact that that brings pardon and hope.

He died that we might be forgiven;
He died to make us good—
That we might go at last to heaven,
Saved by his precious blood.

Can we now see God? Not yet. We see his gift—the manifestation of his love; but when we confess, and leave our sins at the Saviour's feet, we shall then know the barrier to be removed, and through JESUS we shall see the Father.

GOD J E S U S US

I lay my sins on Jesus,
The spotless Lamb of God.

God now sees us through Jesus. Where are the sins? Put away—as far as the east is from the west—into the depths of the sea—gone—and gone for ever. "I have blotted out as a thick cloud thy transgressions." Well may we sing:

Happy day, happy day,
When Jesus washed my sins away.

But how does God see me? He sees me forgiven. He sees me clean—hiding and abiding behind Jesus—making Him my continual refuge. He sees us Just, Clear, Free.

GOD J E S U S JUST Sees

Yes, God sees us Justified. What a grand condition! and into what a marvellous position does He bring every trusting heart!

"We must now love Him who has so loved us."

Oh! dearly, dearly has He loved,
And we must love Him too;
And trust in his redeeming blood,
And try his works to do.

* This address should be given with the aid of a blackboard, using white and red chalks, or on a large sheet of paper, using red ink where necessary. The ideas should be allowed to grow as the address proceeds. Use verses of hymns after the various thoughts given.—N. J.

Constancy. Temperance Meeting. (Daniel ix. 1-20.)

IN the schedule of topics in my hand I notice that our lesson is given as Daniel viii. 1-20. I cannot but think, however, that this is a misprint for ix., for it is hardly likely that those who chose our lessons would involve us in the metaphorical and prophetical symbols with which the eighth chapter is filled. I hope I do not make a mistake, therefore, in thinking that the following chapter, which details Daniel's prayer, is the one intended; for surely it is of the highest importance that the most active amongst us, who are working to secure the success of the Temperance Crusade, should pray as well as work, pleading with God on the behalf of those who are carried captive by strong drink.

(1) Our prayer must be founded on promise, if it is to be strong and successful. Daniel understood by his study of the prophetic books that the time of the desolation of Jerusalem was nearly accomplished. This gave him a firm standing-ground on which he could deal with God. Among the thirty thousand promises of God's Word, it is surely possible for you to find some warrant for your definite petition. Take this with you when you go into the presence of God, and present it, as you would present a draft or cheque at the bank.

(2) We must be definite and specific in prayer. Daniel "set his face to seek."

(3) Without doubt, he opened his window towards Jerusalem, and those who knew him must have observed that the door was locked, that entrance was forbidden, that he desired uninterrupted time for the persistent pressing of the request that lay so near his heart. There are times in our life when we realize the urgent need which exists in the Church and the world for specific blessing, which we are assured in our hearts that God is willing to grant; but we hear a voice saying, "For this I will be inquired of." There are some blessings which it is easy to take; there are others, specially those involving the interests of the community, which it seems as though it is left for us to procure by pleading and intense supplication; and it is with us as in Egypt—in proportion as the rise of the tides in the soul reaches high water mark, so the crops are correspondingly rich and far-spread.

(4) Prayer must be humble. Daniel made confession, and acknowledged that his people had sinned and dealt perversely. He lay in the dust before God. It seemed as though he confessed the sin of his people vicariously, acknowledging the justice of the penalties which had befallen them (4 to 14). Who among us, however, could ever sufficiently confess before God all the sin and sorrow which strong drink has brought upon individuals, families, communities?

(5) Our most potent plea with God is consideration for his own character and name. "For thine own sake." What we cannot ask for ourselves we may ask for the sake of Jesus Christ, that the Father would glorify Him. Is it not certain that the drink traffic has done more than anything else to rob Him of the spoils of Calvary, and deprive Him of multitudes who otherwise might have been his own devoted servants? If the sanctuary is desolate, is it not because of the ravages of strong drink? Let us never forget to remind God that the city and people are called by his Name (19).

(6) Such prayer is sure to be answered. Whilst we pray, God hears. Whether the angel Gabriel touches us or not, we may be sure that He who led us out to such intensity of spirit will not turn away from us. Let us pray more, until the mighty hand of God delivers our country from the scourge which is more to be dreaded than the combined evils of war, pestilence, and famine.

"Life in a Cathedral City."—Dear Sir,—A paragraph appeared in a recent issue of your journal (under the above heading) wherein the statement is made, "Every one of the 11,000 families tabulated by Mr. Rowntree spends a sixth of their income in drink." On page 143 of my book you will find the following:—"There is no reason to suppose that the average sum spent upon drink by working-class families in York is lower than the average for the United Kingdom. An expenditure of 6s. per family upon drink would absorb more than one-sixth of the average total family income of the working classes of York." In other words, what you assert of every family is probably true only for the average. There are doubtless many teetotal families in poverty, as well as others, in which there is practically no appreciable expenditure on drink.—Faithfully yours, B. S. Rowntree.

International S.S. Lesson.

Sunday, March 23, 1902.

Subject: Temperance (Eph. v. 11-21).

Golden Text: Eph. v. 18.

THE Epistle to the Ephesians was written during Paul's first imprisonment at Rome, A.D. 59-61. It falls into two sections—doctrinal and practical. (1) The principles and truths of the Christian faith. (2) The living out those principles in the different relationships of life, by the power of God usward.

Profession and life, the outward sign of the heavenly grace.

This lesson is taken from the practical section. Ephesus was a city renowned for the worship of Diana and the practice of magic. Full of the darkest superstition and "curious arts." Paul had his hardest times there (1 Cor. xv. 32; 2 Cor. i. 8).

Rules laid down for believers in Ephesus just out of heathen darkness hold good for the followers of Jesus in Christian lands to-day.

I.—What do Christians profess? (1) To be redeemed from sin to God, darkness to light. (2) Be made heirs of glory, followers of God. (3) To be indwelt by the Holy Ghost (chaps. i. iii. iv.).

II.—What is the Christian's duty? (1) To walk in the light given him, so that doers of dark deeds be reproved, and to walk circumspectly in word and deed, redeeming the time. (2) To learn the will of the Lord and seek his Spirit to fulfil it (vv. 11, 14, 17, 18).

A smile on the face is sometimes the mask to cover an aching heart, but "the joy of the Lord" in the heart makes melody which sounds up through the lips in praise to God, and loving words to our companions on the road to glory, and deeds too. When we have tasted the wine of the love of Jesus we do not care for the vinegar of earthly pleasures—"Fulness of joy" (Psa. xvi. 11).

Poor Cripple Children.

THE work of the Ruth Elliott Home of Rest for Poor Children at Enfield is essentially of a pathetic and sorrowful character. At this useful institution are received "little ones who, through poverty, neglect, and suffering, are doomed to life-long affliction for the sins of those who ought to have sheltered them from harm."

Miss Priest Peck, the founder and hon. superintendent, gives in the annual report some touching descriptions of the operations:—"When talking to the little cripple lying in his soft, clean bed in a comfortable Home, with friends around and toys to play with—when looking at the contented face, at that moment flushed with excitement—how can the stranger know of the wounds which are hidden away, and which are slowly, but surely, wearing the life away? Can one imagine that only a few weeks before that child was in a drunkard's home, neglected, dirty, dying? Surely it is something to take these children from their deplorable surroundings and give them comfort for the last few months of their lives!"

"For months now," adds Miss Peck, "it has been in our hearts to have a permanent Home, where the worst cripples from the most wretched homes may come and stay till they die." The cost of such an institution would be £1,000. The need for a Home of this character, in which the helpless and dying could be cared for, is emphasized by the relation of some touching cases: "In a wretched room in Tottenham, George passed away. The room was home, and was shared by a drunken stepmother, father, two brothers, and a sister. He was a lad who needed the greatest care and cleanliness, fresh air, and good food; and he died in the most frightful and neglected condition.

"Bertie had no mother, and when he died his nurse was a rough boy of fourteen. No one to wash his hands and face, and soothe his aching brow; no one to turn his pillow—a little sick, slum child, with no one to care for him.

"To-day there lies in a hospital a little lad with hip disease; there is no cure for him, so the doctor says. The child is absolutely friendless, and as soon as he has his discharge from the hospital will be taken to the workhouse. Workhouse nursing is not the most tender in the world, and one would scarcely seek love and sympathy there. Cannot we take this little one, and make his last months, or years, bright and comfortable?"

The Cottage-by-the-Sea at Swanage has proved a helpful extension, affording, as it does, a delightful place for rest and nursing. Many poor crippled children, rescued from the slums, have been sheltered at this skilfully conducted institution.

The hon. treasurer is Mr. W. B. Cranfield, 6, Poultry, E.C.

The Late Mr. John Johnson.

IT will be a matter of interest to many people that Mr. John Johnson, for thirty years a member of the Evangelization Society, has passed away. Few men have been more used of God than he, and his home-call, like his life, has been most blessed. There are numbers living and many who have been called home who first learned the truth as it is in Jesus through his ministry—a ministry which God allowed him to exercise to within ten days of the end, his last meeting being at Ranelagh Hall, Paddington, on Sunday, February 23.

John Wood.

Sailors at Newport (Mon.)—A useful work has been carried on for eleven years among seamen visiting the port of Newport (Mon.) by the missionary of the South Wales Sailors' Gospel Book Mission Society. A suitable site near the Alexander Dock Gates has been secured for the erection of new premises. The plan contemplates a free library, reading room, coffee tavern, and recreation room, as well as a mission hall to seat 400 persons. Since the cost of the building will not be more than £1,700, it has been decided to commence building operations as soon as £500 has been subscribed. Communications may be sent to the missionary, Rev. James S. Dunsby, 16, Wolseley Street, Newport, Mon.

Home Missions.

Among the Jews.

A REMARKABLE BIBLE-SCHOOL.

IN the commodious premises of the Hebrew Christian Testimony to Israel, at 189, Whitechapel Road, I was witness, on a recent visit, of a scene which deeply impressed me, as perhaps the most effective method for presentation of the truth to Jews still in unbelief. This mission method is pursued, I understand, daily from four to eight p.m., excepting on Saturday and Sunday (i.e., on the Jewish Sabbath Day and on our Lord's Day), when services of a different character are held.

On the day of my visit, in the large upper room, sixty Jews were assembled, men from various lands, and of various types of countenance; some with fair hair, but mostly dark haired; some with features markedly Jewish, others hardly distinguishable from Gentiles, but all of them of the seed of Jacob. The attendance sometimes rises to seventy, eighty, ninety, and even 100. During three hours, from four to seven o'clock, questions are put by the audience. During the time I was present there was no pause; man after man, Bible in hand, rose and put his question (every man had a Bible before him); the answer was given distinctly and emphatically by Mr. Schönberger, who, in turn with Mr. Baron and two other able colleagues, shares in this special form of service, and gives immediate replies to eager questioners.

At seven o'clock, in the large hall on ground floor, a Bible reading goes on for an hour. Again a goodly company, Bible in hand, listened to Mr. Baron's exposition of John vii. 37-39, men rising now and again to read some verse related to the subject which Mr. Baron quoted during his unfolding of the passage. In both of the meetings there appeared unflagging interest on the part of the audience, no apathy and no lack of intelligence; indeed, it would be difficult to find in a working-men's Bible class composed of Gentiles a group of learners of equally keen intellect. What a rare thing, even in such a world centre as London, to secure the attendance and the attention of (say) sixty working-men, to gather round the Word of God, with interest kept alive all the while!

In the meetings I have described the men put their questions chiefly in the Yiddish dialect; but the teachers speak in German. The Jews would value the missionaries less if they spoke or read to them in their jargon; they would not esteem them to be educated men, fit to teach. The most perfect order prevailed; the men evidently value the time and pains bestowed upon them. The work is on the beautiful apostolic line adopted by Paul, who "reasoned out of the Scriptures . . . that this Jesus is the Christ" (Acts xvii. 2, 3). It convinces the mind, and then the heart is touched by the teacher "opening and alleging that Christ must needs have suffered, and risen again from the dead" (Acts xvii. 3). There are blessed methods not a few, by which the Jews may be reached and won for Christ; but perhaps we may claim the foregoing to be the greatest.

A Lover of Israel.

The "Welcome Home," Canning Town. —At the March muster of the "Christian Lifeboat Crew" on Tuesday, 4th, the text given out by Miss Child for the members and friends was, "They took knowledge of them, that they had been with Jesus" (Acts iv. 13). The mission room was well filled, and the presence and power of God realized. In the course of a brief report of the work Miss Child writes:—"The work, now in its twenty-fifth year, has been much owned of God, and its influence felt in the various ports as well as in the homes of the men. The temperance cause has spread much amongst our seafarers, and instead of the drunkenness which formerly prevailed so much, we have a large number of sober, moral-living men, many of whom are truly converted and living Christian lives."

The Poor of Spitalfields.

ANOTHER year of persistent vigorous work is detailed in the annual report of the Spitalfields Parish Church. The parochial organizations are numerous and varied, and in the face of hard local conditions, a band of noble workers, with a large number of voluntary helpers, have gathered round the rector (Rev. W. H. Davies) and his coadjutors in uniting to alleviate the distress, and promote the spiritual well-being of the poor in the parish. The daily, systematic visitation of squalid homes, the ever-present evidence of struggle, the heart-rending "cry of the children," the painful sight of growing consciousness of inability to earn sufficient for maintenance, have not daunted the workers, who have sought to meet the ceaseless stream of the helpless and despairing, as they plead for sympathy and help.

SUNDAY AND DAY SCHOOLS.

The first institution noted in the annual report is the day school. The average attendance has never been higher, and gratifying reports have been received from all the inspectors, while full grants were earned for every subject taught. The three Sunday-schools—two for Christian and one for Jewish children—have been maintained with encouraging results. The Children's Services, Temperance Society efforts, and Bands of Hope have been pursued with untiring devotion by the workers.

Among other agencies which are carried on in the interests of young people, may be mentioned the boys' clubs. All the members belong to the Sunday-schools, or attend a service or class in one of the buildings. There are also clubs for working girls, mostly from factories and laundries. Various kinds of instruction and amusement are provided for the different evenings, needlework, drawing and painting, music, singing, &c. Bible classes are held regularly.

MISSION SERVICES AND RESCUE WORK.

The mission services at Christ Church Hall, Shepherd Street Hall, Whitechapel Casual Ward, Dr. Barnardo's Shelter, and the common lodging houses, have been faithfully carried on. The women and girls who assemble at these gatherings are the special care of a lady rescue worker, who is always present. From the open-air pulpit which was dedicated in June last the Gospel is proclaimed, the Saturday afternoon service being specially for Jews. Rescue work in the parish occupies the whole time of a lady helper. It is uphill, almost heart-breaking service, yet full of encouragement. In two years twenty-seven girls have been placed in homes, and during last year 188 cases were dealt with. "The Nest," a night home for working girls, exists for those whose parents cannot afford more than a single room to live in, and who are therefore, as a rule, unable to give their daughters satisfactory sleeping accommodation. Numerous other phases of Christian philanthropy are maintained, and particulars of these efforts will be gladly given by Rev. Wilfred H. Davies, The Rectory, Spitalfields, E.

Hebrew Christian Testimony to Israel.—In his resumé for 1901, published in the current issue of The Scattered Nation, Rev. David Baron says:—"When we started our Postal Mission over eight years ago, our greatest difficulty was to obtain suitable literature for the purpose. We have great faith in the discriminate circulation of the Scriptures, but along with it, if any good is to be accomplished, there must be a suitable and living Christian literature created, specially adapted for the various classes of Jews with whom we have to deal—to explain and apply the Scriptures in a manner which shall be comprehensible to them, and which shall bear in mind their peculiar manner of thought, their difficulties, and their prejudices against our Saviour. We have gladly availed ourselves, to a certain extent, of anything useful which we could purchase from other societies, such as publications by Professors Delitzsch and Dalman, and some of those issued by the London Jewish Society; but at the same time we felt ourselves obliged to do something towards supplying a great want by publishing a number of suitable tracts and pamphlets ourselves."

A Famous Mission Chapel.

WHEN Sir Robert Anderson, Ex-Commissioner of Police, addressed nearly 500 scholars from the St. Giles' Mission Schools in Little Wild Street Chapel on March 4, some veterans in the service realized that the meeting was one of the last of its kind which would be held in the ancient building. The chapel has stood since the thirties of the eighteenth century, and a number of eminent men have successively ministered there.

During some generations the congregation was a most important one in West London; and in the vaults beneath the chapel are about 500 coffins containing the remains of those who once sat in the pews. The building will probably be taken down during the coming summer, the site being required by the London County Council, who are constructing the fine new thoroughfare from Holborn to the Strand. The building has been in possession of the mission, which Mr. William Wheatley superintends, for nearly thirty years, and a new hall will have to be erected not far away. While this work is in progress, another building in the neighbourhood may be temporarily occupied for the mission services. A large congregation is drawn together at the Sunday services, this being partly made up of boys who have been removed from bad surroundings, and who are now being trained for lives of honest industry in homes maintained for the purpose.

For many years Sir Robert Anderson has been an ardent advocate and liberal supporter of the excellent work which Mr. Wheatley carries on; and he addressed the children with the tact and skill of one who knew what the little ones needed. He explained that if they grew up in the fear of God, they would be able to confer a wonderful amount of blessing on others. It was further shown to the children that they were happy in knowing what they did about the Lord Jesus Christ; and some had told their parents about Him. None were too young to do good to others.

Lady Agnes Anderson distributed a number of prizes, and among those who received these were two little girls who did not belong to any of the St. Giles's schools, but who Sunday after Sunday distribute Gospel literature in the district.

Medland Hall Shelter.

SOME curious tests have been applied at the Medland Hall Night Shelter in order to make sure that the men are in reality the "poorest of the poor," and are really unable to pay for lodging and food. One night the chairman offered sixpence to the first man who could supply him with threepence in coppers. There was no response. On another night, all the men present were thoroughly searched, at their own instigation. The result was a total sum of only 5s. 0½d. among 296 men, which was sufficient indication of the prevailing poverty. It is distinctly a case in which a man's claim to consideration is not what he has, but what he has not, even as Christ "came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance."

Medland Hall is the only free shelter in London open to homeless men all the year round; 343 beds are provided every night, and to each man is given half-a-pound of bread and butter, coffee being added on Sundays. Facilities are given for repairing boots and clothing, and free baths and lavatories are provided. One-hundred and sixty gallons of boiling water are ready when the Hall is opened, and this supply is continued as long as it is required. Men are admitted at 6.0 p.m., and can leave early in the morning to seek work, and no labour task is imposed, by which men would be hindered in their search for work. This is one of the characteristic acts of thoughtfulness that marks all Mr. Gates' work, and win from men a degree of confidence that goes far to sweeten the inevitable disappointments that sometimes arise.

Some interesting statistics of the operations show that during eleven years the admissions have exceeded a million-and-a-half, while 1,565,874 free meals have been given, representing 350 tons of bread. During the last five years 110,074 men have been turned away from lack of room, but all have received a substantial meal, free. Yet the expenditure, during eleven years, has amounted only to £11,052 18s. 6d.

Communications may be addressed to Mr. E. Wilson Gates, Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street, E.C.

Evangelistic.

Gipsy Smith at Wesley's Chapel.

THE eight-days' mission which concluded on Sunday last at Wesley's Chapel, City Road, N., by Gipsy Smith was an occasion of much encouragement. The historic building was densely crowded, and the missioner's vivid and telling appeals, salted with native wit, made a deep impression. His fresh and pungent way of putting the old truths proved attractive and effective, and he also sang the Gospel with acceptance. Members of the Radnor Street Mission and the Leysian Mission rendered valuable assistance in matters of organization and advertisement, and in dealing with the many inquirers.

Mr. Henry Thorne in Hull.

After an absence of nearly two years, Mr. Henry Thorne has again visited Hull, and has conducted a mission at George Street Baptist Church. From the first there was the consciousness of the Divine presence and power. The Bible readings have been stimulating and helpful, and the evening meetings full of gracious power. Many stayed to the after meetings and not a few sought the Saviour. The children's meeting was greatly blessed to the young people. Both the meeting for men and that for women only were times of helpfulness. This visit bids fair to be as rich in fruit as Mr. Thorne's former one.

J. E. S.

Mr. J. J. Sims's Missions.

In Merrion Hall, Dublin, Mr. J. J. Sims has just concluded a fruitful mission. The services were continued for six weeks, and the interest deepened until at the end the hall was filled. Among those who were reached were a good number of Roman Catholics. Many hearers were impressed by the singing of Mrs. Sims, some being brought to decision during the singing of "The Story of a Hymn." Proceeding to Scotland, Mr. Sims is now engaged in a mission at Perth, where there are signs of a spiritual awakening. At the Co-operative Hall, which was taken for the meetings by the Y.M.C.A., there have been large audiences on week nights, with a full hall on Sundays.

The Boy Preacher.

On Lord's Day last Mr. Jack Cooke, the Boy Preacher, commenced a mission at Dr. Barnado's capacious and popular mission church, the "Edinburgh Castle," Rhodeswell Road, Limehouse, E.

In the morning there was a large attendance, while at night the people began to assemble at 5.30 for the 7 o'clock service. Dr. Barnardo was present at the night gathering. Mr. Cooke spoke with characteristic fluency and fervency, and at the close of his address a number of seekers were instructed and helped in the inquiry room. The mission, which is arousing considerable interest, is to be continued through March, meetings being held nightly, except Saturdays, and on Sunday mornings and evenings.

Rev. T. Connellan in Cork.

The recent mission of Rev. T. Connellan at Cork aroused much interest. There had been much prayer, and Christians were expecting great things. They have been rewarded "exceeding abundantly." On Saturday, March 1, Mr. Connellan addressed a meeting of workers, and on the following day preached to a crowded congregation at St. Peter's in the morning, and in the Assembly Rooms at 4 and 8.30. Each night during the week he spoke in the Assembly Rooms, except on Thursdays, when he was at the Assembly Rooms in the afternoon, and at Bessborough in the the evening. The rapt attention of the audience was as remarkable as the size of the gatherings. From first to last there was no sign of opposition. Mr. Connellan spoke throughout on Gospel truths, and the freshness and clearness of his expositions were greatly appreciated.

St. George's Cross Tabernacle, Glasgow.

This centre of perennial and vigorous Gospel labour, the sphere of Pastor D. J. Findlay's fruitful and untiring service, is meanwhile the seat of a special campaign in which war is being waged against unbelief in every form, and the evils that spring from it. Mr. Hugh Paton is the evangelist, and his present mission is his final meanwhile, ere departing for a season of evangelistic labour in Queensland. On Sabbath evening, March 2, the night on which the present mission was begun, the Tabernacle was packed downstairs and up, and extra seats had to be brought in. Faith cometh by hearing, and some on the opening night, in hearing the Word, with all readiness of mind received it, and made profession of faith in Christ. The week-night meetings are being largely attended, and results are not lacking. Miss Annie Maclaren, of Edinburgh, is acting as soloist, and her capable ministry of song is much appreciated, and cannot but be instrumental in the accomplishment of good.

The Weaver Brothers at Peterhead.

The Presbyterian, Baptist, and Congregational Societies of Christian Endeavour invited the Brothers Bewley and Frank Weaver to conduct a fortnight's mission at Peterhead from February 16 to 28, and many are rejoicing in the blessing that has attended the meetings. During the first week the services were held in the South U.F. Church, and on the Sundays the music-hall was crowded out. Only the parish church, seating 1,800, could contain the crowds the second week. Almost irresistible in their tenderness were the appeals to sinners and backsliders, and night after night there was a hearty response. No day passed without news of conversion. Parents have rejoiced to see their children coming to the Saviour; husbands and wives have praised God together. Peterhead will not soon forget these blessed services, and the almost 200 precious souls whose sins have been forgiven will bless God for many a day for directing our brethren to this Aberdeenshire fishing town.

Another correspondent writes:—

A feature of the mission was the meeting for men only; to this gathering all the publicans were specially invited. At the hour fixed for commencement the largest hall in the town was packed, many of those present had not been in a place of worship for many years. As Mr. Bewley Weaver told the life story of "Bendigo," and showed what the grace of God could do for poor, lost humanity, many were deeply impressed. During their visit the brothers preached twice in the convict prison.

It is three-and-a-half years since the missioners last visited Peterhead, and the fruits of their labours on that occasion abide to this day in the Free South Church, where some of the converts are now serving the Lord as office-bearers, Sunday-school teachers, and in the church choir or Endeavour societies. The secretary of the present mission is also one of their converts.

Edina.

Under the auspices of the Free Church Council, Mr. Tennyson Smith concluded on March 6 a very fruitful temperance mission in Cradley Heath, the centre of the chain-making industry. The building was crowded night after night, and the whole district was stirred.

A mission has been conducted in the Guildhall, Wells, Somerset, by Mr. J. H. Cooke, of the Evangelization Society, under the auspices of the Y.M.C.A., supported by Rev. J. S. Stubbs, vicar of St. Thomas's, and the Free Church ministers. The hall was crowded and many confessed Christ. The spiritual results have been most fruitful.

Wm. Brown, Baptist Minister.

A series of evangelistic meetings has been held at Longridge, N.B., in connection with the U. F. Church, and under the superintendence of the minister, Rev. John Gibson, M.A. The concluding meeting was held in the Town Hall of Whitburn. The evangelist was Mr. M. Peden, of the Evangelization Society. Much interest was taken in the meetings, and it is believed that they have been productive of good.

The Bishop Hooper Protestant Van, in charge of Mr. Samuel Bradfield, has been holding missions during the past two months in various towns in Shropshire and Hereford. Many have heard the truth with delight, and some words of warning were given against the evils of Ritualism. Lantern lectures among young and old on the life and work of Luther, and the English Protestant martyrs, were given.

Mr. Charles Inglis has been preaching at Bridgeport, Conn., where fourteen churches united for this special mission, At the opening services the largest buildings in the city were crowded, overflow meetings were held, and hundreds were turned away. During the mission a very large number professed to receive blessing. Large audiences also attended the Bible readings, and appearances indicate a great work of grace in the city.

Rev. Cecil de Carteret, vicar of Christ Church, East Greenwich, has conducted a week's mission to children and young people at St. Thomas's Church, Wigan. Every evening from 700 to 800 attended the service for those under the age of fourteen, many of the older ones remaining to the after-meeting. The services for young men and young women, respectively, were also well attended. The setting forth of the Gospel message in its purity and simplicity, and the prayerful co-operation of a large band of devoted workers, were pleasing characteristics of the services.

At the Methodist Free Church, Moffat Road, Thornton Heath, Mr. R. S. Bradbrook has just concluded a ten-days' mission. Some notable results were manifested. Between seventy and eighty children connected with the Sunday-school and Band of Hope have signed "decision" cards, while a number of the young men and women connected with the Bible classes, beside many who have been attracted to the services, have made the great surrender. It was a season of deep blessing. The interest in the meetings has been well sustained, and culminated on Sunday week in glorious meetings, when the power of God was manifested.

At the Baptist Chapel, Ridgmont, a fifteen days' mission to children and young people has been conducted by Mr. J. Brown, of the Evangelization Society. From the first evening anxious souls sought the instruction and help of workers, and were graciously enabled to look to the Lord Jesus Christ as their Saviour and Friend. We have a list of both children and adults and young people who have openly testified that they have found the Lord, and are trusting Him to help them to follow and serve Him. Many of them have long been earnestly prayed for, and are children of godly parents. The outstanding lesson of the mission is that the results are in proportion to the preparation and prayer which precede the effort.

C.

Six days of special services, consisting of Bible talks to Christians, meetings for children, lantern lectures, and evangelistic addresses, have just been conducted at Castle Street Chapel, Calne, Wilts, by Rev. James Sprunt, closing on Friday last. Mr. Sprunt won the confidence and affection of his hearers from the first, and by his attractive preaching and singing of the Gospel made his meetings increasingly interesting and helpful. Some fruit has already been gathered, and good and gracious results will undoubtedly follow. It was the occasion of much regret that it was not possible to continue these services for a longer time. Mr. Sprunt is visiting several churches in connection with the Wilts and East Somerset Baptist Association.

Requests for Prayer.

For blessing on the Metropolitan Railway men's meetings on March 19 and 26 at Paddington Baths Hall, W.

For a mission to children at Dunn Street Mission, Dalston, March 16-23, to be conducted by Mr. C. Dudley Smith.

For the Ipswich monthly "Keswick" meetings, April 17; speaker, Rev. John Wilkinson, Mildmay Mission to Jews.

For a fortnight's mission among railway men at Doncaster, commencing March 16, by Mr. A. T. Towers, of the Evangelization Society.

Mr. W. S. Caine, M.P., at Crouch End, N.

On Sunday evening a very fine audience assembled in the capacious Opera House to a Gospel Temperance meeting at which Mr. Caine was announced to speak. The building was crammed, and the speaker was at his best. The local churches had closed their services earlier than usual, so that by eight o'clock not a seat was to be had.

Mr. J. E. Kirby, who presided, struck a clear note in explaining the purpose of the meeting, and Mr. Caine's was a masterly and eloquent presentation of facts and figures which themselves formed a sufficiently impressive plea for total abstinence. The conveners of the gathering were naturally much encouraged at the interest evinced in such a practical form, especially as the religious character of the meeting had been clearly advertised.

The occasion suggests, among other reflections, how much might be done to bring under the sound of the Gospel the crowds who swarm along the Broadway on Sunday evenings, whom the local churches, with all their earnestness and labour, fail to reach.

At the close of Mr. Caine's appeal, opportunity was afforded for pledge-taking; and we ardently hope that the stimulus given to those already interested in temperance reform in the locality may bear practical result in a cohesion of forces to watch and oppose the attempts of the devotees of the liquor traffic to foist new sources of temptation upon the neighbourhood, which is already liberally supplied with inducements to drink. Almost opposite the Opera House itself is a corner site, now being built upon, which it will need all the energy of local reformers to prevent being converted into a licensed pitfall.

Welsh Notes.

The Roman Catholics are showing considerable activity in Barmouth. As a result of a recent mission, some Nonconformists have become Papists. Other means of attracting Protestants are also being employed.

The interesting statement is made that Llanuwchllyn, near Bala, gave no less than fifty of its sons to the sacred calling of the ministry of the Gospel during the nineteenth century. As Llanuwchllyn is only a village, it is probable that this record is not equalled in the United Kingdom. Several of "the fifty" became ministers of eminence.

The tendency amongst the religious bodies of the Principality is to raise the standard of ministerial education. This has been done by the Congregationalists. This measure has had an unexpected result; many candidates for the ministry avoid the collegiate course, and enter the ministry without training of any kind.

Irish Notes.

The Dublin branch of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children is doing a good work, and last year dealt with nearly 1,500 cases, involving the welfare of about 5,000 children. As a rule, drink is the cause of the neglect and cruelty from which children suffer.

During the past year the Belfast Prison Gate Mission for Men substantially helped fifty-one out of sixty-two discharged prisoners; thirty-six others obtained employment before they left the home; 115 other discharged prisoners came to the home for a free breakfast, and were there spoken to about spiritual matters. The Mission opens its doors to any ex-prisoner willing to accept the food and shelter, and do the work the committee can offer. It is to be regretted that the Mission, which is doing so necessary and beneficent a work, should have to close the year in debt.

Under the auspices of the Irish Church, a new organization—a women's workers' society—has been formed in Belfast, and has for its object the helping of the Church in every way in its power. A commodious house has been taken in a healthy locality, and two ladies have made themselves responsible for the rent and furnishing. A lady superintendent, who has much experience of similar work in London and other places, has been appointed, and ladies coming into residence will be expected to pay £36 a year each. In a rapidly increasing population, such as that which is in Belfast, Christian ladies can find much useful and important work to do.

About Books.

THE BOOK OF PSALMS.

Of all the many volumes making up the famous "Cambridge Bible for Schools," none are more thorough in treatment, and rich in contents, than the three in which the Book of Psalms is dealt with. From time to time, as the volumes have appeared, we have indicated their character, acknowledging their compact scholarship, though regretting the extent to which the critical spirit is sometimes indulged. Happily, the plan of the series has favoured general utility rather than fruitless speculation; and the fact that the work on the Psalms has been executed by Dr. Kirkpatrick, general editor of the series, and Regius Professor of Hebrew, is a guarantee of comprehensiveness and scrupulous care throughout.

The work being now completed, the Syndics of the University Press have considered means for its extended usefulness. For such a book there is bound to be a demand distinct from the series to which it belongs; so an edition has been published in a single substantial volume of 960 pages. The page is larger than in the separate volumes, and a thinner paper used. The title remains the same—The Book of Psalms, with Introduction and Notes. (6s. net. Cambridge University Press Warehouse). The introduction is set out in eleven chapters, remarkable for their range of topic and clearness of statement. The notes are expository and practical, philological and critical—the whole being admirably digested and arranged. There is no work with which this can be compared; whatever may be one's special point of view, one finds help and direction in these pages.

EARLY CHURCH HISTORY.

Among modern writers on Church History, Dean Spence holds a place all his own. Whether the narrative involves personal questions or doctrinal peculiarities, spiritual aims or political difficulties, his pen is that of a ready writer, able to present the issue in a manner that shall interest the instructed, and be easily understood by the uneducated reader. His popular work on Christianity in England was recognised as of great value; and now he gives us a book which will fully sustain his reputation—Early Christianity and Paganism.

Here we have, related once more, the story of the Church of Christ during the first four centuries—the story of the conflict with Paganism, with its victorious sequel under Constantine the Great. The book is no mere rehearsal of familiar incidents; of course these are given, but they are presented in the light of the latest information, and as illustrated and explained by the most recent disvoveries and discussions on a singularly fascinating period of Church history. The stories of martyrdom are outlined in sympathetic detail, and the relation of early records to Christian doctrine is pointed out in a very instructive manner. In a word, the work sets forth the true nature of the struggle with Paganism; the intense faith and infinite endurance which carried the Church through untold sufferings to her ultimate triumph; the religious feeling which imbued some of her sternest persecutors; the internal dissensions which threatened her life, and the large-hearted piety which conquered those dissensions.

Writing of the faith and teaching of the Church of the earliest days, Dean Spence says with truth:—"One voice proceeds from the Christian communities of each of the great centres of the ancient Church, from Antioch and Alexandria, from Smyrna and from Rome, in the utterances of Ignatius and Barnabas, of Polycarp and Clement. The more famous early teachers, it is true, appealed rarely to written words, for they had heard the living voice of the Apostles of the Lord. But their teaching is based entirely upon those discourses and actions of the Lord which we find recorded in the Gospels, and upon no others. It is also evident that at least the great majority of the Epistles of S. Paul, S. James, S. Peter, and S. John contained in our New Testament Canon were known to them; and upon these Epistles, and no others, and upon the words and acts of the Lord above referred to, they based their teaching and formulated their creed; a changeless teaching, and a creed which, from the first days, has been the heritage of the Catholic Church. Thus, in its strange grand unity, the Christian Church, in each of its important centres in Asia, Africa, and Europe, during the last decade of the first and the early decades of the second century, taught the same faith, told the same wondrous story, basing faith and story upon the same traditions oral and written, the traditions enshrined in the Gospels and Epistles of the New Testament."

One feature of this book is its evident honesty. Dean Spence is no echo of other writers; here he sometimes disappoints expectation. Occasionally he speaks with reserve where he might have delivered a more decided judgment. Yet he has given us a very helpful book. The illustrations deserve commendation. They are all pertinent to the work, and of high merit from an artistic point of view.

* Early Christianity and Paganism. A.D. 64, to the Peace of the Church in the Fourth Century. A Narrative mainly based upon Contemporary Records and Remains. By H. Donald M. Spence, D.D., Dean of Gloucester. (Many illustrations. 18s. nett. Cassells.)

An interesting study in certain aspects of the life and character of our Lord is given in The Schools and Schoolmasters of Christ, by Joseph Farquharson. (2s. 6d. A. H. Stockwell.)

The simple verse contained in City Songs, by Thomas Burns (3s. 6d. T. French Downie), will bring a warm glow into the heart of the burdened reader and lift thoughts for the time above the cares of earth.

Packet ten of Gospel Leaves (6d. Drummond's Tract Depot, Stirling) contains 100 assorted (sixteen kinds), by Cheyne Brady and Constance Cheyne Brady—each well illustrated, and all thoroughly scriptural.

Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co. have included in their series of popular books constituting the Minerva Library, the Letters and Speeches of Cromwell, by Thos. Carlyle—a work of high historic and literary interest. (2s.)

Messrs. Wells Gardnr, Darton & Co. have added to their midget series a bright little volume on the Metropolis—The Midget London. (1s.) There are many illustrations, and the general contents are interesting and useful.

All About Christmas; or, Christmas in the Olden Times. By Margaret W. Rudd. (6d. nett. A. H. Stockwell.) Here are diverting chapters on the fires and fare, gifts and games, also the decorations, superstitions, and carols of Christmas.

New editions of Only a Dog, The Life of an Elephant, and The Life of a Bear (1s. each. Seeley & Co.) will be welcomed by parents and others seeking healthy reading for children. They form part of an excellent series of books.

An urgent plea for fresh enthusiasm is made by Rev. John W. Veevers in The Mobilization of British Abstainers. (2s. 6d. A. H. Stockwell). The author believes that the work will only be done by "optimistic workers—full of hopefulness and earnestness."

The "purpose" with which Esther Alington (1s. Ideal Publishing Union) has been written by Rose Harrison, hon. organizing secretary of the Children's Protection League, is a good one; and the book deserves a warm welcome among temperance stories.

The third edition of A Comprehensive Guide Book to Natural, Hygienic, and Humane Diet (1s. 6d. net. Ideal Publishing Union) will solve the difficulties of any who are in doubt about the simplicity or practicability of a vegetarian life. The book is a compendium of information useful for all.

We commend to the special notice of Christian workers a useful tool in The Soul Winner's Guide, a book-marker woven in colours on silk. Its object is to provide ready at hand references to a selection of passages suited to ten separate classes who are commonly met in personal dealing; and the purpose is exceedingly well served. (9d. post free. T. M. Wintle, Pontymoile, Pontypool, Mon.)

The new edition, for 1902, of that admirable compendium of useful information, The Annual Charities Register and Digest, is marked by all the completeness and painstaking care which characterized its predecessors. Mr. C. S. Loch's elaborate introduction, which is, indeed, a comprehensive treatise on the principles and administration of charitable relief, has been well revised and brought up to date. (4s. Longmans.)

The Old Testament Narrative for Schools: Compiled in the Words of the Authorized Version. By Marcus Dods, M.A., assistant master at the Edinburgh Academy. (2s. 6d. Nelsons.) This work is the product of care and judgment. By occasional verbal omissions, and freeing the record from repetitions, a book has been prepared which is in every way suited for the purpose designed. Sectional headings are given, and there are useful maps. The late Bishop of Calcutta (Dr. Welldon) writes a commendatory preface.

The tenth part (2s. 6) of the Oxford Hebrew and English Lexicon of the Old Testament, based on the work of Gesenius, and edited by Professor Francis Brown, with the co-operation of Professors Driver and Briggs, brings us well into the letters Qoph, and therefore within sight of the end. For fulness this work leaves nothing to be desired. Important words are treated in concordantial detail, and references to sources of further information are frequent and of great value. The Biblical Aramaic is to be dealt with in an Appendix, so that the work is likely to be completed in two or three more parts.

"I will sow them among the people; and they shall remember ME in far countries."

Dear Readers of The Christian,

The severities and apparent inertia of Winter are over and gone. Now the voice of Spring calls for the great annual awakening! Through all the vegetable World begins to course the promise and hope of leaf and flower and fruit. Animate nature responds with quickened impulse to the mysterious summons.

In the slums of our great towns the stir is also felt. The advance guard of tramps and beggars, crowded for Winter in squalid quarters, will soon cautiously venture countrywards, and with the establishment of warm, dry weather, the swarming will begin!

We too, toiling, and not in vain, all through the Winter months (rescuing, testing, training and teaching), welcome the hour so close at hand, to man the emigrant ship with the fruits of our labour.

Bands of fine, manly fellows, Boys (little and big), and older Youths, are now ready and eager to go forth to try for themselves the experiment of life on distant shores.

I hope I may be able to send away to Canada 300 Boys this month; and perhaps 350 Girls and 500 more Boys at later dates this year. Last year, through the generous ministry of God's stewards, 1,013 were successfully emigrated.

To give these youngsters a fresh start in life is the great aim I have now before me. On no part of our work for the Children has our Heavenly Father more unmistakably set the seal of His approval and blessing than upon our scheme of well-organised emigration. Every one of these would-be emigrants was originally rescued, through the co-operation of God's servants, from abject and even degrading destitution and vicious surroundings—not merely from decent penury! Every one of them was originally an unwanted item in the population of Great Britain! What chance would they have had in the Old Country if they had been left unrescued? They were once holden in the miry clay of pauperism and degradation. And it may be truly added that they have been by God's mercy brought up and out, and that now by emigration their feet will be set upon the rock of respectability and usefulness in the new country! Not a few have also, I verily hope and believe, become children of God "by faith in Jesus Christ," and their feet rest firmly on the Rock of Ages.

See what Emigration has done for their predecessors, and, may I not also add, done for England, and for the Homes! Nearly 13,000 have been saved for life by becoming young colonists! Yes! Emigration saves the Emigrants, for it has been proved that over 98 per cent. become independent and successful citizens in the land of their adoption. Then Emigration is also a cure for the ills of overcrowding and hopeless pauperism in the Mother Country. If populations were more equalised, the old civilizations would be cured of half their ills! Emigration splendidly supplies what the sparsely peopled Colonies are craving for: it blesses not merely the land that gives but also that which takes And from the Institutional standpoint, Emigration clears our exits in the most hopeful fashion, and gives breathing space to our crowded hives, thereby enabling us to rescue more!

This year, even more than last, there bids fair to be a wholly unprecedented demand in Canada for these trained youngsters of mine. The whole of the party are already bespoken. The tide of Prosperity has risen to a high level throughout Canada. Moreover, the Dominion, in her splendid loyalty to the Mother Country, has liberally sent her sons to South Africa, and she wants to train new and younger workers to fill their places by-and-by.

There is no doubt, indeed, that both Canadian and Australian loyalty owes much of its force and its eager spontaneity to my young colonists. Thus your beneficence in former years, expended in giving my Waif and Orphan Boys and Girls happy homes beyond the seas, has already yielded magnificent interest. It has helped to draw the Colonies closer in bonds of blood-brotherhood to the Old Land, and has cemented the unity of our great Empire at a serious crisis. Twelve thousand six hundred colonists placed out by these Homes, must, in the course of thirty-five years, have exerted no mean influence on the public sentiment of Canada, Australia, and New Zealand!

But the urgent, pressing question is—Shall these 300 go?

It would be a thousand pities to detain them on the threshold of their brighter fortunes! Yet the answer really lies with you and not with me! For this year my poverty is greater, and my responsibilities heavier, than perhaps ever before. 5,500 Waif Children are to-day under my care, and 60 new admissions is the weekly tale. So on many grounds I ask for your hearty and generous co-operation; above all, however, on the ground that this is Christ's Work among His Little Ones, and that your sympathies have in the past been actively engaged in this definite service for Him.

£10 will pay the total expense of outfitting and emigrating One Boy to Ontario; £12 is needed to send one Youth to Manitoba. But any gift, however small, will be gratefully acknowledged by our Treasurer, Mr. William Fowler; by our Chairman of Council, Mr. Howard Williams; by our Bankers, London and South Western Bank and Messrs. Prescott, Dimsdale and Co.: or by

Yours very faithfully in Christ's cause among the Children,

Thos. J. Barnardo.

China's Opium Curse.

EARNEST efforts are being made to bring to the notice of Parliament once more its grave duty in respect to the importing of opium into China from India. The Archbishop of Canterbury has forwarded an appeal to Lord Salisbury on the matter, the signatories representing the Church of England, the Church of Ireland, the Free Church of Scotland, the Congregational, Baptist, Presbyterian, and Methodist Churches, and the Society of Friends, as well as members of both Houses of Parliament. The appeal points out that British action in respect of the importation of opium into China has had disastrous results in injury to other branches of British commerce, and in generating profound feelings of hostility to British subjects and interests in the mind of the Chinese people; that the use of opium is a vast national curse is proved by the testimony of Chinese statesmen, and it is unworthy of a great Christian Power to be interested in any degree in its supply to China.

There can be no doubt that within recent years the consumption of opium in China has enormously increased, and that its use has become almost universal. If the feeling created by the traffic were realized at home with the same depth and keenness that characterize it in China, the country would soon be rid of its oppressive burden. Appalling, indeed, to the conscience of our nation must be the thought that Chinese missions are thwarted by actions and influences chargeable upon Christian peoples.

Cambridge Notes.

[FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT.]

THE Bishop of Liverpool (Dr. Chavasse) preached the University sermon last Sunday. His subject was—The Relation of the Church to Social Questions. He took as his text, St. Luke xii. 13-15. Christ, he said, did not come as a Social Reformer to purify a corrupt society, but as the Revealer of his Father, to unfold the character of God, and to teach men his will. Yet He did not leave social questions untouched. Within the compass of his far-reaching life and words lie the great principles which must guide all social reform, if it is to be crowned with final success.

Dr. Chavasse observed that it has often been noticed that the great religious movement of the eighteenth century brought back to the Church the sense of personal responsibility to God; that the great movement of the nineteenth century brought back the sense of corporate action. It is left for the coming movement of the twentieth century to bring back the duty of personal service.

The Y.M.C.A.

THE work of the Durban Association, which was put in abeyance by difficulties arising out of the war, has been re-started under promising circumstances.

The Wimbledon Association held its twenty-sixth annual meeting on the 3rd inst., when Mr. H. W. Maynard occupied the chair. The report for the year, presented by Mr. H. G. Lomer, showed great usefulness in the various departments of association work. Mr. Albert A. Head, the hon. treasurer, spoke in high terms of the work accomplished; and addresses were also given by Rev. E. W. Moore and Mr. W. H. Mills.

The new rooms of the Accrington Association were publicly opened on Saturday, March 1, by the Mayor (Mr. Councillor James Cunliffe), who spoke in high appreciation of the work. Mr. W. Tattersall, J.P., President of the Blackburn Association, presided, and addresses were also given by Mr. A. K. Yapp (National Council), and others. All the paper-hanging, painting, gas-fitting, and joinery has been done by the members of the association free of charge.

The Housing Problem.—With a view to spreading information as to the terrible conditions of overcrowded industrial centres and possible measures of relief, and also to arouse the national conscience on the question, Mr. Budgett Meakin is arranging to deliver a series of illustrated lectures next winter, principally in the Metropolitan suburbs. Any who would assist in making arrangements in their locality—the expenses of which are guaranteed—are invited to communicate with Mr. Meakin at 21, Heath Hurst Road, Hampstead.

Church of England.

The Earl of Derby has given a site for a new vicarage for St. John's parish, Radcliffe, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners have made a grant of £500 towards the cost of building.

St. Paul's Cathedral will be electrically illuminated for the first time on March 29. The cost, £10,000, it is understood, has been borne by Mr. Pierpont Morgan, the American financier.

Rev. Campbell T. Payne, who has been appointed vicar of St. Andrew's, Newington, will maintain the Evangelical traditions of the church. He has done excellent service in one of the poorest parishes of London.

The five Wycliffe Preachers who recently served terms of imprisonment with hard labour for an alleged obstruction in a Protestant open-air demonstration at Slough, were greeted with enthusiasm on their release from Reading gaol, and subsequently addressed a large gathering at Slough in an open space lent for the occasion. Mr. John Kensit had written to the Home Secretary complaining of the sentence of hard labour, but Mr. Ritchie had declined to interfere.

Congregational.

At the annual assembly of the Lancashire Congregational Union, at Wigan, on Thursday last, Rev. Thomas Willis, general secretary, stated that a gift of £2,500 had been received from Col. W. W. Pilkington, of St. Helen's.

Temporary services in connection with the proposed new church at Herne Hill are being held on Sunday evenings at Casino House, a mansion nearly opposite to the site, the use of which has been kindly granted by the Dulwich College trustees.

The new church at Mortlake replaces the old building which was erected in 1716, and used for the last time at the watch-night service on December 31 last. An interesting booklet has been issued, giving a history of the church from 1662 to the present date. The new church, which is the only Nonconformist place of worship in the parish, is a handsome building, situated in a central position.

Rev. Robert A. Betts, of Kew, Melbourne, will represent the Congregational Union of Victoria, of which he is moderator, at the forthcoming annual assembly of the Congregational Union of England and Wales. Proposals submitted by Rev. Dr. Bevan are under consideration for the union of the various States' unions in one Congregational union for Australasia and its affiliation for home mission purposes with the Colonial Missionary Society.

This year a new rule comes into operation for the nomination of the chairman of the Congregational Union, and the 15th inst. is the last day when nominations can be received. The new rule, which was adopted at the annual assembly last year, provides for any twenty-five representatives, acting jointly, to nominate in writing for the office of chairman any one person who is a representative member of the Congregational Union or an associate or a member of the Congregational church connected with the union. The election is then by ballot from the list of those nominated.

Baptist.

The theological colleges at Nottingham, Rawdon (Leeds), and Brighton Grove (Manchester) are likely to be amalgamated under the title of the "Northern United Baptist College."

At Woodside Baptist Church, Croydon (Pastor W. H. Gaussen), a new building scheme has been inaugurated, and is to be put before the public at a meeting in the church on Wednesday, March 19.

Rev. James Mursell has finally decided to relinquish the pastorate at Downs Park Road, Clapton, N.E., and to accept the invitation recently received from the church at Dublin Street, Edinburgh, to become the successor in the pastorate of Rev. J. T. Forbes, M.A., who is now at Hillhead, Glasgow.

Two friends have offered £250 each if the debt remaining on West Cliff Tabernacle, Bournemouth, is cleared by the end of the year. The debt now stands at £1,065, thus leaving £565 to be raised. The church has adopted the challenge enthusiastically, and hopes to celebrate the debt's removal by the annual thanksgiving day, October 14, when Pastor Archibald Brown has promised a visit.

The recognition of Rev. J. H. Rushbrooke at St. Mary's Gate Church, Derby, was the occasion of much interest. Drs. Clifford and T. Witton Davies took part in the public meeting. Mr. Rushbrooke besought his hearers especially to accept one teaching which he would emphasize and re-emphasize, viz., that the local church is not to be regarded as an isolated unit, but as part of a great denomination summoned to a work of home and of foreign evangelization. He urged that the church should take its full share of denominational responsibility, and of sacrifice on behalf of their common Baptist work.

The quarterly meetings of the Home Counties Baptist Association have been held at Yiewsley, and were well attended. The meeting place was the new chapel, which is at present worked as a branch mission by the neighbouring church at Hayes. After an hour's devotional service conducted by Pastor Thomas Spurgeon, there was an interesting Conference on "The duty of each church to evangelize its own neighbourhood, and how best to do it." Theatre services, open-air services from street to street, men's Sunday afternoon meetings, cottage prayer meetings, and various other ways of reaching the people were mentioned and discussed. Revs. C. Ingrem, E. W. Tarbox, J. T. Dunn, J. Waite, and others took part.

Methodist.

Rev. Marshall Hartley sails for South Africa in April, so that no missionary secretary will attend the Wesleyan District Synod in Italy, but Rev. William Burgess is to go instead. Mr. Burgess takes up his appointment to Italy as chairman and for mission work shortly after the Conference.

An enthusiastic rally of members of the London Wesley Guilds took place recently at Wesley's Chapel, City Road, N. Rev. C. H. Kelly presided, and among the speakers were Dr. Wenyon and Gipsy Smith. The latter vigorously urged his young hearers to fit themselves for active service in the cause of Christ.

It is proposed to commemorate the memory of the late Rev. Charles Garrett by the erection of a Sunday-school at Hitchin. It was in that town that he spent his early years and began to preach, and from there he was recommended as a candidate for the Wesleyan ministry. £1,500 is the amount it is proposed to raise to carry out the scheme.

On the occasion of Dr. Randles' retirement from the active work of the ministry at the forthcoming Conference, after fifty years of varied and able service to his Church, especially to Manchester Methodism, the members of the Manchester Ministers' Meeting have resolved to make some public recognition of these services as chairman of the District and Theological Tutor from 1885 to 1902.

Presbyterian.

Rev. R. H. Thornton, B.A., son of Rev. Dr. Thornton, of Camden Road, has been appointed assistant to Dr. Hanson, at Marylebone. Mr. Thornton has been trained in Westminster College. He will succeed Rev. Alan M. S. Anderson, who is proceeding to China as a missionary.

The seventy-second annual congregational meeting of the church at Islington, N. (Colebrook Row) has been held. There was a large and enthusiastic gathering of members and friends. The reports, both financial and otherwise, were deemed very satisfactory reading. A special feature of the year's work was the extinction of the church debt. Through the energy and perseverance of Dr. Hall, the £500 necessary to achieve this end was collected from amongst the members and friends of the congregation.

At Crouch Hill Church an excellent lecture was recently delivered by Mr. John A. Steuart (author of "Wine on the Lees"), on "An Outside View of the Temperance Question." A trenchant criticism on the attitude of the churches and the power and organization of "the trade," a revelation from personal observation of the drinking habits of the East End of London, and a tale of the results of the traffic, morally and socially, told with moderation and literary taste, were listened to with attention by a large and deeply interested audience.

Society of Friends.

William Hobson concluded his visit to Exeter with a week's mission in the Meeting House. The attendance was not altogether encouraging, but there was undoubted evidence that the meetings were attended with much blessing. The visit has been felt to be timely and useful, and it is believed the good seed sown is bearing fruit. During the mission the singing of hymns was acceptably introduced, and has since been continued in the evening meetings.

A series of four lectures on Quaker Biography, arranged for by Kendal Monthly Meeting, has aroused much interest. The first was by Frederic Taylor, and gave a bird's-eye view of the life and work of George Fox. John Handley, of Brigflatts, next dealt with the visit of George Fox to the Kendal district. Being the possessor of much original information regarding the circumstances attending these visits, and himself a direct descendant of a family whose members were at the Firbank gathering in 1652, his lecture had special attractions. On the third evening, J. Herbert Midgley, of Grange, gave an inspiring address on Margaret Fell and her daughters. An old Swarthmore Hall account-book (1673-8), snatched long years ago from destruction at the hands of a Lancaster tradesman, was the lecturer's text. Gordon Hargrave, of Windermere, delivered the last lecture, on George Whitehead, and again the audience listened to one who had paid pilgrimages to the scenes of his hero's early life.

Salvation Army.

The circulation of the Japanese War Cry, which has now reached 10,000 copies per issue, is larger than that of any other Christian paper in that country.

Trained maternity nurses have been sent to Cape Town by Mrs. Bramwell Booth to take charge of the Hospital and Women's Home recently established there.

General Booth's new scheme for rescuing drunkards proceeds apace. Four hundred and six public houses are visited weekly by Salvationists in Liverpool, where eighty soldiers have been enrolled as "Drunkards' Friends," to assist in the work of rescue.

Meetings arranged by the Women's Total Abstinence Union were held in eight of Mr. John Shrimpton's Homes for Working Girls in London, March 4 to 7 inclusive. Mrs. Finlay, Mrs. New, Mrs. Webb, Mrs. Braham, Mrs. Eynon, and Miss Boyd, were the speakers. A number of pledges were taken, and much interest manifested.

A large amount of visitation is done in low lodging-houses of the West End of the metropolis by the London City Mission. From a district near Kensington a report says: "The reception given to us has been astonishing. In some of the worst kitchens we have had glorious times; from some they even send out one of their number to keep a look-out lest we should pass them by! In the whole of the twenty-seven common lodging-houses we hold bright services of from fifteen to thirty minutes' duration. By these efforts we deal with some 500 men and women, the majority of whom are untouched by any existing church organization. I have been in physical danger several times, yet the Lord has suffered none to harm me." The committee are appealing for £50 towards the maintenance of the work in this particular district.

Fallen Asleep.

Aged eighty-nine, Rev. JOHN LEWIS, Calvinistic Methodist of Tenby. He was associated with the late Rev. David Charles in producing the edition of the denominational hymn book published sixty years ago.—Aged ninety, Rev. Dr. DUNCAN, of Abdie, Fife.—On March 1, Rev. JOHN HUNTLEY who for the long period of forty-five years occupied the pastorate of Ebenezer Baptist Chapel, Widcombe, Bath. He formerly carried on business as a manufacturing cabinetmaker, and during the whole time of his business life ministered at Ebenezer.

Notes & Comments

Springtide. To-morrow, according to the calendar, we enter upon the springtide—a most welcome season after the long and dreary winter. It is natural that, with the re-awakening of Nature after her long sleep, we ourselves should feel the quickening of new life, and hail with pleasure the longer days and the more attractive features which will soon open up in every direction. The Bible has much to say about the beauty of the spring; some of its most fascinating illustrations are drawn from the beauty and freshness of that inspiring season. "The winter is past, the rain is over and gone, the flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come." We ourselves may find, at this time, many a lesson for mind and heart; the voice of God surely speaks to us through flower and bud. One thing every worker may learn is, that while there are many dark and dreary passages in the season of Christian service, answering to winter in the natural world; the season of brightness, of resurrection, and of revival will surely come in due time. God, who never abandons the natural world to perpetual winter, has surely a tender care for the Church which He has redeemed with his own blood.

Spring in the Church. No reader can mistake the message to the nation from the Free Church Council meetings at Bradford last week; nor can anyone, surely, fail to see in it an evidence of the new spirit which God is putting into the hearts of his people. One sentence used by Mr. Meyer touches the centre of the whole thing—"Times have changed"; and at last the Church is waking up to what this involves. It is being borne in upon us increasingly that the great majority of people in the country lie outside our churches, and that the conditions of life amidst which so many millions find themselves are such as to deaden all higher feelings, and to reduce men to the level of animals. The Church is beginning to appreciate what it means that overcrowded areas are training-grounds for drunkards, criminals, and blackguards. We may well be thankful that this new vision of human need has come to us. It is the first step towards a new effort to cope with it. Not until we see the multitudes, can we be moved with compassion for them; and true compassion infallibly leads to action. The very anguish we feel at the spectacle of sin and misery is the work of the Spirit within us, and surely we may believe that as the Church yields to the full influence of that Spirit, she will be led to exercise a holy ingenuity for the full salvation of the people.

Politics in the Free Churches. Rev. J. H. Jowett gave a clear definition at Bradford of the place and work of the Free Churches in regard to their position in public affairs:—

> We stand, not for politics, but for the character of politicians—for purity, integrity, and a fine, sensitive consciousness; to see that the high places of the land, in the city and the state, in the local and Imperial legislature, do not become the perquisite of money or mere cleverness, but are the heritage of the pure.

The first clause puts the case in a nutshell, and, if faithfully adhered to, will disarm the criticism of those who regard all share in public matters as outside the legitimate pale of the Christian's duty.

The Use of Wealth. We are glad to see that the notable paper of Mr. W. P. Hartley, read at the Congress on "The Use of Wealth," is to be published as a separate pamphlet, and we wish for it the very widest circulation. It is rare, indeed, that so sane and Christian an utterance on that subject is made, and, if we may say so, it was made by a man who was one of the first to put into practice his main principle. Really, the whole question resumes itself in one word,—stewardship, and a stewardship which must be personally discharged during life. The man to whom power has been given to gain money has the best right to undertake its personal distribution. There is very much in Mr. Hartley's contention that it is far better for each man to serve his own generation by wisely using his wealth, than to hoard it up to be distributed by others after his death. One sentence should become classic:

> The setting aside of a proportion of gifts saves wear and tear to the conscience, and a constant altercation between the higher and lower self. Then there is no struggle with selfishness, but only the judgment of relative claims unclouded by the mist of covetousness.

Associations and Individuals. It is open to grave question whether the great combinations and monopolies, of which there are so many to-day, do not increase the danger of unfair treatment of the smaller traders and workers. The State has hedged round the labour of men and women with numerous regulations designed to guarantee them fairly satisfactory conditions, and possibly by and by, as has been suggested, it may have to go further and legislate with a view of preventing these huge capitalistic combinations from closing the avenues of healthy competition. After all, the interest of the unit in a nation should not be altogether overlooked to the advantage of the large shareholder. Gradually the "small shopkeeper" is being crushed out. The Divine command, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself," is capable of close application to this as to many other aspects of life.

The Private Bar. It is gratifying to find the Executive showing a somewhat unusual firmness in regard to the Government Licensing Bill, and there is reason to hope, therefore, that the clauses which have been inserted in deference to well-informed public opinion will not be withdrawn in subservience to the pressure of the brewer and distiller. Naturally the grocer is in arms against Clause 8, under which the off-licences would be placed under the control of the magistrates, with power to limit the number, if thought desirable; and in sending a deputation to the Home Secretary a few days ago they doubtless anticipated a similar flexibility to that which characterized the Government in its dealings with the Children's Bill. Mr. Ritchie, however, has apparently been making himself conversant with the evidence upon which the public mind has been made up, and he stated very decidedly that the administration could not hold out any hope that the clause would be withdrawn. No effort should be spared to keep them in this frame of mind, as the clause in question is one of vital importance in the interests of public well-being.

Licensed Curses. The appalling number of public-houses in Manchester and other populous centres has frequently been the subject of adverse comment, but it would appear from a statement recently made by Rev. C. Chambers that in at least one of the London districts matters are still worse. In introducing a deputation to the licensing justices of the Tower Hamlets division, Mr. Chambers said that in the Stepney district there are no fewer than 800 public-houses, or, in other words, a public-house to every seventy-four adult male inhabitants. It cannot be wondered at that, with his experience of the baneful results, he should speak of these places as "licensed curses," and that he and his colleagues should press for a reduction in the number. The same plea may reasonably be urged in regard to Brentford, which is honeycombed with licensed houses.

Sobriety and Law. One of the tasks before reformers in this country is to revive the belief that temperance legislation is at any rate one forcible remedy against drunkenness. On the Continent there is far greater faith in the power of good laws to promote sobriety than here. The Imperial Ukase, which passed into Russian Law in 1895, has had a very great effect in making the Russian people as a whole more sober than before. Eighty years ago Sweden had the evil distinction of being the most drunken country in Europe; but, since the establishment of the Gothenburg system in 1865, Sweden and Norway now enjoy the proud position of being the most sober of all. The Russian method of abolishing public-houses altogether, and taking the manufacture of all alcoholic drink into its own hands, and the Swedish system of abolishing private profit in drink, may not be best adapted to the circumstances of this country; but they prove that, by legislative interference and careful Government oversight, the drink evil can be largely controlled. It is high time legislative reforms were more earnestly tried in Britain.

Underground Toilers. Although five-sixths of the miners in Great Britain are in favour of a measure limiting the hours of labour underground to eight per day, the Bill to secure that end has been shelved, the Government, as is becoming usual, abstaining from action in regard to it. It is remarkable that under the present system the lads appear to be the chief sufferers; for it appears that in one or two counties, where the men work only about six and a half hours underground, the boys work ten and more. Surely legislation to alter such a state of things ought not to be deferred. There is a strong plea on the part of employers of labour, that the miners should not be interfered with; but if similar protests in the past had been listened to, we should still be without the Factory and other Acts, which have proved to be unqualified blessings to the classes concerned.

Pageant and Prayer. A correspondent calls attention to the great preparations that are everywhere being made for the Coronation pageant in June, and urges that Christian churches and people should not forget the call to remember the spiritual interests of the nation amid all the pomp and splendour. There will be representatives of all the peoples of the earth at the ceremony, as well as of our dependencies beyond the seas. Amid all the rejoicings, there will be room for deeper thoughts, and while we are engaged in magnifying our Imperial greatness, those who love their country should not forget the darker aspects of it—the crying evils that call to heaven for redress, the love of power and display which is a growing sign of the times, the vice and crime of mammon-worship which co-exist with our boasted civilization. The occasion should not pass without a great uprising of prayer that King and people should be kept from pride and vainglory, and that God should be fervently acknowledged as King of kings and the only Ruler of princes and peoples.

By Easy Stages. A little volume of "Devotions adapted for the use of the English Church," from the pen of Rev. Dr. Wilson, late Warden of Keble College, Oxford, has now not only reached an issue of about 360,000, but has received the doubtful honour of notice and commendation in the (Roman) Catholic Times. Even if correspondents of that journal had not referred to the book as having helped them on their way Romeward, the latter fact still would not create surprise, for, as the Catholic Times says, after a perusal of it—

> To-day, in some of the Anglican Churches, all the doctrines of our Church, except Papal Supremacy, are freely taught. The work teaches that priest and people should offer up the Holy Sacrifice, and that the body and blood of our Lord is truly given by the priest. It also exhorts those who are about to go to Communion to prepare for it by confession to a priest, and to the two Protestant sacraments it adds five.

Romanism a Bar to Progress. The laudable attempt of many of the younger clergy in Italy to permeate the socialist movement with religious principles, and to ally the reform movement with the Church, has received a most sudden check. The high ecclesiastical officials of the Roman Church having become alarmed at some of the results, have announced that good Catholics must take no part in such matters until the Pope is granted temporal power again. Thus the "cloven hoof" shows itself in Romanism once more, and spiritual interests are subordinated to ecclesiastical considerations—to the great detriment of practical religion and social progress. The lust for secular power has ever been the bane of the Roman Church, which cannot afford to base itself on the clear statement of Christ, "My kingdom is not of this world." For that reason, among others, it is doomed to a halting and futile policy, which emasculates piety in the individual, and hinders progress in the community.

British Policy in the Soudan. The well-informed communication from "An Egyptian Officer," which recently appeared in a London daily, concerning affairs in the Soudan, deserves careful attention from the authorities. We have previously expressed ourselves with regard to the mistaken attitude assumed by the Egyptian authorities towards the C.M.S. and other missionary societies. The work of the Gospel is hindered because of the fear of exciting native opposition; and yet, despite all the jealous exclusion of missionaries, fanaticism is being fostered to an alarming extent, even to the preaching of a holy war. We shall not even civilize the people at the present rate. Our policy of laisser faire keeps alive fanaticism, and with this we get the annual crop of plague and cholera menacing the whole Orient. For every reason, sanitary, social, and religious, a progressive policy along Christian lines is needed.

Pleasure versus Duty. The "ping-pong" craze has furnished ground for Episcopal censure, on the ground that it is making it difficult to find young people willing to give up the popular amusement in favour of religious and philanthropic work among the poor. In the report of the Manchester district of the "Girls' Friendly Society," it is said that "young ladies seem inclined to put pleasure before duty more than was the case fifteen or twenty years ago." There are many indications of this, besides ping-pong. Are parents teaching their children the importance of the word duty as they ought? The reaction against the old Puritan rigour in home training is in danger of giving way to almost any indulgence which taps at the root of the instinct for service and self-sacrifice. "Endure hardness" is a motto that needs to be re-emphasized in church and household.

Practical Papers.*

THE CHURCH AND THE MASSES.

DO the Churches really want to save the masses? Undoubtedly the spirit of evangelism is increasingly active in many congregations; but this is by no means true of all.

Those that are situated on busy thoroughfares, with teaming masses thronging past their doors, are, speaking broadly, more alive to their duty than those placed in quieter and more select suburban districts. The latter are far too prone to regard themselves as "a little garden walled around," into which the "outsider" is not welcomed to intrude.

The correspondent of the Daily News, who attended the meetings of the Free Church Council at Bradford, quotes a remark made to him by a London minister: "If I were to ask outsiders to my church, my whole congregation would be up in arms at once. They say, 'We pay you to preach to us, and that is your business.'" This may be truth crudely put, but if it be truth at all, what a miserably puny conception of the Church's duty it represents! Yet we fear it is not very wide of the mark as indicating the spirit that rules, at least in many congregations, whether "chapel" or "church."

We know of a fashionable Nonconformist church, for example, that has enjoyed the ministrations of a popular minister for upwards of a quarter of a century, but has never during that period had a "mission" within its walls. Yet with all the "feeding" and "building up" of its members, when one proposed, not long since, that open-air work should be undertaken, the deacons deprecated the step, and solemnly decided that "there was not sufficient force to carry it on successfully"! Solemn! Yes, it is solemn indeed, when such a pitiable verdict must needs be pronounced. And when, after a season's work had been carried on in the open-air by a "faithful few," the expenses, amounting to a few pounds, had to be met, appeal was made to members of neighbouring churches to liquidate the liability!

Is not such a state of things a solemn disgrace? Is it not against such a church that the judgment of Laodicea is pronounced—"Because thou sayest, I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing; and knowest not that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked . . . I will spue thee out of my mouth"?

One would think that the ideal of a church is to be like a first-class compartment of a train, in which only a chosen few may sit. We have not so learned Christ. It is not always the minister who is to blame. "The people love to have it so," as much to-day as in Jeremiah's degenerate times. We hear it freely stated that "the world is better than ever it was." If it is, there are many congregations that can claim no credit for it.

When a church is without a minister for awhile, and this or that candidate is under consideration, if a member at a church-meeting should suggest the selection of one who can attract outsiders, he is not infrequently snubbed with the reply, "We do not want a crowd; we want to be built up!" Yet surely an edifice needs breadth as well as height, if it is to fulfil the purpose of its erection; and to what end is a congregation to be "built up" if it be not to afford welcome shelter to the outsider? For a self-centred, self-satisfied church, "bolstered up" would be the more correct appellation; and when at the Judgment Day the props against which it has so complacently leaned are stripped away, great will be its fall.

What are churches for, if not to minister to the needs of a dying world? To what purpose is our continued lament at the "indifference of the masses" if we stretch forth no hand to win them? "If a brother or sister be naked, and destitute of [spiritual] food, and one of you say unto them, Be ye warmed and filled; notwithstanding ye give them not those things that are needful, what doth it profit?" (James ii. 15, 16). Again, "Whoso seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?" (1 John iii. 17).

Will not the pitiful plea of such churches, "Have we not in thy name done many wonderful works?" be answered with the condemnation, "I never knew you"?

The air is full of talk of "brotherhood," and the speakers at the Free Church Council meetings dispensed excellent doctrine, so far as theory is concerned. The great need is for the ministers who listened to it to go home to preach and practise it unflinchingly to their congregations. And if some of them suffer the martyrdom of dismissal for their pains, the question of the Church's duty would be forced to the front. The present day badly needs a few martyrs to awaken its congregations from their inert respectability, that they may hear afresh the command of God—"Go ye, and preach the Gospel to every creature."

Mr. Moody used to say, "The way to reach the masses is to go to them." But many modern congregations not only refuse to do that; they will not even let the masses come to them. "Ye enter not in (to your responsibilities) yourselves, and they that are entering in, ye hinder."

We thankfully believe that in every church there are devout and faithful souls who have not yet bowed the knee to the Baal of selfishness, and who mourn the lethargy amid which they are forced to move. Let them also take courage to awaken their fellow-members to their neglected duty, if by any means the Master's call may be obeyed: "Go ye out into the highways and hedges, and compel them to come in, that my house may be FILLED." G.

* The former series of "Practical Papers" (fourteen subjects) may now be had in book form. (Dreams and Realities. Cloth, 1s. Morgan & Scott.)

Wanted—Men!

WHEN in England eleven years ago, I wrote regarding missionary candidates, "The crying need of China to-day is of hundreds of ordinary people filled with the Spirit of God." ("Do Not Say," page 54.) After some years of further experience in the interior of that great country, strengthened conviction leads me to repeat that statement. (In passing I would remark, that Christian natives can not do the work where there are no native Christians to do it.) It is quite true "there is scope for missionaries of the highest intellectual ability." Thinkers, reasoners, scholars, linguists, teachers, leaders—all these are wanted. The mission fields every moment are standing sorely in need of them. Let this fact not be forgotten nor minimized. But along with these, who must always be few, there is room, nay, there is necessity, for many others—ordinary folk, shall we call them?—nevertheless men and women of "character," who have "the hope" very definitely in them, and who can give a reason for it.

The deplorable state of our fellow-men in China, the fact that the Chinese are for the most part a simple people, and that they are so easily accessible, lend urgency to our Master's command, and make it our immediate duty to send the messengers of God to them, whether from mansion or from cottage. And has there ever been a time like the present?

In the second place, can anybody doubt that there are in every town, and in almost every village, some men and women of ordinary endowment, well-grounded Christians, who—excuses and trivialities aside—might go to the heathen? I believe there are scores of such Christians now at home, who might be doing a plodding, quiet, but very useful work in China.

Thirdly, is there a town, is there a parish, where the Christians are not able, if they follow Christ, to support one or more of their number in the mission field? About £50 might be needed for travelling expenses and a very moderate but sufficient outfit. Afterwards, in Inland China, £50 a year or less per missionary would usually cover all necessary expenses.

MONEY—WHY NOT MEN?

As an observer from outside, I note with sadness that so little is being done by the home churches and individual Christians in the way of recruiting missionaries for the foreign mission field. Many churches do nothing for foreign missions (though the number is happily decreasing). Those churches and friends that are interested, help to provide funds for the missionary societies. Here very often they consider their work begins—and ends! They are not providing men. They are not searching out, training, and sending forth labourers from their midst. Listen to the report: "Our Association has sent up £165 to the society, being an increase of nearly £15 on the previous year." "Very good, and how many men are you sending up?" "Men! we are not sending any." "How many men did you send last year?" "We did not send any." "And how many men the year before?" "None at all." Evidently it is quite a new idea! The above is a fair summary of many an "Encouraging Missionary Report." Where is the association that sends up regularly its annual subscription of men? It is as much the business of the Church to raise workers for the mission field as to raise funds. But it is not being done; nay, is it even thought of?

This, I believe, is a fatal flaw in our missionary enterprise. The nations cannot be evangelized until the churches are seeking out men and sending them. When Christians reach this elementary stage in missionary interest, the Gospel will soon be preached throughout the world. "Look ye out from among you . . . men."

A great number of those who are thus sought out would go, of course, in connection with the missionary societies. It is most desirable that they should do so. The advantages of being connected with a society or mission are very great. Let all thus go who can.

But there will always be some whom the societies cannot send, not because they are not well-grounded Christians, not because they have not the right spirit—which would be all-sufficient reasons for their not going—but for other causes. A society's funds are usually limited. Amongst many candidates only the best can be sent. So it is continually happening—please note the melancholy fact—that suitable candidates cannot go. This difficulty could often be met by offers to support the extra workers. Some societies follow the plan of sending out in faith all candidates they consider suitable. Yet even in these societies, I suppose, if the funds were doubled the missionaries would be multiplied.

REJECTED CANDIDATES.

Among other hindrances are these: Candidates exceed the regulation age, or they fall below the regulation standard of education, or they fail to pass the regulation standard of health, and they are rejected. Yet amongst them are some who are really called of God to preach the Gospel to the heathen. Too often the candidates' church position—their denomination—stands in the way; or their views on subjects such as baptism, Divine healing, holiness, election, sectarianism, &c., do not square with the society's regulations. So they are rejected. Yet among them are some who are called to be God's messengers to the heathen.

A PRACTICAL QUESTION.

Here, then, comes the practical question: Is it right that an opportunity should somehow be given to such as these, and is the need of labourers among the heathen great enough to warrant sending them? I unhesitatingly say, "Yes, it is." It cannot be right that any who are really called of God to go to the heathen should be kept back altogether by standards which, however useful in their place, are, after all, man-imposed and not Divine. We know, and the societies would be among the first to admit it, that some have been called of God to go to the heathen whom the societies with their partial knowledge at the time, felt it right to reject.

I venture to urge that in the case of those who are conscious of being called to preach to the heathen, and who by their lives and usefulness at home give evidence of that call, any slight element of uncertainty about health or education or "views" should not be allowed to block the way. And, as a matter of fact, if a man is strong enough to be a good worker in England, with all its wear and tear, he is probably strong enough for work in moderate climates abroad. If he is educated enough to witness for Christ to people in England, he is probably educated enough to witness for Christ to people abroad—at any rate to the simple folk of Inland China.

As for the language, those who, in dependance on God, are willing to persevere are almost sure to learn it. Again, if a man's "views" do not hinder his usefulness at home, they probably will not do much harm abroad. As one has said, "May we not learn to trust God with men who we know are true to Him," and whom He is blessing?

What then? even if there be some "risk"—and it should be remembered there is "risk" in the case of everyone who is sent—let God's servants go. "Such as these cannot do much." Perhaps not, but it will be a splendid thing if they can do something. For, consider, the need in heathen lands is so great that a little done there is more than much done in England.

The probability is, some will fail, even as some of those who are passed by the societies will fail. Some will not fail, but will, in a quiet and humble way, do good, while some will prove as strong, as efficient, as successful as others. But they will be lost to the work, as so many have been, if they are not allowed a trial. Among the most faithful and useful missionaries are some who were rejected by the societies at first. Some of those who have stood the climate best are those whom the doctors would not pass. God does not always work in our grooves.

AN OFFER OF HELP.

For many years the longing has remained with me to lend a helping hand to some of those whose way into the mission field is difficult, but I have not felt free to do so. Now I am free, and shall prize any opportunity God gives me of using my services in this direction.

I believe God is leading me to a new district quite unevangelized in the interior of China. In going back to that land I should rejoice to be able to receive, or to arrange for the reception of, God-called labourers who otherwise might not be able to go. My hope is that later on they will be able to join out there one of the missions. Four men who had been rejected by one society went out with me independently in 1891. In each case, through God's goodness and help, the "experiment" was successful. All have been as well, physically, as the others; all have learned the language; all have proved themselves useful; and all have since been accepted by the society which previously rejected them, and are at the present time working under that society in a very needy part of inland China.

I should like to hear through their ministers, or other responsible Christian workers, of godly and suitable volunteers for the mission field. They should be strong enough in body and mind and capacity to be useful workers where they now are. And they must be well-grounded Christians, humble, reasonable persons, who can be trusted to plod on cheerfully in the face of discouragements. I should be glad, too, to hear from any of God's stewards who, constrained by the love of Christ, wish to help in thus sending out more missionaries. Should there be a response, a small committee will be formed and arrangements be made. Meanwhile, as I must be unknown to many, I am permitted to mention as personal references, the Church Missionary Society, the China Inland Mission, and the Regions Beyond Missionary Union (Dr. H. Grattan Guinness).

Whilst in England I shall count it a privilege to respond to invitations to speak, with others or alone—at the regular or at special meetings—of missionary work in China, and especially of God's claims upon his own servants for whole-hearted obedience and cheerful activity in his service. At such meetings collections are not desired. A perusal of "Do Not Say" (2d. Marshall Bros.), will help the consideration of this great question.

A postcard from ministers, leaders, bed ridden saints, and Christians generally who sympathize with this letter, would be a great encouragement to me at this time. We might confer together, and unite in prayer that God's will may be understood and done. Later on, with your permission, I hope to report progress and give further details. Will other papers kindly copy, or draw attention to this letter? Advice—the fruit of prayer—will be received most gratefully.

SEEK AND SEND.

In conclusion, and summing up what I have said:—

1. Let God's people individually and collectively seek out suitable men and women from among themselves, and send them "into all the world" through the missionary societies.

2. Let them send out independently, after training if necessary, those who are called of God, but who, from one cause or another, are debarred at present from joining a society. Will not some of the churches and missions, some of the Bible classes and associations, begin at once to seek out men and to send them forth? I would say again, God's servants and stewards in every town are responsible for supplying men as well as money to the mission field, and we are responsible for going on doing this until the world is evangelized and the banner of Jesus Christ is uplifted everywhere. For our encouragement and warning it is written, "God hath chosen the weak things . . . and the things that are despised hath God chosen." In co-operating with God we desire to fall in line with God's methods.

Samuel and Saul.

As Occasion Serves.

(1 Sam. x. 7.)

By Rev. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

CIRCUMSTANCES led up to Samuel's secret designation of Saul as king; and circumstances, so special and significant as to carry on their brow the Divine impression, were destined to corroborate the momentous act. With unerring accuracy the old prophet anticipated them, and with unfailing precision each of them took place. "All those signs came to pass that day." (1) First, by Rachel's tomb, in the border of Benjamin, two men met him to say that the asses had been found, and that his father had left the care of the asses, and was taking thought for his son, saying, "What shall I do for my son?" This was a very significant evidence of the Divine will and choice. It indicated that he was to be henceforth relieved of the care of the farm and the field, to devote himself to other and higher work. Asses could be found without his interposition. Others could attend to them and their like, but for him the kingdom was waiting, and the hearts of men were being prepared. The home-ties, the love of father and family would always have a claim, but he must leave to others the care of the estates at Gibeah.

THE GUIDANCE OF CIRCUMSTANCES.

This sign is still of inestimable value to those who feel called to give themselves wholly to direct service for God. If it be the case that they are needed at home, to provide for the maintenance of aged parents or sisters, of wife or child, they have no right to withdraw from that sacred duty—that holy obligation—until God gives them an honourable discharge. The message to all such most certainly is that which the Apostle gave in a time of great unsettlement to the Corinthian disciples, "Let each man abide in that calling wherein he was called." "Brethren, let each man, wherein he was called, therein abide with God" (1 Cor. vii. 20, 24).

When God has given a call, let us wait trustfully and patiently for his hand to slacken the hold of circumstances. Without long delay the shore-rope will be loosed, and the message will come in one form or another: "The asses are found." Any circumstance of that kind will be an unmistakable assurance that the Lord's voice had been speaking to the heart, and that his cloud was beckoning us to follow.

(2) Next, as he went forward, filled with bewilderment and awe, near the oak, or terebinth, of Tabor (the situation of which is absolutely unknown), Saul met three men going on a sacred pilgrimage to Bethel, which, from the days of Abraham and Jacob, had been hallowed by the most sacred associations.

PROVISION FOR THE FUTURE.

These men were carrying, as Samuel said they would, as votive-offerings to the shrine, three kids, three loaves, and a bottle (or skin, marg.) of wine. First they saluted him with the invariable Eastern greeting, Peace be unto thee; and presented him with two of the loaves, as though obeying an inner conviction which was pressed home on them by the Divine Spirit, that he whom they had encountered was no ordinary wayfarer, but one who might share their homage even with Almighty God.

What significance lay hid in this act also! Did it not imply that God would compel the respect and reverence of the nation to arise towards the king whom He had chosen, and that there should be no lack of the supplies which were required to sustain his royal state? Was it not an assurance that he need not be anxious about what he should eat or drink or how he should be clothed, since, if he sought first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, all things besides would certainly be added?

This, too, will befal each servant of God who steps out on the path of obedience. He may be leaving a well-established business and giving up some lucrative source of income; he may seem to be stepping from the boat on to the heaving, changeful waters. But if he will be only true to God's call he will have no reason to repent; his bread shall be given him, and his water shall be sure.

On one occasion in the Lord's life, He gave a memorable lesson on this matter to his Apostles. The tax-collector had come to Peter with a demand which Peter could not meet, and he came to the Master with it. Doubtless, if the fisherman had still been plying his craft, there would have been no need for anxiety—out of the produce of his labour he would have been well able to meet the application; but, as it was, there was no money in his purse or house available for the purpose. "Go thou to the sea," said the Master, "and cast a hook, and take up the fish that first cometh up; and when thou hast opened his mouth, thou shalt find a shekel; that take and give unto them for Me and thee." It was in obedience to the Saviour's call that Peter had given up his own means of livelihood, and the Lord recognised that the responsibility of providing for the needs, that would otherwise have been met by his toil, was incumbent on Himself. He identified Himself in the common need when He said, "for Me and thee." If you go forth on Christ's errands, He will not be unrighteous to forget; you may surely trust Him to pay the taxes, and all other legitimate dues.

(3) Finally, Saul came to Gibeah (R.V. marg.). Hard by this spot, and almost within sight of his home, Saul encountered a band of young men connected with the prophetic school which Samuel had established. They were coming down from the high place with a psaltery, a timbrel, a pipe, and a harp. The afflatus of prophetic fervour and ecstasy was upon them, and as Saul beheld their holy rapture he fell under its spell. Chords within his soul, which had never vibrated before, began to answer in strange unison. Yearnings after God, susceptibility to spiritual impressions, the sense of the unseen and eternal, filled his soul. "The Spirit of God came mightily upon him, and he prophesied among them."

SUPERFICIAL IMPRESSIONS.

This remarkable assertion need not astonish us. It is by no means uncommon to find men temporarily and spasmodically affected by strong religious impressions, who are not permanently and savingly delivered from their former worldly or selfish manner of life. It is possible to be enlightened, to taste of the heavenly gift, to be a partaker of the Holy Ghost, to be solemnized by the powers of the world to come, and yet fall away. A land may have drunk of the rain and been moistened with the gentle dew, and yet bear thorns and thistles. Seed may spring up quickly where there is no depth of earth, and yet wither away. Simon was deeply wrought on by all he saw and felt during Philip's visit to Samaria, but the Apostle declared that he was still "in the gall of bitterness and the bond of iniquity."

But what to Saul was only a transient and superficial influence may become, in each of us, a permanent possession. The Spirit of God may come on us to fill us, and abide, as He did with those on whom He came in the early days of the Church. In successive waves of power and grace He may come on us, so that we may not only be filled suddenly and mightily for special work, but be constantly sensible of the holy infillings.

Whenever God calls us to special service, He provides a special anointing of the Holy Spirit. Remember how the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, "See, I have called by name Bezaleel the son of Uri; and I have filled him with the Spirit of God, in wisdom, and in understanding, and in knowledge, and in all manner of workmanship." This is universally true. As certainly as there is the call, there will be the equipment. But we must look up for it, we must claim and appropriate it; without feeling it, we must reckon that it is ours, and step out on the predestined path. It is in the act that we become suddenly and thankfully aware of the possession. Oh, that the Spirit of Christ might come mightily on all his servants, so that they may be equipped for the demands of the present age, and that the Master may say of each of them, "Behold my servant, whom I uphold; my chosen, in whom my soul delighteth. I have put my spirit upon him, and he shall bring forth judgment to the people."

This transformation in the young farmer amazed all that knew him beforetime; and they said one to another, "What is this that has come unto the son of Kish? Is Saul among the prophets?" It made as great a stir as when Saul of Tarsus joined the Christians, whom he had persecuted, or when Bunyan and Newton became ministers of the Word. One of the older people, however, divined the reason. Rumours of Saul's interview with Samuel were beginning to circulate, and he said in effect: "Has he not been with Samuel, the father of these blessed and exalted movements? What wonder, then, if he partake of his gifts!"

When the first tremor of excitement had passed, and Saul regained full mastery of himself, he went up to the high place, probably for quiet meditation and prayer, that he might comprehend the full significance of the crowding events which had transpired within the recent hours. To whom can we turn, most Holy God, in the supreme moments of life, but unto Thee? Only Thou canst understand.

"DO AS OCCASION SERVES."

Ere Samuel dismissed his astonished and awe-stricken guest, he bade him act in each circumstance as occasion served (v. 7). There is always room for the exercise of sanctified common sense. The circumstances may be Divinely contrived, but we must use them for good or evil, making them stepping-stones or stumbling-blocks. The same circumstances may come to all, but one man receives their lesson and transmits his answer in a very different spirit from his friend and neighbour. In one case the sun and shower produce flowers and corn, in another weeds and poppies. The Divine guidance of our lives does not obviate the necessity for the exercise of prudence, that looks before and after and upwards, in order to ascertain what the will of the Lord is.

There is always in the regimen of life an abundant need for the exercise of our judgment, through which the light of God may be shining as through a clear pane of glass. We are not dumb, driven cattle, nor the creatures of fate or chance. We are not automatons. So long as we look for guidance, it will be freely given, but when it is given, we must use it, and it is useless, unless we do. Only they that receive the abundance of grace, and the gift of righteousness shall reign in life.

On that memorable night when God's Angel achieved the deliverance of Peter from his prison, we are told that the celestial visitant led the dazed Apostle through the first and second streets, and then departed from him; and when Peter had considered the thing, he went to the house of Mary. So long as he was bewildered, and half asleep, living in a trance, walking in dreamland, it was necessary that he should be carefully watched and led; but so soon as the sharp morning air had revived him, and brought him to himself, so that he was able to consider the matter, he was left to act on the decisions of his own sanctified commonsense.

To him that overcometh, the Master promises to give a white stone, which is surely the Urim and Thummim stone—a judgment through which the Shekinah light glows and shines. May it be our happy privilege to receive it at his hands, that we may be able to say with our Lord, "My judgment is just, because I seek not my own will, but his that sent me."

THE STORY OF

"The Brethren."

I HAVE read with considerable interest Mr. W. Blair Neatby's "History of the Plymouth Brethren," and various reviews of the same. One thing has struck me very painfully in nearly all these writings—the almost entire omission of the Spirit of God. Men and their unhappy doings have been made prominent; God has been left out. I admit the difficulty in writing on ecclesiastical subjects, whether the whole Church of God is in question, or a particular section of it. A normal condition of things, in which the servants of God quietly pursue their labours, with, perhaps, the happiest results, yields but little matter for the historian; times of upheaval and controversy yield much more. Hence it happens that most ecclesiastical histories are occupied far more with the clamour of heretics and the efforts of faithful men in withstanding them, than with ordinary spiritual operations, in which, in reality, the true life of the Church of God is found.

DIVINE ORIGIN OF THE MOVEMENT.

In saying this, I have no thought whatever of defending "The Brethren" as a community, or of extenuating their faults. I desire simply to suggest that the movement which has been thus marred was in its inception the work of the Spirit of God. The Divine object, I doubt not, was to recall the Church to a truer sense of its heavenly character and hope, to the reality of the abiding presence of the Holy Spirit, and to elevate the tone of Christian life in general. Large numbers of Christians outside of "The Brethren"—both clerical and lay—are quite prepared to admit the truth of what I have stated. With many the break-up of "Brethrenism" is no matter of exultation, but of the keenest disappointment. Their hope was that by means of this movement some deliverance would be wrought in the earth, and that a safe refuge would be provided for troubled souls fleeing from the storms of fundamental error which are now devastating the Church at large.

Now, the fact of a movement having failed through human infirmity and sin, is no proof that the movement, as such, is not Divine. It has been man's unhappy lot to mar everything that God has committed to him from the very beginning of his history. This could easily be shown from Scripture, but I will not trespass upon your space. Leaving other dispensations aside, and confining ourselves to the Church period, was not the movement that began on the Day of Pentecost Divine? Yet what was its condition within half a century? Not only had love and zeal grown cold, but strifes and doctrinal errors filled the air.

MARRED IN THE HANDS OF MEN.

Take the Reformation in the sixteenth century. Most Protestants recognise that the hand of God was in it. (I say "most" advisedly, for many in this day who are nominally Protestants now see nothing Divine in the movement at all). But though the Reformation was a marked operation of God's Spirit, was it not disfigured by the most humiliating controversies? Who has not read of the Sacramental differences between the followers of Luther and of Zwinglius, the feeling between the parties being so terrible that godly men refused to have communion the one with the other? Who is not aware of the bitter dissensions about church order and forms among the English refugees at Frankfort and elsewhere, while their brethren at home were shedding their blood for the faith? Is not the fact patent to all that these and later contentions led ultimately to the establishment of hostile denominations, which remain, at least in their distinctness, to this day? The Romanist would have us believe that these disorders are the natural result of separation from Catholic unity, and that they prove the Reformation to have been a colossal blunder; but what thoughtful Protestant would accept such a conclusion?

I suggest, therefore, that the movement which began so simply in or about 1828 was emphatically a movement of the Spirit of God, but marred in the hands of men. This ruin has not been brought about through the absence of "system," but because there has been too much "system." This I have endeavoured to show in the pamphlet on "Fellowship in Closing Days," referred to by Mr. Neatby towards the close of his book. Yet though, as an organization, "Brethrenism" is broken up, and much of its power has gone, the fact should be remembered that the published works of its many writers remain, and are to-day, as they have been for many years, the greatest spiritual help and blessing to those who read them. Pious ministers of various denominations have frequently confessed to me, both in this country and abroad, that the works in question have been invaluable to them in their own spiritual life, and in their ministry.

Brethren have failed, and failed deeply. I own it with sorrow and shame; but I cannot suffer human defection to shut out from my vision the bright operation and testimony of the faithful Spirit of God. And I would gently remind critics of the words of our Lord:—"He that is without sin among you, let him cast the first stone."

The Sequel to Gambling.

By CHARLES COOK.

ON Derby Day, Wednesday, May 30, 1868 (the year following that in which Hermit won the Derby), a paper called The Tomahawk brought out a cartoon called, "Home from the Derby." It represented a pair-horse carriage driven by the devil down a steep hill. In the carriage was a gentleman, with the coronet of a marquis on his head; in one hand he held a champagne glass, which was being filled by a skeleton sitting behind, which represented Death; with the other hand he was throwing away dolls marked Dignity, Honour, &c.; a fast woman and two low men (one of whom was picking his pocket) were also seated in the vehicle. The finger-post on the road contained the words—"To Hell." Moral—Home from the Derby!

The following week another cartoon appeared, entitled "The Settling Day," and it represented the devil as a bookmaker reckoning up his gains. He appeared very well pleased with the result. Shortly afterwards a certain marquis died (the same whose face was seen in the above cartoon), having been previously ruined through betting.

Mr. Frith, the great painter, has preached a telling sermon in his series of pictures,

"THE ROAD TO RUIN."

The first scene is the room of an undergraduate at Oxford, where a number of young men are gambling at cards. One is blowing out the candles, for the dawn is breaking; empty bottles are on the floor (for gambling and drinking usually go together), and there is seen the bright open face of an Englishman, about twenty.

The second picture is the Lawn at Ascot, and here the same face is seen surrounded by the vultures of the race-course—the bookmakers, apparently well occupied in plucking their aristocratic victim.

The third canvas represents the town mansion of the same gentleman—presumably some years later—and the bailiffs are in possession of the house (to the surprise of the powdered footman and the astonished wife), which is about to be sold to pay his debts.

The fourth painting is a humble pension in a French town, where the landlady is presenting a long bill, which she requests may be paid at once. The poor ruined man has been trying to make a living by literature, and failed.

Lastly, we are back again in London. The scene in a back garret, the moon's rays are streaming into the miserable room, touching with their light the broken toys of children and some threadbare female apparel, but only a man is seen, and he is locking the door; on the table may be seen a pistol, a bullet, and some powder in a small piece of newspaper. Another moment and the suicide will have hurried himself into eternity. Truly it was "The Road to Ruin" of body and soul.

A tipster on one of the racecourses said in our hearing, "If you want to know the way to hell, keep on gambling, and you'll soon be there." The aim and end of gambling is to get money, and to get it without working for it, no matter at whose loss or dishonour. Let gamblers beware, there is a finish to their life's race. There are balances in which they have yet to be weighed, and there is a settling day in which "God will judge the world in righteousness by that Man whom He hath ordained."

There is a picture which represents Ambition. A young man is riding a swift and powerful steed. His mantle is flying behind him in the wind. His face is aglow with eager desire and anticipation. His eyes flash. He is consumed with eagerness as he seeks to grasp the prize. Before him rolls a ball of gold on a narrow way. It is this that the young man is pursuing. On either side of the narrow path is a precipice into which a stumble or a false step may plunge horse and rider. Beneath the feet of the flying steed lies the prostrate form of Virtue, over which the youth has ridden in his mad chase. Behind, his bony hand extended toward the rider, is the shadowy skeleton form of Death, coming in swift pursuit. The ball of Gold is the goal of ambition ahead; death in pursuit, virtue trampled underfoot, danger on either hand! Look at the picture! Such the tragedy of life to those whose object only is the getting of gold by gambling.

IS THE SCENE TOO TRAGIC?

Nothing that art could do, or words depict, can overstate the real tragedy of thousands of such men known to me in this world. Made for immortality, men live as though death ended all, and the grave's darkness were the close; but Resurgam is written over the remains of the gambler, as well as over the ashes of the saint. Let us, whose eyes are open to the wiles of the devil and the evils that assail men, seek, in season and out, to win them for God.

Sunday Goods Traffic.

THE suppression of Sunday goods trains in various Continental countries has undoubtedly been brought about through the influence of the International Federation of Geneva; but it was not made possible of actual accomplishment until certain articles of agreement were entered into by ten Continental states, whose representatives met at Berne in 1878 and 1881. The discussions were at first very stormy, but substantial unanimity at length prevailed.

This agreement, entered into by Switzerland, Germany, Austria, Hungary, Belgium, France, Italy, Luxemburg, Holland and Russia, ten states in all, was finally ratified by the contracting parties, and came into force on January 1, 1893. While it does not, in so many words, enact the suppression of the Sunday goods traffic, this agreement, nevertheless, makes that reform possible. No state is bound absolutely to close its goods offices on Sundays, but each is permitted to do so if it pleases.

The consequence has been that Switzerland has suppressed 460, and Belgium, on its state railways alone, 2,227 goods trains per Sunday. It follows that within the twelve months of a year, in these two European countries, without naming others, upwards of 120,000 Sunday goods trains have ceased running, thus liberating from Sunday toil 9,000 or 10,000 men.

As the number of Sunday goods trains on the British railways is believed to exceed half a million per annum, is it not high time for English railway officials to learn a lesson from their Continental brethren? It should be perfectly possible for the Great Northern, the Midland, and all the great railroads of our country to begin the restriction of a Sunday traffic, the continuance of which is offensive to Christian sentiment, and unlikely to tend to the prosperity of any persons concerned in it.

Various Indian Missions.

WHILE at Poona we called on Soonderabai H. Powar, a dear child of God, known to some friends in England, who, in 1899, was led to commence work in the zenanas, and to translate instructive tracts into the Marathi language. She hired a small house for herself and three adopted children, trusting God for her support, and promising to obey his guidance. Friends suggested the opening of a school for Christian workers; but she shrank from such a responsibility, until it was clearly shown to her that this was God's will, and that, if she was weak, He was strong and able to work through her. Accordingly, she opened a training home in a larger house, rented for this purpose.

Among the inmates (about thirty-five) are deserted wives, child-widows, and unmarried girls, all of whom are taught the love of Jesus, and take delight in the study of the Word.

The average pupils learn good Marathi, singing, and sewing. The more intelligent ones receive extra education in English, Hindustani, and Gujerati. The Bible course takes, in the first year, all the Bible stories; in the second, the prophecies concerning Christ; and in the third, "Advanced Scriptural Instruction." In the intervals between their studies, the girls accompany Miss Powar on her visits to the zenanas, in order to get an insight into practical work before going out to help any missionary. The truth is constantly being pressed upon them that unless they are truly converted they cannot expect to be used of God for the saving of others, nor can they be saved themselves.

A pleasant-looking young woman was introduced to us, whose picture stands in the parlour, showing her as she was when rescued from the famine. A perfect skeleton! It was her own desire that the photo should be seen; "for," said she to Miss Powar, "looking at it will remind me how miserable I was before the Lord brought me here and gave me everything I need, and taught me the love of Jesus. I want to remember to thank Him."

Miss Powar is looking for the support of her work directly to the Lord, and we were told by friends that at times her faith is severely tested, and that just now she is passing through deep waters.

In the same centre of great missionary activity are "The Anglo-Indian Christian Homes," which were so dear to Mr. Dennis Osborne's heart. They were started in 1887 by Miss Dawlly, an American lady, who, while working at the native orphanage, Akola, had her attention attracted to two little Eurasian children. As she watched them, a vision of what might become of them appeared before her. They belonged to a race already acclimatized, and acquiring languages with facility. Close affinity to the European race, and their knowledge of the native customs and manners, made them in her eyes peculiarly adapted to mission work.

The school began with two girls, grew rapidly, and several times had to be removed to larger premises. In answer to prayer for a suitable helper, Mrs. Hutchings arrived in India in 1893, just four days after Miss Dawlly had been called home to her reward.

The present Home, a former Baptist Chapel, with an adjoining house adapted to the purpose, was opened in 1896, and a few months later a Boys' Home was started. Boys and girls are receiving good education; the former are prepared for learning trades or other means of livelihood, the latter are receiving good domestic training in addition to their school and Christian instruction.

While the Homes since Miss Dawlly's death form part of the work of the A.M.E. Mission, the church does not hold itself responsible for the finances. These depend entirely upon those who realize the claim of the orphan and fatherless. There are about eighty inmates altogether, of whom the smaller number are boys.

For lack of time we were not able to see more of Poona Mission work, save the orphanage of Rev. D. O. and Mrs. Fox, who are taking care of 130 famine boys, and giving them such a training as will be useful for their future life.

There are several such independent smaller missions up and down the country. One of them is that of Mrs. Hewlett's school for low-caste children at Benares, and another, Mrs. and Miss Chuckerbutty's Orphan Home at Allahabad. Mrs. Chuckerbutty, who worked in the famine-stricken districts, where at times she was unable to get any food for herself, is now in a much impaired condition of health, and we were not able to see her.

Many a regret has been expressed as to the independent missions not uniting with larger organizations, where they might work more effectively, and with better results. We refrain from stating an opinion as to the better course, knowing that in our own country there are such who do not feel led to join large institutions, and yet in their own way, and in their own small corner, are doing a useful work which surely is acceptable to God.

About two miles from Godhra on the fringe of the jungle, in the Panch Mahal, lies the mission-house where Mr. and Mrs. Robert Ward, of the A.M.E.M. (the former known to some under his old Salvation Army name of Man Sukh Lal), have their headquarters while itinerating in the surrounding villages. Theirs is one of the sorest famine districts. Last year as many as 11,000 corpses were picked up by workers and burned by the riverside. Each morning the Mission compound was surrounded by dead. Oh, the misery! The emaciated bodies were attacked by birds of prey before the last sigh was breathed. While the missionaries made superhuman efforts to save lives from the grip of famine and cholera, their own little one was carried to the grave. Others had similar heartrending experiences; but none speak of themselves, vying with each other to do justice to the heroism of their fellow-workers.

At the time of our visit a conference, or mela, of Christian workers was held at the mission station, to which about three hundred native people had flocked. They represented, as Mr. Ward said, about

ELEVEN THOUSAND CHRISTIANS.

In passing through Godhra, a typical Hindu village, with tumble-down mud huts and a variety of more or less ugly idol shrines, we heard a deafening noise coming forth from the chief temple. It was the waking-up of the idol, who is allowed to sleep from 5 p.m. till 10 a.m., and is put to bed with the same noisy ceremony which accompanies his levée. Like nation, like gods. The Hindu idea of supreme happiness is "doing nothing or resting," which accounts for the idol's long nights.

At the entrance to the Mission compound, prettily decorated by Mrs. Ward for this occasion, we were cheered with hearty salaams from about 200 famine girls who had assembled there to welcome the new arrivals. A meeting took place in the afternoon, in the course of which a very kind recognition was made of the help given through THE CHRISTIAN, and we were presented with bouquets and flower necklaces. Thus decorated, Mr. Morgan said that he thought it a great privilege to be able to transmit to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN the thanks so heartily expressed for what they had done for Jesus' sake. On the last day (Sunday) of the Conference about twelve adults were baptized.

Mr. Ward, who on meeting us had seemed very cheerful and bright, was laid up the next day, and was suffering from inflammation in his knee when we left him. His constitution, owing to over-work and over-strain, seems to have been much shattered, and friends urge strongly for him to take a year's rest in England.

The last I heard from his brave little wife was, that Dr. Nightingale, their physician, who is the nephew of Florence Nightingale, thought that she might be able to go with her husband for a little change to Ceylon. These friends greatly need our prayers. W. M.

The Earthquake in Russia.

MY Armenian friend, Tarajanz, in Baku, gives fuller accounts of the earthquake by which the whole flourishing town of Shemakha has been destroyed and some thousands have lost their lives, while all the inhabitants have lost all they called their own, and are now homeless and destitute. He writes:—"All our families and relatives have now come to Baku. My aged mother, my aged father-in-law, and others are escaped with their bare lives. Many are now living under canvas, there being no building that might be inhabited. Above 2,000 are estimated to have been killed, mostly Tartar women and children. They were in the habit of spending the Thursday with their numerous families of children in the baths as a preparation for Friday, their day of rest. The earthquake began on Thursday at one o'clock. They had no way or time to escape, but were buried with their children."

Mr. Tarajanz's venerable father-in-law was just sitting down to a meal when he heard a terrible thunder under ground, and felt a movement like the waves of the sea. When he rose and attempted to leave the house, he was not able to stand or walk, the whole house being shaken. Yet he escaped with his life. The whole town was turned into a heap of dust, so that the people wandered about, and did not know their way nor recognise their friends or neighbours. Many thought the end of the world had come. One Armenian, mother of many children, lost her life in attempting to rescue one child who had been left in the house. A young Armenian had left the shop where he was employed, but turned back in order to save the money which was left in the shop; he was afterwards found dead with his hand holding some rouble notes. Other striking cases occurred of people who lost their lives in attempts to save some of their property. The whole country around is still moved by volcanic action. Many of the villages and towns, besides Shemakha, were places of banishment for persecuted Stundists.

I have received some gifts for the suffering Christians, and have sent £10 to my friend; again, a second gift of £10 is in my hands to forward. I shall be grateful for further expressions of sympathy. A gift of 10s. from J.P. (postmark, Richmond) has reached me without address for acknowledgment. "If one member suffer, all members suffer."—Yours, &c.,

The Basutoland Mission.

IN the course of his recent stay in England, Rev. A. Casalis, of the Basutoland Mission, addressed a score of meetings. Auxiliary societies were formed in several places, and it is hoped that the work will benefit by wider sympathy and enlarged support. Mr. Casalis was very emphatic in urging the claims of the work upon British Christians. Founded in 1833, and carried on by the Paris Society of Evangelical Missions, the work is in a territory which has since come under British protection.

The Society in Paris has now its hands more than full, with the extensive additional work it has had to take up in Madagascar and elsewhere.

The native church of Basutoland and its evangelists, of whom there are about 160 at work, and nine ordained native pastors, have now to see to help themselves, and they have resolved to do it to the utmost of their power, with the help of outside friends. It is their earnest desire to plant new outstations in the mountainous parts of the country, where the Basutos are obliged to go and settle, owing to their rapidly increasing numbers. There is a great future before the Basutos, who have preserved their country and their independence; and are strong in their affection and loyalty to England. Peace has prevailed among them, and the Gospel has been spreading very rapidly since they last claimed the protection of this country.

Particulars as to the various auxiliaries and secretaries may be had from Mrs. Sutherland Taylor, 25, Brownswood Road, Clissold Park, N.

Thirty-Eight Years in Jaffa.

It is not given to many Christian workers to spend nearly forty years of their life in one sphere of service in the mission field. Such is the privilege of Miss Walker-Arnott, who for thirty-nine years has laboured in Jaffa. As superintendent of the Tabeetha Mission Schools, this worker has laboured with untiring energy with the high purpose of training native girls in Christian truth and life, as well as the ordinary branches of school instruction.

This is done by means of a boarding-house, in which the girls are under constant personal supervision and influence; and three schools in different parts of the town of Jaffa. The boarders, of course, are not of any one nationality or creed. Greek, Armenian, Coptic, and Protestant Christians are in constant association with Jewish and Moslem. This naturally helps to break down the barrier of exclusiveness which characterizes these classes. Kindliness and better mutual understanding take the place of jealous pride and antagonism.

It is gratifying to learn from the annual report of the favourable position of the institutions. The boarding-house session opened with thirty-eight girls. Some of the boarders pay the full sum of £10, others pay £5, and the remainder are supported by contributions from friends of the Mission. The day-schools maintain their numbers, and have an average attendance of 150. The Sunday-schools continue to make good progress, Jewish and Moslem girls not only taking Bible lessons, but in some cases giving better answers than Christian girls. The lace-making and embroidery industry show good results. The work is done by women to whom the money earned is a boon. The small loans to Jewish widows have continued to be of great service. These are used to purchase grain, which after being ground by the women is sold at a profit. The sums lent are gradually repaid.

That the Tabeetha Mission is commending itself more and more to Jews, Moslems, and Eastern Christians is proved by their willingness to accept religious and secular teaching in its schools, and pay for the privilege of residence in the boarding-house.

Communications for Miss Walker-Arnott may be addressed to her at the Tabeetha Mission Schools, Jaffa.

Waldensian Church in San Remo.

[FROM A CORRESPONDENT.]

FRIENDS of the Waldensian Missions will, I am sure, be thankful to know of the good work in progress at San Remo. On a recent Sunday I found a congregation of sixty, chiefly adults; the children attend an afternoon service. All were most attentive to the discourse by the eloquent and earnest minister. The singing was general, the simple service being full of sincerity and devotion. This represents a good deal of missionary labour, for which we may well thank God and take courage.

This is an open door here, and a cry for more labourers to "go in and possess the land." A Biblewoman would be an incalculable blessing, but there are no funds. The Waldensian Society provides for this church and ministry, and has many souls for its reward. There is another great branch of the work, and which I heard, on inquiry, depends on special collections—I refer to the Evangelical schools. There are 114 children on the roll, and one of the prettiest sights here is the annual distribution of prizes, when the children, many of whom are strikingly pretty, sing and recite, to the delight of parents and friends. Some of these latter are members of the church, but more than two-thirds are nominal Roman Catholics, many, alas! with no religion whatever. Having lost faith in their priests and the old superstitions, they, as we have heard a woman say, "cannot believe in anything beyond this life."

What an agency for good these schools must be among these unhappy people by sending to them the beautiful hymns and portions of Scripture, which the children sing and repeat perfectly! The attendance is not full just now on account of an epidemic of whooping cough. It was most cheering to see so many of the rising generation under such thorough Scriptural and secular education. Any information required will be gladly supplied by Signor Ugo Janni, minister of the Waldensian Evangelical Church, 9, Via Pierogallo, San Remo.

Melbourne Mems.

THE laity of the Church of England in Australia States are to a large extent soundly Protestant, and at a recent Synod of the Diocese of Sydney one of them brought forward the following motion, which was carried by fifty-five votes to twenty-two:—"That it is highly prejudicial to the welfare of the Church, as calculated to shake the confidence of its members in the teaching of its ministers, that books which have been declared unhistorical, doctrinally unscriptural, and retrograde, should continue to be recommended by the Australasian College of Theology to its students." He asserted that there was plenty of "millinery" connected with services in some of their churches, but there was little "heart" in them.

Rev. Digby M. Berry (Episcopal) and Cardinal Moran have been crossing swords regarding the Coronation Oath question, about which the former has been lecturing at a number of the principal towns in Victoria. The Cardinal had held out the threat that if Mr. Chamberlain did not take heed to the voice of Australian Roman Catholics, Australia might suddenly make itself independent of Great Britain!

Professor Harper (Presbyterian) and Archbishop Carr are having a public and newspaper warfare over the question of the Bible in State schools; and altogether at present the fight between the Free Churches and Romanism is coming to a crisis in the Commonwealth of Australia.

The Baptist Union meetings and the Presbyterian Assembly gatherings are over, and after a two months' spell of religious dissipation, and the coming in of some trying, hot days, people are sobering down to ordinary every-day work with fuller consecration, and with renewed zeal and energy in the service of the Master, for there have been times of refreshing and soul-quickening in these last two months.

On Foreign Mission night among the Presbyterians, Rev. Dr. J. G. Paton was present, and received a great ovation. He had collected £13,000 for the New Hebrides Mission during his trip to America and Britain. On Home Mission night a Presbyterian Church Festival was held in the Town Hall, which was packed, many persons standing during the public meeting presided over by the Governor-General, Lord Hopetoun, who is a Presbyterian elder. His opening remarks indicated his warm sympathy for true religion, and for the Church of his ancestors.

Notes from Dunedin.

NOW restored to health and vigour, Dr. H. Grattan Guinness is literally working his way home. Most encouraging reports have reached us of missions held in Melbourne, Sydney, and Tasmania. In every place large crowds have gathered to hear, and many have been blessed.

In Dunedin the mission lasted from Jan. 19 to Feb. 2. The Sunday afternoon gatherings for men only have been attended by about 2,000, and the addresses have been intensely practical and full of power. Each Sunday a large number remained for personal dealing.

The evening meetings have grown in numbers and interest, whilst the afternoon Bible readings have been times of great refreshing. The town has seldom been so stirred as by this mission. Dr. Guinness' eloquent and Scriptural messages have taken hold of the people.

Some of your readers may be interested in knowing that on February 2 I start with my family for the homeland. We join the Grosser Kurfurst at Melbourne, and are due in Southampton about March 25. A farewell meeting, very largely attended, was held at the Hanover Street Schoolroom on Friday, January 24.

GEORGE WAINWRIGHT.

Scandinavian Sailors' Home.

THE Scandinavian Sailors' Temperance Home, close to the West India Docks Station, on the Blackwall Line, is an institution far less known than it rightly deserves among Christian people. With the exception of men of the Mongolian race, its doors are open for seafaring men from all over the world. True, those of Scandinavian nationality form the bulk of the guests, and there is probably not a hut or cottage within miles of the Norwegian fjords, or among the thousands of islets which gird the Swedish coasts, where the name of the Home, and of those who look after it, is not known and loved. Hundreds in all lands are yearly added to the number of those who yearn to visit once more the place, where perhaps for the first time they were urged to give their hearts to Jesus.

It is not only among the humbler class of people that these friends are to be found. On several occasions members of our own Royal household, and of those of other countries, have visited the Home, and expressed their admiration for the work. Queen Alexandra, when Princess of Wales, in company with the Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Denmark, some years ago spent a happy hour within its walls. The latest Royal visit to the Home was that of King Oscar of Sweden and Norway in April, 1900, when, on entering the building, his Majesty addressed the sailors in a short seaman-like speech, urging them to look beyond the sphere of this temporal life, for, said the King, "it was only by gazing across the depths towards the height, that they could learn to sail aright."

Though the Home is to all intents and purposes a mission work, it is being conducted as far as practicable upon sound business lines, and has now, after many years of strenuous effort, become self-supporting. In an institution of this nature, the secular part of the work must needs constitute a prominent part, and one of the most important branches is that of taking care of the hard-earned wages of the men. Though their savings must of a necessity be comparatively small, no less than £200,000 has been remitted to their families or to savings banks through the instrumentality of the Home; and when it is remembered that by far the greater part of this amount would have been squandered away in the numerous public houses of the neighbourhood, had it not been for the incessant appeals of the workers, it must be admitted that the result is gratifying.

The accommodation is now quite inadequate, especially in the officers' department, to deal with the numerous applications for admittance, and the committee of management has therefore decided to extend the premises. An adjoining piece of ground has already been bought, and it is hoped that building operations may be begun forthwith. To complete this scheme the sum of £3,000 is still required.

Buenos Ayres.—The following words from Mr. R. A. Barton form yet another testimony to the readiness with which the Gospel is heard, even in some Roman Catholic centres of population:—"There are thousands of young men in this city who would unhesitatingly acknowledge the truth of Evangelical teaching, though of course we do not say they would as unhesitatingly accept it. We make this statement as a result of time spent working in offices with typical specimens of the youth of Buenos Ayres. Attend one of the four or five open-air meetings in this city of 800,000 souls, and you will see numbers of people listening intently, and at the conclusion of the service the tracts to be distributed are simply 'rushed' by the audience. The people of Buenos Ayres will listen to the old, old story; that they are ripe to receive pure religion in place of the hollow mockery of Romanism; that socialism, atheism, infidelity, anarchy, and utter worldliness, rush eagerly to occupy the place we hesitate to take; and that our great sin as the Church of the living God in respect to this great city, is neglect—these are painful facts."

The "Tombs Angel."

MANY will learn with regret of the death of Mrs. Rebecca Salome Foster, of New York, who lost her life in the recent destructive fire at the Park Avenue Hotel in that city.

Mrs. Foster was well known in the police-courts and prisons of New York as "The Tombs Angel"—"The Tombs" being one of the city's most noted and conspicuous prisons. She was the widow of General John A. Foster, a lawyer who served in the Civil War. At one time she was thought to be moderately wealthy, but nearly all her income was spent upon the poor and unfortunate.

A FRIEND OF THE ERRING.

For fifteen years Mrs. Foster had devoted herself to practical charity. She worked specially among the women prisoners at the Tombs, giving them advice, questioning them, and, where she found worthy cases, appealing to magistrates in their behalf. She was often instrumental in gaining for those whom she recommended judicial mercy, release from custody, and a new start in life. She visited police courts, and was known and trusted by many magistrates, who treated her with great courtesy. She worked without remuneration, and represented no church, society, or organization. Because of the character of the woman, it has been said that, nine times out of ten, if she spoke to a magistrate on a prisoner's behalf the latter would be discharged.

A touching tribute to Mrs. Foster's memory was paid in the Court of Special Sessions when District Attorney Jerome spoke of the loss which had befallen the city. Mr. Jerome was labouring under deep emotion, and wept as he spoke, while there were many other tear-dimmed eyes in the room. Mr. Jerome said of the departed lady:—"For many years she came and went among us with but a single purpose—

That men might rise on stepping-stones
Of their dead selves to higher things.

"There is a word which to us, who in the administration of the criminal law are daily brought into contact with the misfortune and sin of humanity, seems almost a lost word. It is the word 'holy.' In all that that word means to English-speaking peoples, it seems to me it could be applied to her. She was indeed a 'holy woman.'"

"A FLOWER OF REMEMBRANCE."

In granting a motion to adjourn, Justice Holbrook said:

"It is eminently proper that we should briefly interrupt our regular proceedings and pause for the moment to plant a flower of remembrance, evincing our regard for that noble and saintly woman—Mrs. Foster—not inaptly called and known as the 'Tombs Angel,' whose tragic and pathetic death has so greatly saddened our hearts. Mrs. Foster was known to, and highly respected by, all who frequent this court. Perhaps none knew her better than the members of this bench on whom she was wont to call almost daily in the performance of her benevolent work. To the erring and wayward, her large, generous, womanly heart ever went out with sincere and deep sympathy. Her appearance at the dark and gloomy prison cell, to the inmates was like the entrance of a veritable sunbeam. Numberless lonely and weary hearts have been cheered, gladdened, and made even radiant by her ministrations and words of good cheer; and numberless, too, are those who, having strayed from the straight and narrow way, were brought back by her sweet influences to paths of rectitude and virtue.

"On behalf of my associates and myself, I wish to express the profound grief we experience at the seemingly untimely translation to the higher life of this gentle and humane woman. As a slight token of our esteem, and as a perpetual reminder of her good works, the clerk will cause these proceedings to be entered upon the minutes of this court."

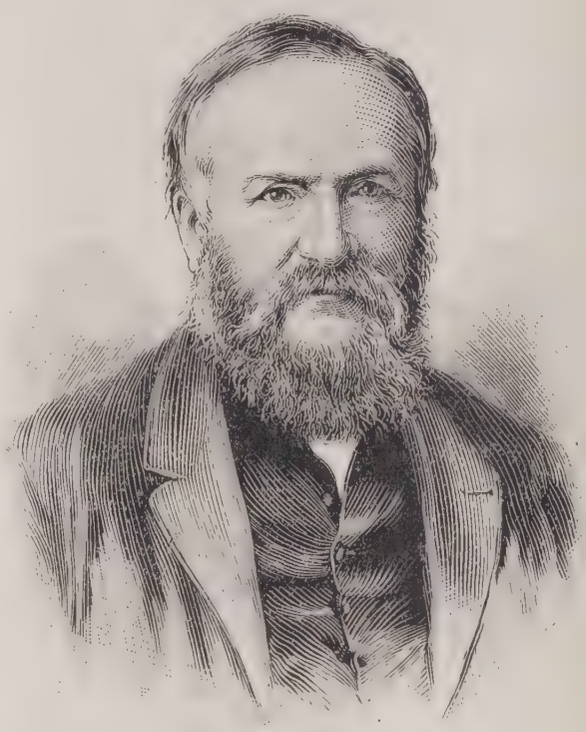
The funeral service was attended by all sorts and conditions of people, conspicuous among whom were representatives of both Bench and Bar from many of the city courts. The prisoners in the Tombs sent a beautiful wreath of roses and ivy. ROGER MARTIN.

A Succourer of Many.

MR. OPIE RODWAY, OF STROUD.

THIS highly-esteemed and beloved servant of the Lord, who is now over eighty years of age, has been confined to his bed for several months past. He began business in Stroud when he was about twenty years old. He was very successful, and soon began to save money, and also to love it. After some years, however, he felt that money could not satisfy him, but he found satisfaction in trusting Christ as his personal Saviour.

Soon after his conversion, more than forty-two years ago, he resolved that he would only keep a certain sum; all over this he would give away or use in the Lord's work. The first money he had over, he used in building the People's Hall for religious services in Stroud, and here he began to hold Gospel meetings. He was soon asked to visit other places to hold evangelistic services, and in this work he was greatly owned of God in the salvation of souls. Thereafter he gave the greatest part of his time to the work of conducting missions. Frequently meeting with Christians who needed a change of scene and air, but were without means to obtain it, he was led to purchase a fine old residence in Stroud, "Tower Hill House," which he opened free as a Convalescent Home, and took in from 120 to 150 patients a year.



MR. OPIE RODWAY.

From Photograph by Messrs. Merrett Bros., Russell Street, Stroud.

God so prospered Mr. Rodway in business, that he was able to support and keep the Home open for twenty-seven years out of the profits of his business. He also resolved, when he gave himself up to mission work, that he would not receive any payment for his services, and he also paid his own railway fare everywhere. Hence he visited many places where local friends were not in a position to pay for special services. He worked hard, having two businesses to look after, and the supervision of the Convalescent Home. His services were in great demand; he had often six months' engagements in hand. This work he carried on for thirty-eight years, having, at the time he gave up in consequence of weak health, over twelve months' engagements booked. He held, on an average, from 250 to 300 meetings a year.

Mr. Rodway was compelled to give up public work owing to weakness of the heart. He has been a blessing to hundreds of people, both as regards body and soul. It is now a great joy and comfort to him to know that many who were brought to Christ at his meetings are preaching the Gospel, both at home and abroad. Among these are Rev. A. E. Pearce, of America, and Rev. A. T. Jones, of Newport, Mon. The latter has been pastor of Duckpool Road Baptist Church for over twenty-five years.

Mr. Rodway desires the prayers of God's people, that he may have much of the Master's presence in his affliction, and that he and his dear wife may have the blessed assurance that at eventide it will be light.

Christ Alone Our High Priest.*

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JUST AS I AM."

I NEED no other priest
Than my High Priest above—
His intercession ne'er has ceased
Since first I knew his love—
THROUGH THAT my faith shall never fail,
Even when passing death's dark vale.

I need no other plea
With which to approach my God,
Than his own mercy, boundless, free,
THROUGH CHRIST on man bestowed—
A Father's love, a Father's care,
Receives and answers every prayer.

I need no human ear
In which to pour my prayer;
My Great High Priest is ever near,
On Him I cast my care—
To Him, HIM ONLY, I confess,
Who can alone absolve and bless.

I need no works, by me
Wrought with laborious care—
To form a meritorious plea
Why I heaven's bliss should share.
CHRIST'S FINISHED WORK, through boundless grace,
Has there secured my dwelling-place.

I need no prayers to saints,
Beads, relics, martyrs, shrines—
Hardships 'neath which the spirit faints,
Yet still sore burdened pines;
CHRIST'S SERVICE yields my soul delight,
Easy his yoke, his burden light.

I need no other book
To guide my steps to heaven,
Than that on which I daily look,
By GOD'S OWN SPIRIT given.
And this, when He illumes our eyes,
"Unto salvation makes us wise."

I need no holy oil
To anoint my lips in death;
No priestly power my guilt to assoil,
And aid my parting breath:
Long since those words bade fear to cease,
"Thy faith hath saved thee; go in peace."

I need no human prop
In that last awful strife;
CHRIST IS MY REFUGE—CHRIST MY HOPE,
My way, my truth, my life!
On his own promise I rely,
He that believeth ne'er shall die.

I need no priestly mass,
No purgatorial fires,
My soul to anneal, my guilt to efface,
When this brief life expires—
CHRIST DIED my eternal life to win—
His blood has cleansed me from all sin.

I need no other dress,
I urge no other claim,
Than HIS UNSPOTTED RIGHTEOUSNESS;
IN HIM COMPLETE I AM—
Heaven's portals at that word fly wide,
No passport do I need beside.

Dock Labourers' Mission.—The twenty-ninth annual report of the Dock Labourers' Mission (secretary, Mr. C. H. Coleman, 150, Boleyn Road, West Ham Park, E.) states that during the past year the work has been much blessed, especially among the sick and starving poor. "The casual labourers are a great body of poor men, most of whom have been in better circumstances, and are driven to the dock gates and wharves by depression of trade and old age. Our poor are honest and sober; we have discriminated them from the loafer element."

A Blind Man's Life-Work.

Mr. Francis J. Campbell, LL.D.

ROYAL NORMAL COLLEGE FOR THE BLIND.

IT is yet open to the historian or critic to try to balance the influence of Briton on American, and what American has done for Briton; to set down, if possible, how each has helped to mould the character of the other. Any such attempt, however, would have to include the interchange of Christian thought and method in the pulpit and in evangelistic and philanthropic effort. The influence of the American evangelist, D. L. Moody, on our religious life, of Mr. Peabody on our philanthropy, would have to be considered. We in turn have sent to America men who wrought "better than they knew" in drawing together the two great nations.

In the ranks of the former will be found the subject of this life-sketch. Born in Tennessee on October 9, 1832, for three and a half years Francis Joseph Campbell romped with his brothers in the sunlight, until the day, not a fatal day, when playing in the yard the thorn of an acacia tree was run into his eye. Unskilful treatment deprived him entirely of the sight of both eyes. It was a sad day at the farm house. But the calamity of 1836 has been instrumental in bringing hope and gladness and comfort to numberless homes in subsequent generations.

But we must go back. In those days the blind, if cared for at all, were forbidden to do many of the thousand things that make up daily life, lest they should injure themselves. It followed, therefore, that the boy Francis Joseph stood a good chance of being spoilt; in truth, he was a spoilt child until he was six years old, when, almost by accident, it was found that he could cut wood without cutting himself. From that time the good sense of the father over-ruled his fears, and he took special pains to train the boy in farm work.

How, when twelve years old, young Campbell was sent to school, how he was tested as to musical talent, but could not tell one tune from another; how he learned to play, but secretly—all this is best told in the pages of "Plain Speaking," a volume by the author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," in which will also be found the story of Mr. Campbell's early struggles to give himself a university education.

After a strenuous life, which had made its mark on methods for teaching the blind in America, a complete breakdown compelled this restless man to visit Europe, but not to rest; he had but one aim, to ameliorate the condition of the blind, and every subject was studied that could help towards the fulfilment of this purpose.

In January, 1871, accompanied by his wife and son, Mr. Campbell turned his face homeward, but while detained for a few days in London, a gentleman staying at the same hotel proposed his attending a meeting for indigent blind, to which he himself was going. That night, we are told in his own words, was to him "a sleepless night," and with the decision which characterises him he informed Mrs. Campbell in the morning that they must delay their journey. A letter of introduction to Dr. Armitage, the well-known friend of the blind, was now made use of, and with united energies they set to work. Dr. Armitage had lost his sight when serving as medical officer during the Crimean War; in 1868 he established the British and Foreign Blind Association, and he now, with Mr. C. A. Miner, urged Mr. Campbell to remain in England.

The homeward journey to America was not completed, but instead three small houses near the Crystal Palace were secured, and a school begun, March 1, 1872, which, two years later, was removed to the present site of the Royal Normal College for the Blind. Here the work has grown and prospered. Dr. Campbell's system of educating the blind is a marvellous success, and what his pupils can accomplish is almost incredible. Visitors are admitted to the college, and may see for themselves what it is difficult to describe.

One of the most striking results is seen in the happy demeanour of the pupils. All are occupied, all are happy. The hopeless and helpless become changed beings, fearless and self-reliant, under the influence and training of "the doctor," whose own life is a daily inspiration. A glance at the last of Dr. and Mrs. Campbell's Christmas letters, sent out yearly to their old pupils, tells us of the brilliant success of two of the girl students, one of them having won two prizes for English literature and English history, as well as a scholarship, and the first prize for hygiene. All the other competitors had the blessing of eye-sight.

The other achievement was that of a young lady who won one of the Mendelssohn prizes at the Royal Academy of Music, Berlin; this was rendered the more remarkable because of the blind being excluded as students from this Academy. The hall of the Normal College bears on its walls eloquent testimony to the successes and honours gained by a former student who has recently passed away. It has been proved beyond doubt that music, when properly taught, is the best profession for the blind, and the fact that Dr. Campbell's Academy of Music has received the cordial recognition of the musical profession, settles the question as to the thoroughness of his system. It may here be mentioned that on April 25, an orchestral concert will be given at Queen's Hall, at which the choir and musicians will undertake parts. The Prince and Princess of Wales intend to be present, and to receive purses on behalf of the institute. Our late beloved Queen, as patron, took a kindly interest in the college from the beginning, and a few weeks before her death an intimation was sent to Dr. Campbell that she would be pleased to receive the pupils again at Windsor.

The great object the Principal and his executive committee have always kept in view, is to qualify the students to become self-supporting; for this reason therefore, in addition to giving a good general education, their aim is to impart a musical training and technical instruction equal to that which is given to the sighted in the best schools of music. Dr. Campbell insists that it is necessary not only to have good teaching and superintendence of practice, but an ample supply of good musical instruments. At the College, five organs and 100 pianos are employed. As in literature, the Braille system is in use for music. It was introduced from Paris by the late Dr. Armitage, through whose untiring efforts and generosity the blind throughout the English-speaking world may now obtain the best literature and the best music. It is an interesting fact that a Braille typewriter has recently been invented in America, and a Braille shorthand-writing machine at Birmingham.

It would be difficult to convey an idea of all that comes into the department of physical education. We are told that ordinary lessons are of far less importance than teaching the children to be active and playful. This they become soon after their admission to the college, every inducement to activity being offered in the play and other beautiful grounds, which, it should be observed, were not laid out by Dr. Campbell with assistance, but from his own design. This may sound strangely to those who do not know the subject of our sketch. It may interest them yet more to hear that he has related, "What a blind man saw from the top of Mont Blanc," for he was the first blind man who ever accomplished the feat of climbing that mountain.

A thorough system of physical development, Dr. Campbell maintains, must be the basis for the whole education of the blind, his experience having proved "that, as a class, the blind are timid, awkward, and helpless; energy, indomitable courage, and fixed determination are usually wanting." He begins by making them believe that it is possible to be independent of the help of others, and to do all that others can do, except SEE; he then places within their reach the means needed to call out and cultivate these qualities. The gymnasium has been repeatedly improved, and is now pronounced most complete and unique. Added to this is the girls' gymnasium, with an excellent floor for roller skating; the lakelet, where rowing is taught; the large swimming bath, where the methods of the Life-Saving Society are acquired by the pupils; and lastly, the twelve-in-hand cycle, which will carry its party over a run of fifty miles into the country and back.

One of the most useful branches in the early education of children is the technical training. It not only teaches them to use their hands, rousing the perceptive faculties and physical activity, but fits the boy who has no gifts for literary work or music to become a skilful mechanic.

The religious training is neither sectarian nor narrow. Parties of pupils, varying as to numbers, attend service at the parish church and Nonconformist churches. Those who are members of the Children's Scripture Union are encouraged in regular reading of the Bible, by being provided with the daily portions in Braille.

The pupils under Dr. and Mrs. Campbell's care number about 150. Of these a few private pupils pay a fixed sum, as they would at any other boarding-school. Some are paid for by charitable subscriptions and donations, and the Gardner Trust for the Blind grants a number of scholarships which cover two-thirds of the cost. The Principal earnestly desires that the lives which otherwise must remain hopeless and joyless may be made useful and self-maintaining. In this noble purpose he and his committee may be helped, since their efforts are greatly limited by lack of funds. The burden which has practically rested on one man should be lightened, for we have to remember that his life has been given to improving the condition of our blind, and not those of his own land.

The subject of this sketch is the man rather than his work, yet the man and his work are indissolubly united; and as we dwell upon the self-sacrificing devotion, the courage, and energy which have brought about such wonderful results, we recognise our debt to America, and thank God for the blind lad He trained and sent to us from Tennessee. Yet Dr. Campbell would say again what he once said to us of his work, "the Builder is God."

The Home of Industry.

THE work at the Home of Industry during the past winter has had the smile of our heavenly Father, for which we ask kind friends to join us in thanksgiving. Our various Sunday-schools, Bible-classes, and meetings have been well attended, both by the aged and the young; and we have rejoiced in the healthful outcome, children bringing their companions to join the meetings. It has been good to see some of the parents and adult relatives at the special Band of Hope gatherings, listening to the Scriptures, the recitations, and Gospel temperance songs, from the lips of the little ones. Thus homes have been changed, becoming scenes of peace and happiness, and parents have begun to work for the good of others.

Every godly influence must be at work if we are to save the young. During the past few weeks about ninety boys and girls have avowed themselves on the Lord's side, the fruit of the United Mission to our Bethnal Green Sunday-Schools. We are looking shortly to send forth another band of well-trained children to Canada. Hundreds of good openings, with abundance of every good thing, are awaiting our bonnie bairnies, and this ever since 1870, when we first went forth with a hundred boys to our own Colony, which bids fair to be the first country that shall nobly wave the flag for prohibition. We rejoice that the thousands growing and grown up there are free from the terrible temptations to drink which beset our young people here. In Canada it is good food, and plenty of it, for honest healthy work.

Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales (who, with her revered mother, the Duchess of Teck, often paid us visits, taking deep interest in the children in training) writes for our encouragement that she inquired about the children from the Home of Industry wherever she went in Canada, and found that they were doing well. We thank God and take courage, asking continually your prayers, kind readers, and thanking you for your sympathy and most kind contributions through The Christian, or sent direct to us. Among the Jews.

THE MILDMAY MISSION.

CHRISTIAN work among the Jews has come to be regarded, in the eyes of many, as mere specialised philanthropy. So far as the more vigorous organisations in London are concerned, this is a very inadequate description. Assuredly the Mildmay Mission is, first and foremost, a Christian agency, aiming, by many and varied operations, to make Christ known to the Jewish people. Both by profession and practice, the workers seek to preach Christ "to the Jew first, and also to the Gentile," keeping on such lines that genuine heart conversion, the work of the Holy Ghost, may be the outcome of their endeavours, whether or no baptism is observed.

I looked in at the Gospel service, in the Central Hall, Philpot Street, E., on Saturday last. Had I wished to examine the work in its breadth and depth, I should have chosen another day, when the benefits of the Medical Mission might be witnessed; a time when something could be seen of the happy band of Hebrew Christians who make the Hall their rallying place; or some evening when the great subject of Messianic prophecy might be followed, as earnestly discussed by the missionaries and inquirers, as is the case week by week. My visit on Saturday afternoon, however, had a definite object—How goes the work of preaching, and how does the Jew listen to the Gospel message?

THE MESSAGE.

As to the preaching, it is pursued on the old lines, and its subject remains the same. Whatever the standing of the preacher may be, certain it is that his work is an ordinance of the Gospel: "Christ sent me. . . . to preach the Gospel. . . . It pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe. . . . We preach Christ crucified. . . . unto them which are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God, and the wisdom of God" (1 Cor. i. 17-24). The subject of the addresses on Saturday was after the Apostolic model—Christ in his ministry and atonement, in his risen majesty and indwelling by the Holy Ghost. The proceedings were led by Mr. J. Clancy, and the first address was by Rev. H. Goodman, who spoke in Yiddish. It was a good and timely word, based upon Psa. xxiii. 1. To talk about God's shepherd-care to East London Jews—lonesome and careworn, and if at all religious, beset with fears whereby they are "all their life-time subject to bondage"—is to strike a tender and winning note. To introduce thereby the claims and teachings of the Good Shepherd, who gave his life for the sheep, and who said: "I know mine own, and mine own know me" (John x. 14) is to present the Gospel in its most charming aspects. From the Psalmist's "my Shepherd," the preacher derived helpful points and lessons on Safety, Certainty, and Enjoyment—strange conceptions for the Jew, but all the more needing to be lovingly enforced. In words of personal testimony and earnest appeal, the preacher made his message cogent and strong. Dr. Dixon delivered an English address, also on Psa. xxiii.

THE HEARING.

As to the hearers—they listened admirably. There were women as well as men in the audience, which, as I understood, included some attendants who, after years of listening, yet hesitate to "come over the line." It takes them long to count the cost. If asked the plain and pointed question, such would doubtless declare themselves believers in Christ; but not as yet do they believe on Him, with a simple trust, joined with a disciple's submissive obedience. May the Good Shepherd soon find them! The company sang as well as they could, and evinced no objection to the most pronounced sentiments of the Faith in song. They seemed to entertain sincere respect for the workers, which is a great contrast with the general experiences of missionaries to Israel twenty or thirty years ago. Among others who took part in the proceedings were Rev. E. B. Samuel, who read the Scriptures in Hebrew, and Rev. Samuel Wilkinson, who closed the meeting with some loving words. Gershom.

Twenty-Seven Years' Services in a Theatre.

THE evangelistic services in the Metropolitan Music-hall, conducted by Mr. Charles Cook, will close for another season on Easter Sunday, completing twenty-seven years of aggressive work, wherein many souls have been converted and become useful in the Lord's work.

At a recent meeting the following testimony was given by an evangelist who has two mission halls in different villages, a tent, and a Bible carriage in full work:—"Over twenty years ago I entered this theatre, and was awakened and alarmed by the text of the preacher: 'If the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?' I was a careless, godless sailor, and so terrified was I that I had all but jumped overboard to end my life.

"Arriving in Calcutta, I went to a service on a floating 'Bethel,' and, when it closed, went on deck to ask the minister what I could do to be saved; but finding him smoking and joking, I determined to have no more to do with religion.

"Eventually I went to hear good General Haig preach, and was dealt with by a wise worker. I accepted Christ, and the gentleman, knowing the temptation of a sailor, asked, 'Shall I drive you down to the ship?' Being full of faith, I replied, 'No; the God who has saved me can keep me.' On reaching the vessel I confessed Christ to my shipmates aboard, and waited also till every man who had 'been ashore' came on board, and God enabled me—officers and men alike—to tell everyone that the Lord Jesus had saved me. I entreated them also to accept Christ. In later years I became an evangelist, and am now leaving for the villages of Herefordshire. I have never been in this building since until to-night, and feel it my duty to bear witness to the faithful preaching of our brother, which awakened me, and who has again declared the message with the same fervour and zeal."

This friend took the meeting at Hyde Park Hall on a subsequent week evening. The following Sunday evening a working-man said in the after-meeting: "Fifteen years ago my wife was converted here, and soon afterwards I also turned to God through her influence. We have had joy and peace ever since."

The services of the Theatre last for six or seven months in the year, and it is surely a record for one man to have sustained them for so long, doing nearly the whole of the preaching. Added to this, Mr. Cook has preached incessantly for thirty years in Hyde Park four and five nights in the week, and sustained the indoor week-nights at Hyde Park Hall for twenty-eight years.

On visiting the service last Sunday, we found Mr. J. B. Wookey preaching to a splendid audience, and were sorry to hear the report that Mr. Cook was very unwell. Having consulted two specialists, he has been imperatively ordered to rest for a time. The overstrain of conducting what has been acknowledged the largest regular open-air meeting in the world for so many years, besides carrying on the work in the theatre—which seats 3,000—has been too much for him, and affected his lungs, and heart, and throat. We should be glad to hear of his being able to have at least three months' entire rest, and then to engineer more and do less.

The converts in the past, from the Park alone, represent over twenty-five nationalities; and we ask the prayers of our readers for this unique work and the workman.

Mr. Cook—who alone is responsible, and has raised almost £1,000 a year to carry on the work—has hitherto had all his needs supplied; there is now, however, lacking some £100 to pay the remaining rent of Theatre and Hyde Park Hall for the past three months. We feel sure the Lord's stewards will gladly help our worthy brother who has given his life's health and strength, and who has so long borne the heat and burden of the day, and allow him to seek rest, apart from anxiety. Mr. Cook's address is 6, Frithville Gardens, Shepherds Bush, London, W.

SUNDAY, March 23. Exodus vii.

THE opening verses of this chapter must be considered as the answer to Moses' complaint that his lips were uncircumcised, and ill-fitted to carry the messages of Jehovah. How often a similar complaint arises, as we have reasoned with ourselves. There is nothing for us but to show the sore wound, and pray God to heal it.

Then with a ripple and a radiance thro' me
Rise and be manifest, O Morning Star!
Flow on my soul, Thou Spirit, and renew me,
Fill with Thyself, and let the rest be far.

After all, what are we? It is God that worketh out his own good pleasure in us, by us, and in fellowship with our poor lives. Moses' part was but a small one in the Divine programme, which was fully revealed to him in these memorable words.

The names of two of Egypt's wise men are given by the Apostle Paul (2 Tim. iii. 8). The great world of evil which lies all around us, and is always waiting to resist the good, can counterfeit our miracles. Even now there is a worldly religion which borrows its power from the fact of resembling in so many characteristics genuine devotion. The magicians of Egypt probably used jugglery, as the Indian snake-charmers do, and their failure to produce the lice or gnats demonstrated their inferiority. Still Pharaoh thought that there was enough to warrant his belief that Jehovah had no special claim over him, or that He was not superior to his own gods, and so he closed his heart against the impression that knocked at its door. For "He hardened Pharaoh's heart," (v. 13), read, "Pharaoh's heart was hardened" (R.V.)

The smiting of the Nile-god was the first of a series of wonders designed to prove Jehovah's superiority to the gods of Egypt, and to let the Egyptians know that they might not trifle with his demands. Be still; God will always vindicate Himself. He will yet show Himself stronger than the devil and all his hosts.

MONDAY, March 24. Exodus viii.

Three plagues are mentioned in this chapter. First, of frogs, which was intolerable. The magicians seemed to be able to produce them, but they could not do what would have been much more serviceable, remove them. Then, of lice, which might be rendered gnats or mosquitoes. These the magicians acknowledged to be due to the finger of God. Next, of flies. Some think that the beetle is here intended, which was one of the sacred animals of the Egyptians, and is extremely voracious.

Pharaoh again and again asked for deliverance, but evidently he was more anxious to be relieved of his sufferings than to effect a moral amendment. Moses was only too glad to yield to his wishes: "Glory over me," he said, i.e., "regard me as thy servant, willing to do thy will, if only thou wilt yield to Jehovah." Evidently the coming and passing of these plagues were in some mysterious manner connected with Moses' attitude before God (12, 13, 29, 30, 31). What a wonderful statement—"The Lord did according to the word of Moses!"

But the process by which we come into this close identification with God is not an easy one. It is one of fire and blood!

Oh, could I tell, ye surely would believe it!
Oh, could I only say what I have seen!
How should I tell, or how can ye receive it,
How, till He bringeth you where I have been?

Therefore, O Lord, I will not fail nor falter,
Nay, but I ask it—nay, but I desire,
Lay on my lips thine embers of the altar,
Seal with the sting and furnish with the fire.

TUESDAY, March 25. Exodus ix.

Here also are three plagues! A grievous murrain destroys all the cattle in the fields of Egypt, for the plagues seem to be on an ascending scale. But a cordon of protection is set around those of Israel. The Lord can set his angel-guards around those whom He loves, and their belongings. In this and in its happening at a set time (5), Pharaoh must have been convinced that the plague was no ordinary calamity. The boils and blains that broke out, even on the magicians themselves, were no more prevalent with Pharaoh than the preceding plagues. When they were removed, he was as obdurate as ever. It is said that the Lord hardened his heart, i.e., all the Divine dealings with him, that were intended to soften and subdue him, really were the means of making him confirmed in evil. He turned to evil what God meant for good. The ice that melts and freezes again is the strongest. Lastly, hail and fire. Already the plagues were having an effect on the Egyptians, for they that feared the Lord withdrew their cattle into shelter. Terrible damage was done to the crops, for the flax had just come into blossom; and the stalk of the barley was stiff so that it snapped, whilst the wheat and rye had not risen to a stalk, and so would yield.

What a contrast between Pharaoh, whose obduracy caused God's mighty power to be known, and Moses, with his outspread hands! Yet, the same contrasts meet us still. In the light of judgment, many say, "I have sinned;" but there is no true repentance. How different the cry of the true penitent—"Before I was afflicted, I went astray, but now I have kept thy word."

WEDNESDAY, March 26. Exodus x.

Thou must believe, my soul, that thy God is here, the God whom thou knowest in Jesus Christ, the God who so loved the world that He gave his only-begotten Son. He loved Pharaoh also; and it was only because he set himself against his will that these awful words were spoken, which strike terror into men's hearts whenever they read them (1, 2). But remember that the same fate may befal thee, unless thou heedest well the lessons of his Holy Spirit. Have the locusts come to thee, also? Are the green things of thy life being devoured? Is there so complete a consumption that the land is bare and the heavens dark? Be very sure that there is some sin which needs putting away, some pride of heart which needs humbling.

"Let the men go." What is that but the old advice, "Surrender at discretion"? Pharaoh's servants were wiser than Pharaoh. There must be no conditions, no terms, nothing but the yielding of our will and life to God, to do his will in the strength of his might. In the old feudal days, when the vassal did his homage to his lord, he put his hands together, and put them within the hands of his lord in token of absolute submission to his will, and readiness for activity in his work. That must be our position. It is the only true position for a Christian's hands and heart and will. Let us resolve that it shall be our position; else that darkness will overtake us, of which Egypt's ninth plague is the emblem.

Notice how Pharaoh tried to barter with God, reducing his demands, yielding this and that which were not so essential, so long as he could somehow keep hold of the people. If only he kept their cattle, he felt sure that they must come back. Yes, we will do anything rather than surrender the last foothold of ground where our self-will is entrenched.

THURSDAY, March 27. Exodus xi.

It would seem as though vv. 1-3 contain a secret revelation, which was made in the heart of Moses, whilst he was still standing before Pharaoh during this last interview. The purport of it was conveyed by Moses immediately in the words recorded from v. 4.

Mark those majestic words: "About midnight will I go out." Note how absolutely God identifies Himself with his people. It is not that they go out, He sending them, but He goes out, they accompanying Him. This identification pervades the Scripture. "Whence shall we buy bread that these may eat?" And, again, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou Me?" The Lord is in the midst of his Church, by the Holy Spirit, and it is so absolutely infilled by his Presence that it is described as his Body and Temple.

What a marvellous power God is able to exert, that, as here, men will come finally to wish that done which once they most vehemently antagonized and resisted! It is one proof of the working of a great personal agent in the affairs of men, that these great moral revolutions take place in our hearts and purposes. God can absolutely reverse the strongest influences that now grip and control us. He can break the power of the tyrant. Whatever be the evil thing that holds you, He can and will compel it to let you go. Be of good cheer!

He breaks the power of cancelled sin,
He sets the prisoner free,
His blood can make the vilest clean,
His blood availed for me.

FRIDAY, March 28. Exodus xii.

A great chapter! Might it not be called the Redemption chapter? The Redemption day is the true beginning, from which everything else dates (2). "A lamb for an house"—here we have family religion (3). "His neighbour next"—here we have the love that will not go to heaven alone (4). "Without blemish"—so was the Lord Jesus. "A male of the first year"—He died in his prime (5). "The tenth until the fourteenth day"—it was just three years between the designation of John the Baptist and Christ's death. "Between the two evenings"—it was at that hour that He gave up the ghost (6 marg.). "They shall eat the flesh"—and to us life is a perpetual feeding. "Roast with fire"—Ah, how the fever dried Him up like a pot-sherd! "With unleavened bread"—He did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth. "Ye shall let nothing remain of it until the morning"—ere He died, He said, "It is finished," and his body was not permitted to remain on the cross. "Ye shall eat it with your loins girded"—it is even thus we daily feed on the flesh and drink the blood of the Son of Man, for we know that this is not our rest, and we desire the abiding city to which every time-beat is bearing us. "When I see the blood, I will pass over"—we may not be able to see it, it may be that doubts and fears sweep across our heart, but it is enough that God sees it.

At last the night of Exodus came, and the people were driven out. In their haste to get rid of them, the Egyptians did not hesitate to answer their request ("borrowed" is asked, 35) by giving them precious jewels, which were a payment for years of gratuitous service; and in serried ranks, not as a rabble of slaves, the hosts of the redeemed went forth.

Henceforth the first-born were, in a peculiar sense, to be set apart for God. In after years, the tribe of Levi was substituted for them; but even so, every eldest son was regarded in the light of this wonderful redemption night. Oh, that it were so in our Christian households, and that one child, one son, the eldest, should be led to view himself as claimed by God for his more direct work in the world!

The yearly memory of their redemption was enforced on Israel by the observance of the Passover Supper, in some such way as we "remember" a yet greater redemption by the recurring Lord's Supper. Both of these point on to the Marriage Supper of the Lamb. And all our life is to be lived as in that Passover memory, for Christ, our Passover, is sacrified for us, and we must keep the feast, not with the old leaven, but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth.

God, we are told, led them about (18). Not by the direct road to Palestine, but by the circuitous route of the desert, lest they should see war and be discouraged, and that He might be able to teach and discipline them in the school of Sinai. That is such a glint of light on the mystery of our lives—we are led about, through the way of the wilderness. But Canaan is our goal.

All doubts were removed by the presence of the cloud that guided them by day, and screened them with its fleecy folds from the heat, and shone like a watch-fire of defence at night; and that cloud for us is the perpetual presence of our Lord, manifested through the Holy Spirit to our hearts.

F. B. M.

FREE CHURCHMEN IN COUNCIL AT BRADFORD.

(BY OUR SPECIAL COMMISSIONER.)

A YEAR OF PROGRESS AND A HOPEFUL OUTLOOK.

AFTER the opening addresses reported in our last issue, the National Council of Evangelical Free Churches was occupied on Tuesday with various public questions. Mr. Albert Spicer opened by claiming that the Nonconformist Churches should have powers conferred on them by which they may compulsorily acquire land for the erection of places of worship, where it has been found impossible to do so by purchase; and for the enfranchisement on equitable terms of leasehold erections. A strong case for an alteration in the law as it stands was made out by Mr. Spicer and by Mr. Herbert Lewis, M.P.

PRACTICAL POLITICS.

The audience was deeply stirred when Rev. G. T. Candlin (president, Methodist New Connexion) urged the giving of close attention in all parts of the country to the enforcement of existing laws against Gambling, and the seeking of further enactments for the purpose of restricting this evil. Speaking from experience both in this country and in the north of China, Mr. Candlin startled his hearers by basing his call for attention to the subject on the fact that, bad as the state of affairs is, "we have by no means reached the possible limit." He drew a dark picture of the ravages of gambling in the home and public life of China; but found a hopeful augury for the future in the battle won against betting in the streets in Leeds last winter. Mr. B. Luke was warmly supported when he referred to evils connected with the use of the columns of newspapers and the Post Office for gambling purposes. The highest point was reached when Rev. J. Tolefree Parr asked whether the time has not come when a great national campaign may be undertaken against gambling. In support of this proposal, he quoted facts which have come under his notice in connection with addresses on the subject given at all his recent missions, facts which had almost appalled himself. He also urged the placing before young people of a clear convincing definition of the sin of gambling.

On the subject of Temperance, Mr. Alderman Duckworth voiced a general approval of the Bill "to amend the law relating to the sale of intoxicating liquors and drunkenness, and to provide for the registration of clubs," as well as an appeal to the Government to introduce a Bill dealing radically with the licensing system. Rev. Dr. Horton also spoke on the subject.

THE DUTY OF THE CHURCHES.

On the Tuesday afternoon, the reports for the year, reference to which has already been made in our columns, were presented and adopted. Commenting on the high level which has been reached, Rev. J. H. Jowett (Birmingham) declared that the Federation stands for the emphasis of the essentials. He had been trying to study the root meaning of the word "free" in this connection, and brought forward two other words which he proposed to place side by side with it with a view to helping in the elucidation. "The ancient and still usable word, 'frith,' means in Anglo-Saxon an enclosure, to be outside the bounds of which was to be in the region of lawlessness. Some of that word 'frith' is in our word 'free,' and if so 'free' does not mean lawless, it certainly does not mean 'irreverent.' To be in the 'frith' is to be 'free,' to be in the realm of sovereignty and authority. 'Friend' is 'freend.' Is that a suggestion of selfish isolation, of selfish independence, of remoteness, of seclusion? Surely the word 'friend' suggests friendship. Something of that is in 'free.' Man is not to be the patron of lawlessness or disorder, a kind of irreverent rebel. A man who is in the 'frith' is in the domain of the law of the spirit of life. To be a free man is to be a 'freend,' which carries us up to the thought of the 'Friend that sticketh closer than a brother.' It means infinitely more than to be independent of State control. To be really 'free' is to be a subject of an august sovereignty, and to live beneath the canopy of a gracious Providence.

"We stand, not for politics, but for the character of politicians, for purity, integrity of character, and a fine, sensitive consciousness. It is ours to see that the high places of the land, in the city and the State, in the local and Imperial legislature, do not become the perquisites of money or mere cleverness, but are the heritage of the pure; that rivers are opened out in high places; and we pre-eminently look for a pure river of the water of life to flow from the English throne."

"THE YEAR OF THE MEN."

After an earnest address from Rev. Dr. Brooks (President, United Methodist Free Churches, Southport), Rev. R. J. Campbell, pointed out that while no reference is made to party politics, the report is full of political achievement in the best sense, because the Federation has taken its stand on the side of temperance, social, and moral reform. He rejoiced further that there is no suggestion of antagonism in any of the relations with the Established Church. The work of the evangelists and special missioners was emphasized by Gipsy Smith, who "thanked God for the year of the men," the preponderance of men in the audiences having been the conspicuous feature of his recent missions. Another point which he drove home with great force and power was that it had been too long the custom "to libel the man in the street," to speak of "the lapsed masses as if it were impossible to bring them to the services. They only want to feel the throb of the Christ in you and me and in the preacher. Don't tell me they will not mix with rich people. They will come if rich people make them feel that they are wanted." Mrs. Benham (organizing secretary of the Girls' Guild) reported encouraging progress during the year, eighty councils being now engaged in the work, with forty detached workers in villages. The financial statement made by Mr. Alderman Evan Spicer was also thoroughly satisfactory.

A crowded audience gathered up to hear Rev. Dr. Clifford deal with the subject of "The Housing of the Poor." His words were followed with the keenest interest as he made statement after statement to prove how deep-seated is the evil in city and village, town and country, all over the land. Turning to remedies, he declared that "every conversion to God is a contribution to the solution of the problem of the housing of the poor. Therefore we must go forward with our missions for preaching the glad tidings of redemption to the poor; increase our 'settlements' for daily ministry to their needs, work all our agencies for bringing men to the knowledge of God in Christ, so that we may win men to God, and inspire them to use the power and grace of God for the establishment of his kingdom of peace and purity, goodness and brotherhood, over the wide earth." Turning to legal remedies, he claimed that the rent of the land, with all its advantages, must go as soon as possible to the people: "Then, and not till then, shall we deal with the overcrowding difficulty, so as to master it."

"A MESSAGE FOR MIDNIGHT."

In the evening the Council sermon was preached by Rev. Dr. Robertson Nicoll—subject, "A Message for Midnight" (Luke xi. 6). Dealing with the midnight of sin, Dr. Nicoll asked, "What can we say to the friend, the wayfarer who comes in the midnight of sin? We have told, and have done right to tell, what Christ accomplished when, wearing the fair mitre of the crown of thorns, He offered up the evening sacrifice of the world. Yes, but there is a simpler and deeper word than any of these. Christ, by his living and dying brings us to God. We are forgiven when we are brought to God. Salvation is the meeting, the embracing, of the Prodigal Son and the loving Father. When they meet, when the sinner's trembling lips are kissed into a sweet silence, when his words are hushed in a great burst of forgiving love—that is forgiveness. Forgiveness means reconciliation. If we are reconciled to God by the death of his Son, all is done for us, all is well, there is no fear of any past or future. There is no talk of pardons."

The question was faced, "What comes after this rapture and rest? When the prodigal and his father waken on the morrow they have to face many things, and to fight them even to the grave. Let us preach to the friend at midnight the love of God the Father. It was from the fountain of the Father's love that the atonement came. Christ has not done his work upon us until He has brought us to the Father's feet, until He has said, 'Of those whom Thou hast given me I have lost none.'"

In the midnight of death, the preacher showed how terrible would be the conception of immortality without God: "Man's chief end is to glorify God and to enjoy Him for ever." "Have we not declined from the level of the Old Testament? How many can say, with the old Psalmist, 'Whom have I in heaven but Thee, and there is none on earth that I desire beside Thee'? But St. Paul could have said it. He looked for his loved ones, like the rest of us, to see them transfigured in the glory of the soft, eternal sunshine; but his dear ones were robed and homed in Christ; and it was for Christ and God he watched."

INFLUENCE AND WEALTH.

The morning sermon on Wednesday was preached by Rev. F. W. Macdonald (London) on "The Seeking of the Kingdom and Righteousness of God" (Matt. vi. 33). This was followed by an address from Mr. J. Compton Rickett, M.P., on "The Attitude of Free Church Councils to Social Problems." Beginning from the axiom that the appeal of the Church is always personal at the beginning, and that the cleansing of society must come through the salvation of the individual, he showed how, by the gradual permeation of higher influences, a State may grow Christian in sentiment without a creed, and the extent to which this had been accomplished in the national acknowledgment of temperance and purity. Pointing out the aims to be kept in view, and the great channels for service ready to hand in the public boards of the country, he was careful also to name the danger, in pursuing any end exclusively, of losing the true perspective. In the discussion which followed Rev. S. B. Lane (Brighton) asked, "What is the attitude of the Councils to public-house trusts?" whose influence he believed to be most pernicious.

A paper by Mr. W. P. Hartley (Liverpool) on "The Use of Wealth" was so warmly received that the executive were asked to print it for broadcast circulation. Pointing out the moral obligations resting on all to use their much or little aright, he deprecated disbursements by will, declaring that each man should be his own living almoner. On the question of giving, he showed that not only should it be definitely proportionate, but the proportion should increase with growing means. He testified from personal experience to the great joy that may be found in the distribution of money so dedicated.

OPPORTUNITIES AND DANGERS.

Some time having been set apart for discussion on "The Twentieth Century Funds," Rev. Charles H. Kelly sounded a high note and gained the sympathy of the Conference when speaking on "The Opportunities they give us." After referring to the great opportunity which the Funds have afforded multitudes to show the value and privilege of the actual consecration of money to Christ's cause, he dwelt specially on the opportunity which they themselves now present to each of the churches as a whole: "There never before was so much to be done for Christ. The Funds have declared themselves to be a great opportunity for devotion, and for giving to outsiders and foes a distinct proof that they are not decrepit, and have no intention to die, or to cease active work. They give us the opportunity of rendering special praise and thankfulness to God. We face new and pressing emergencies which have arisen during the last fifty years, in connection with the great increase of wealth, business, emigration, the changed relation of labour and capital, the great and growing percentage of the population that are neither church members nor adherents, and also the remarkable change that has taken place in the relative positions of the Free Churches and the Established Church."

The treatment of the Funds from the viewpoint of "Their Possible Perils" had been allocated to Rev. Dr. J. Guinness Rogers; but as he was prevented by illness from attending, his paper was read by Rev. Dr. J. Monro Gibson. The first danger on which he dwelt was that of giving effect to the wish of each denomination to be represented in every town —almost in every village of the country—though he believed there was no real reason to fear that even a plethora of wealth would stimulate unhealthy sectarian rivalry. He urged the importance of using the present opportunity with a view to the spiritual necessities of the country only, deprecating also the provision of denominational schools, which he believed would be a fatal policy.

The earlier portion of the afternoon having been devoted to "Free Church Council Work," much useful information and advice were crowded into a paper on "How to Work a Council Successfully," by Mr. David Shepherd, who spoke from his experience as secretary at Cardiff. He pointed out many rocks and pitfalls to be avoided, as well as the encouragements which are assured to the conscientious and painstaking worker. One of the special appeals was, as far as possible, to seek the preservation of the sanctity of the Sabbath. "The matter is one which the Free Churches must not neglect or treat lightly. The Anglicans and Romanists are indifferent."

From a different aspect of the topic, Rev. R. Veitch (Liverpool) discoursed helpfully on "How Active Interest in Council Work can be maintained among the Churches." Among a number of points raised he insisted that the Council must and can be made really indispensable to the full success of the Churches in their own peculiar work, advising reliance more on the lay representation of the congregations, though securing the interest of the ministers as well.

NEW CONDITIONS OF EVANGELISM.

More directly spiritual thoughts were awakened when the topic, "Twentieth Century Evangelism," was reached, the first paper being read by Rev. F. B. Meyer. From his own experience in Lambeth and over the country, he drew a dark picture of the religious ignorance, indifference, and apathy prevalent among the masses of the population; the gloom of the picture being only deepened by a description of the colourlessness of the lives lived by so many, and the hard struggle for existence from which there seems to be no escape. He spoke in a hopeful spirit, pointing out that if the Churches are to undertake their task successfully, some changes will be necessary in their methods.

"(1) We must learn to take a wider outlook. Church officers and members expect the exclusive attention of the minister for themselves and their families; and there is often a vast waste of time in visits to people in perfectly good health, able to attend the means of grace, made for no other reason than to keep them from grumbling. The minister should be the recognised friend of the entire district; his face should be known by all his neighbours, and they should know that they have in him a friend to whom they may appeal.

"(2) We must increasingly employ the ideal of the 'Settlement.' We need more of what the Americans call 'institutional churches.' (3) Some of our services must be made more elastic. (4) We must find more varied service for our people. Why should not our students be invited to spend at least two years in helping to organize and maintain such agencies? No part of their training would be more valuable than this. The Gospel must be lived as well as preached, and must reincarnate itself in self-sacrificing effort."

The deep feeling produced by Mr. Meyer's words was maintained and carried still further by the next address, in which Rev. J. Gregory Mantle spoke as frankly about the mere fringe of what may be called the raw material which was touched by the Simultaneous Mission, and quoted figures to show how almost incredibly small is the proportion of workingmen in some of the great centres who attend any place of worship. Looking for the secret of failure he found it in the Church itself. "Twentieth century Evangelism," he said, "is conditioned upon a genuine revival within the Church. The Church itself must be saved, or it cannot save the world. It must produce a loftier type of character than that which exists in the world outside. The most earnest evangelistic work must be accompanied and followed by a patient endeavour to discover more perfectly, and obey more faithfully, the will of God in relation to our common life. A revival that will coruscate in ecstasies, or scintillate in hallelujahs, is of little or no value; we need one that will manifest itself in doing justly, loving mercy, and walking humbly with God."

Wednesday evening was devoted to mission services, held at twelve different centres in the city.

THE BROKEN DOMINION OF SIN.

The morning preacher on Thursday was Rev. C. Silvester Horne, whose sermon was one of the most stirring deliverances of the week. From the text, Romans vi. 14, he demonstrated in clear, incisive language the true spiritual temper in which every struggle for the right must be undertaken if there is to be any hope or prospect of success. Facing the chief forms of sin rampant in the community, he yet declared that he was no pessimist—"no believer in the Lord Jesus Christ can ever be." While he was for law to cleanse the streets, to cripple drinking habits, to abolish betting and gambling, and to settle other questions, "it must be law in the hands of grace, only such law as can make clear appeal to the spirit and teaching of Jesus Christ. The power of sin is broken when men and women are lifted out of it. We must arm ourselves for our venture with invisible weapons. No blunted broken sword of semi-rationalism will do. Let churches dress themselves with the authority of conviction, to awaken the sleeper, and to trouble the stagnant water of indifference till there is a gracious healing movement in it."

The widespread concern on the present position of the education question was manifest when Mr. R. W. Perks, M.P., brought the subject forward. By his address, and those of the mover and seconder of a resolution adopted, a loud and clear note of warning was sounded of the danger to be apprehended should the proposal to place elementary education under the control of county councils be carried out, and power be conferred on them to make grants to "non-public" as well as "public" elementary schools. Among others who contributed to the discussion, were Rev. J. Hirst Hollowell (Rochdale), Mr. A. E. Hutton, M.P.; Mr. Alderman Snape (Liverpool), and Rev. Dr. Clifford.

Some interesting light was shed on the relations between Free and State Churches by two addresses grouped under the title, "The Federation Movement a Link between Nations." The ex-president (Rev. J. G. Greenhough) recounted some of the impressions left by a visit just made to Australasia, while Rev. J. M. Gwynne Owen spoke of experiences in the United States. Perhaps the most notable fact mentioned was when the former declared that his firm belief in the efficacy of disestablishment to clarify the ecclesiastical air of England had been entirely dispelled by what he had seen of Anglicanism in the Colonies.

Among other items of business disposed of was a paper on the Free Church Boys' Camp Movement, by Rev. A. N. Rowland (Putney); the passing of a resolution to protest against any proposal to consecrate the chapel of Christ's Hospital at Horsham; the formal nomination (in accordance with a former announcement) of Rev. Dr. Joseph Parker to succeed Rev. Dr. Townsend in the presidency of the Council; and the acceptance of an invitation to hold next year's meetings at Brighton.

The meetings of the Council were brought to a formal close in the afternoon by a devotional service, followed by the celebration of the Lord's Supper. The first speaker was Rev. Dr. W. T. Davison (President of the Wesleyan Conference) who touched a very deep chord in many hearts by asking the question, "Does the life of the Free Churches in this country today sufficiently nourish and does it adequately produce the saintly character? We who are of Puritan stock, of Covenanting ancestry, of Methodist blood, do we produce men and women who may be known as saints? Addresses followed from Revs. J. D. Jones and Principal Rainy.

TEMPERANCE DEMONSTRATION.

On Thursday evening a special temperance demonstration was held in the Mechanics' Institute, when there was a large and inspiriting attendance. From the chair Mr. Robert Whyte (London) gave an address full of power, as he passed in review some of the appalling figures of the drink traffic. "But," he added, with a true touch of pathos, "the real cost is not even the money, but the men. It might not be difficult to make a fortune as a brewer, but how much would you take to enjoy it when you remember the stones on which it was built?"

The principal speaker was Rev. Dr. J. Q. A. Henry, who received a most enthusiastic reception, his previous visit having won for him the hearts of the friends of temperance in the city. Plunging right into the heart of his subject, he drew a vivid and startling picture of the death struggle into which the two characteristic institutions of this country—apart from the home—are plunged. On the one hand we have the churches which stand for organized Christianity; over against them are the public-houses. "These are diametrically opposed to one another. If the Church is right the public-house must be wrong. Both cannot permanently survive. If organized Christianity is to continue in its mission to save men, then this drink must go down in disaster and defeat.

A PROGRAMME FROM THE CHURCH.

"This is the irrepressible conflict of the immediate future. Which institution is to survive? We believe the fittest; and the Church, purchased by the blood of the Lord Jesus Christ, is fittest and must survive. But if it is, those who love the Church and constitute it must take uncompromising ground in reference to the traffic in drink.

"The time has come for the Church—representing the best moral judgment of the community, and out of love for Christ and humanity—to accept the primary responsibility for the success or failure of this struggle against the power of strong drink. The Church must rise to meet this responsibility, and brace itself to the crisis, or vacate the leadership in the realms of spiritual progress. The Church is the only organization on earth that ever can or will solve the problem. We have the numbers, we have the resources, we have the social position, we have the votes to do anything we desire to accomplish in the matter. It is a question of conscience, of co-operation, and of the consecration of God's people."

After showing that there ought to be no difference of opinion among Christian people (1) on the necessity of agitating this question; (2) as to the need for better legislation; (3) or as to the importance of spreading teaching about total abstinence, Dr. Henry concluded with a passionate personal appeal. "You can sign; you ought to sign the pledge. Will you not sign for the sake of the Lord Jesus Christ, for your neighbour's sake; and in that way become a positive personal force in this fight against this monstrous iniquity?"

About an Accident—and More.

WHEN I was a small boy I was taken to a Sunday-school treat. Of course I was dressed in my "Sunday best"—a velveteen suit, white stockings, and patent shoes, if I remember rightly. I wonder why parents always dress children in their best clothes for these outings! They are very uncomfortable even if we behave as we ought to do; and if we don't, the result is equally discomforting to our parents when we get home at night.

Our treat was held in a large field, and in one corner of it there was what had once been a river, but it was now a mass of black mud. Of course I wandered on to it, and soon sank in up to my knees. You can imagine what my shoes and stockings looked like when I got out! But it took me some time to get out at all, as I could not do so by myself; but, in response to my cries, a man brought a plank and laid it on the surface of the mud, and thus helped me out.

As I think of it now, it reminds me of the verse in Psa. xl. 2, which says, "He brought me up also out of an horrible pit, out of the miry clay, and set my feet upon a rock and established my goings." There is another verse, in Isaiah lxiii. 1, which speaks of God as "Mighty to Save." Have you ever thought why He describes Himself thus? If my kind friend had come running up to me and called out, "Don't lose heart! I'm coming to save you! I am mighty to save!" perhaps I should have laughed at him, and said he need not make such a fuss, as there was no great danger. You see it would have seemed extravagant to say "mighty to save" over such a small matter as that.

But if I had fallen into a rapidly-flowing river, which was carrying me away towards a dangerous rock or to a terrible whirlpool, such as I have seen in the rapids of the Niagara river, then he might appropriately have cried, "Be of good courage! Keep up your strength. I am a strong swimmer. I am mighty to save!" because the danger was so great.

Therefore when God speaks of Himself as "Mighty to Save" we may be sure our danger is very great.

Now, what puts us in such great danger? It is sin, which is so terrible that no man, and not even the angels, could be entrusted with the task of saving us. It was necessary that God Himself should undertake the work of rescue; and so Jesus, who Himself was God, the only begotten of the Father, came into this world of sin, was "tempted in all points like as we are," and even gave his life to save us. "God so loved the world, that He gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

It would have been very foolish of me if I had refused the help my friend offered me; but it is more than foolish, it is wicked, if any of us reject God's offers of mercy, and do not "come unto Him that we might have life." Our condition is more than an "accident"; it is a terrible peril, because of sin.

St. John says, "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." But Jesus died to save us, not when we were his friends, but when we were his enemies (Rom. v. 6, 10); and not when we were able to save ourselves, but "when we were yet without strength," like a drowning man who is ready to sink. We are made enemies "by wicked works" (Col. i. 21)—that is, by sin; and it is because of this, that He is "Mighty to save."

God loved the world of sinners lost
And ruined by the Fall,
Salvation full at highest cost
He offers free to all.
Oh, 'twas love, 'twas wondrous love—
The love of God to me.
It brought my Saviour from above
To die on Calvary.

How thankful we should be that God thus comes to our help. Will you not gladly accept his salvation?

Uncle Tom.

This Life as an Inn.

OF all the images which set forth this mortal life, there is, perhaps, none more apposite or instructive than that of an inn. The story is told of an Indian fakir, who entered an Eastern palace, and spread his bed in one of its antechambers, pretending that he had mistaken the building for a caravanserai or inn. The prince, amused by the oddity of the proceeding, ordered the man to be brought before him, and asked him how he came to make such a mistake.

"What is an inn?" the fakir asked. "A place," was the reply, "where travellers rest a little while before proceeding on their journey." "Who dwelt here before you?" again asked the fakir. "My father," was the prince's reply. "And did he remain here?" "No," was the answer; "he died, and went away." "And who dwelt here before him?" "His ancestors." "And did they remain here?" "No; they also died, and went away." "Then," rejoined the fakir, "I have made no mistake, for your palace is but an inn after all."

The fakir was right. Our houses are but inns, and the whole world a caravanserai. Under what sign are we living? We like the sign of Peace. Others prefer to have their hotels called "The Splendid," or "The Royal," or "The Imperial;" let us dwell in "Peace," and we shall be content. It was said of old, concerning our Lord and Master, that "there was no room for Him in the inn." If it be so in any house, peace will be courted in vain; but make room for Jesus, and all will be well, for "He is our Peace."—Selected.

Christian Endeavour Topic.

Our Land for Christ (Psa. lxxxv. 1-13).

THERE is no difficulty in determining the circumstances which gave rise to this Psalm. It was evidently composed on the return of the Jews from the land of captivity, when their mouth was filled with laughter, and their tongue with singing. Evidently the chosen people had come back from the lands of the North. They were conscious that their sin was forgiven and their iniquity pardoned, but the pious souls amongst them desired spiritual blessing in addition. God had turned Himself from the fierceness of his anger, but they desired to be turned. As they met and spoke often together they said, "Oh, that God would revive us again!" and necessarily they would not be satisfied with the prayer, but by every holy endeavour they would seek to secure the result for which they longed.

The religious condition of Great Britain at this time is sufficient to cause considerable anxiety. It is almost certain that the churches are losing ground, in spite of their most desperate efforts to maintain their position. The congregations are thinner than they were thirty years ago, the percentage of our population attending is considerably less; the statistics of our Sunday schools are far from satisfactory, and the growing disregard of the Lord's Day and of Christian institutions points in the same direction. I am told that the state of the villages is heartrending. In too many cases a high ritualistic church, and a small, ill-attended Methodist or Baptist chapel, represent the religious provision, and these often fail to stir the enthusiasm, or arrest and hold the attention of the people. Side by side with the decay of religion, is the increase of betting, drinking, and immorality.

No one of us can view this state of things without profound alarm, not for our churches merely, but for the effect which will be produced upon the national life. The old virtues which made the name of England universally respected were the direct growth and result of our English Bible, and when that is closed, and the light which emanates from its pages is obscured, what can we anticipate for the land we love?

My great hope is in the young men and women of the coming time, and especially those who are being trained in our Christian Endeavour Societies and Wesley guilds, from whose ranks will be drawn the men and women who are to hold public office, and to mould and influence the national life. It is greatly to be hoped that perpetually in our Christian Endeavour Societies great public questions which are independent of party politics shall be considered in the light of the New Testament. Well would it be if at our consecration meetings young hearts resolved that they would devote themselves to their country's good, by moral suasion, example, prayer, vote, and subordination of private ends and aims to the public welfare. Pledge yourselves, young brothers and sisters, that you, by the help of God, will ring out the old and ring in the new and more blessed and Christian time.

We must especially seek for a revival in religion. Surely before our Lord returns—

there will be a great outpouring of the Holy Spirit, so that men may be awakened and the Church prepared for his advent. Only God can send this. We believe that all got-up revivals are bad. It is impossible to organize a true revival—"the wind bloweth where it listeth"—but let us not disparage the real work of God. As a matter of fact, there have been great birthdays in the church, days in which thousands have entered upon a new life, and the silver trumpets have sounded, prodigals have come back, and shepherds have rejoiced over recovered flocks. Why should there not come a revival like that at Cambuslang, when hundreds of people were convicted of sin under a single sermon; or like that which visited Wales under Christmas Evans and John Elias; or which spread from America to Ireland and England in the fifties of the last century? Let us send up one cry to God for this.

Then, as the tenth and eleventh verses announce, there will be a bridal of the earth and sky. Mercy and truth will meet, righteousness and peace will kiss. Righteousness shall prepare the way, and make footprints in which we may place our steps.

Review Lesson.

Golden Text: Acts ii. 33.

THE main subject of the Course of Lessons during the past quarter has been The Church of Christ, its foundation and progress in Jerusalem and Judea, and its wider spread under the preaching and labour of the Apostle Peter. The period embraces the five or six years immediately following the Ascension of the Lord Jesus Christ. In addition to recording the establishment of the Christian Church, the chapters which have come under consideration contain arguments in its favour, with challenges to disprove the fundamental fact of Christ's resurrection. Its early development into an organized community excited the jealousy of the religious teachers of the day, and provoked the first persecution and martyrdom which hastened its extension to Samaria and Syria.

The Persons.

Among those who have come under survey during the quarter have been:

The Risen and Ascended Lord and his faithful Apostles (chap. i. 9).

The 120 disciples assembled in one place (i. 15).

The 3,000 converts added to the Church in one day (ii. 41).

The lame man at the gate of the temple miraculously healed (iii. 8).

Peter and John arraigned before the Council (iv.).

Barnabas, the son of consolation (iv. 36).

Ananias and Sapphira, who agreed together to act a lie (v. 1).

Gamaliel, the learned doctor of the law (v. 34).

The first martyr, Stephen (vii. 59).

Saul, the youthful, consenting persecutor (vii. 58).

Philip, the missionary deacon (viii. (5).

Simon Magus (viii. 9), and

The Ethiopian eunuch, an earnest seeker after truth (viii. 27).

"The Promise of the Father,"

for which the disciples were commanded to wait in Jerusalem (Acts i. 4), was a promise of the bestowment of power concurrent with or following upon the baptism of the Holy Ghost. No greater blessing could have been given by the exalted Saviour. The realization and power of the Holy Spirit in the lives of the early Christians was manifested in—

Continuance "in prayer and supplication" (Acts i. 14).

"Cloven tongues like as of fire" (Acts ii. 3).

Conversions of souls and additions to the Church (Acts ii. 41, 47).

Gift of healing (Acts iii. 7).

Boldness of speech and action for Jesus (Acts iv. 13).

Sacrifice and beneficence (Acts iv. 37; v. 1).

Divine courage (Acts vii. 1-53).

Faith and wisdom (Acts vi. 5-10).

The heavenly vision (Acts vii. 55).

Guidance in service (Acts viii. 5).

Going into "regions beyond" (Acts viii. 39).

Victory through our Lord Jesus Christ (1 Cor. xv. 57).

Opposition to the Gospel.

"Ye shall be hated of all men for my name's sake" (Luke xxi. 17). The arch-enemy of souls sought in a variety of ways to strangle the infant Church and utterly to destroy it.

Priests and Rulers endeavoured to silence these "witnesses" of the resurrection and ascension, and, by threats, punishment, imprisonment, and even by death, to prevent further preaching and teaching in the Name of the Crucified One.

Counterfeit believers played the hypocrite, hoping to escape detection, and brought dishonour and disgrace upon the sacred cause.

The zealous persecuting Saul, who entered "every house," committed men and women to prison, and made havock of the Church.

Satan trembles when he sees
The weakest saint upon his knees.

How fierce and strong is the opposition in our own day to the progress of evangelical religion! The same spirit of envy, hypocrisy, and persecution is displayed, and is to be met in the same manner as by the early disciples.

A little girl, who wanted to be admitted into Church membership, when asked how she knew she was converted, answered, "Because I love Jesus, for He has forgiven my sins." "Then are you no longer a sinner?" "Oh, yes, I am a sinner, and now I know it; only the difference is, I used to run after sin, while now I run away from sin to Jesus."

Some Lessons.

The very circumstances which shattered the last hopes of the despairing disciples were the foundation of the Church. Man's extremity, God's opportunity. "My ways are higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts."

The departed and ascended Lord, the true Head of the Church, "ever liveth." He will come again with power and great glory.

God's promise faileth never. The Holy Ghost was in due time "poured out" upon his people. He is the gift of the Father (Luke xi. 13). "Be filled with the Spirit."

Witness for Jesus everywhere: before the ungodly; even in the very council chamber of the persecuting rulers (Mark xiii. 11; Luke xxi. 12, 13).

Obey God (rather than men) at any cost always, and leave the results with Him. He is "able to deliver" from the burning fiery furnace (Dan. iii. 17), and the lions (Dan. vi. 20), and from wicked men.

God desires "truth in the inward parts" (Psa. li. 6; xv. 2) in act as well as speech—man's distinguishing faculty.

The sin and folly of fighting against God (Acts v. 39). Sin, "though hand join in hand" (Prov. xi. 21), brings its own punishment.

Rejoice—evermore—even in tribulation and the darkest hours of human suffering. Faith is rewarded with the crown of life.

Better to suffer or die for truth than betray it. The blood of the martyrs the seed of the Church.

Beware of self-delusion (Simon Magus) and the delusion of others, Is thine heart right?

A torchbearer for the King of kings. A ready teacher and an eager pupil.

"Where He leads, I'll follow."

"My Counsellor."

THE steady extension of the circle of Christians who use My Counsellor as a Daily Text Book has led to the preparation of a large variety of editions. In the fullest form, giving Morning and Evening Portions, the volume may be had on fine paper of ordinary texture, or on the beautiful India paper of the Oxford University Press; and many have been the testimonies to help received by those who study the Holy Scriptures as here arranged. Here is a specimen page:—

March 20.—Evening.

Let us run with patience the race that is set before us.
Heb. xii. 1.

KNOW ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize? So run, that ye may obtain. ... Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown; but we an incorruptible.—	1 Cor. ix. 24.
And if a man also strive for masteries, yet is he not crowned, except he strive lawfully.	1 Cor. ix. 25.
I count not myself to have apprehended: but this one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.—Looking unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith; who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God. For consider him that endured such contradiction of sinners against himself, lest ye be wearied and faint in your minds.	2 Tim. ii. 5. Phil. iii. 13. Phil. iii. 14. Heb. xii. 2. Heb. xii. 3.
I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day: and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing.	2 Tim. iv. 7. 2 Tim. iv. 8.
To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne.	Rev. iii. 21.

The book may now be had interleaved with writing paper. In this edition, the letterpress is printed on thin paper, and the plain sheets are neatly ruled. The result is a choice birthday book, quite handy in size, and sure to be acceptable to many. Some will be content to enter the names of friends over against particular days; others will find the volume of service for the record of spiritual experiences such as may constitute a personal diary. Over against the words of edification, guidance, and comfort, some will write the acts of God in daily providence and grace, whereby they are established in the faith, led by a way which, though unknown, is assuredly right, and blessed with the help of the God of all comfort.

Readers are invited to apply for a circular giving particulars of this book in various forms and bindings. (Morgan & Scott.)

Evangelistic.

Welsh Forward Movement.

A MISSION has been conducted at Crwys Hall, Cardiff, by Mr. Chas. E. Barraclough, March 2-12. We are glad to testify that all we had heard and read of the missioner was fully realized. Quite a revival has broken out among us; over fifty adults were brought to decision. Mr. Barraclough's preaching was sound and good, and his earnestness in seeking to win souls for the Lord Jesus Christ set all our workers ablaze with the same desire.

John Pugh, General Superintendent.

Mr. and Mrs. Oatts at Sunderland.

The mission recently conducted by Mr. and Mrs. W. M. Oatts, of Glasgow, at the Sunderland Y.M.C.A., was of a very encouraging character. The attendance at the meetings in the Victoria Hall on the Sunday afternoon and evenings was very good indeed, and the week-night meetings, held in the hall of the Y.M.C.A., were also numerously attended. A great deal of time and energy had been devoted to the preparations by the workers. While Mr. Oatts conducted the meetings on the week-nights in the hall of the association, Mrs. Oatts gave addresses at meetings held at the Y.W.C.A., and at the services on the Sundays at the Victoria Hall. Mrs. Oatts also sang a number of solos very impressively. J. C. M.

Mr. A. E. Sims at Forest Gate, E.

Very fruitful evangelistic services have been conducted by Mr. A. E. Sims in the Primitive Methodist Church, Upton Lane, E., commencing on March 1, and concluding on March 13. All the meetings were well attended, and were of a bright and attractive nature. During the mission a great number of decisions were recorded, some of them of a remarkable character. One of the results of the mission is the formation of a Home Missionary Circle, several of the members of the C.E. joining, also some of the new converts. This is the second visit which Mr. Sims has paid to our church, and the more the friends know and hear him, the more they like him.

Arthur Lawton, Minister.

Rev. J. Tolefree Parr at Ashton-under-Lyne.

The Free Church Mission conducted by Rev. J. Tolefree Parr at Ashton-under-Lyne has been greatly owned of God, and will be looked back upon by those who attended with much joy and gratitude for years to come. Mr. Parr spoke to the P.S.A. gathering on the Sunday afternoon on the subject of "Gambling." There were 1,400 men present, and Mr. Park, the leader of the P.S.A. movement in the town, expressed his appreciation of an address "so logical, convincing, manly, and profoundly moving." Each evening during the week Mr. Parr preached in a forcible manner, and very many responded to his persuasive and earnest appeals.

Mr. W. R. Lane at Batley.

A very fruitful united mission, arranged by the Batley Free Church Council, and conducted by Mr. W. R. Lane, was held in Batley from March 1 to 10. The services, with two exceptions, were held in the Hick Lane Wesleyan Chapel.

The second Sunday was perhaps the principal day. The men's meeting in the afternoon, announced after Mr. Lane's arrival, proved a great success, being the largest gathering of the kind for years. At this service the missioner gave a straight talk on "Purity." The service on the evening of this day was remarkable in more ways than one. In the after meeting Mr. Lane made a strong appeal to the unconverted—and it was here that one of the most interesting incidents—almost electrical in its effect—took place. Just when the speaker paused a moment, the organist stepped from behind his curtain and said, "I want to be a Christian." Soon the communion rail was crowded with inquirers, and a most impressive scene was witnessed. This service will live long in many memories. The final meeting was held on the Monday evening, when the building was packed, and many were unable to obtain admission. Mr. Lane was announced to speak on his conversion and experiences whilst serving in the Coldstream Guards. The address was followed by an after-meeting in the adjoining school, when many more inquirers were helped. Mr. Lane's Yorkshire audiences enjoyed his straight-hitting from the shoulder, and a second visit will be heartily welcomed. A grand work has been accomplished. Many have found peace, and the Churches have been quickened.

J. S. Newsome.

Mr. William Olney at Eastbourne.

A mission of a very gracious character has just been closed at the Baptist Church, Ceylon Place, Eastbourne. The missioners were Mr. William Olney, of Haddon Hall, Bermondsey, and Mr. F. Spencer Johnson, a soloist possessing a voice of remarkable sweetness and flexibility. Night after night numbers have assembled to hear the word of truth, and no service has been held through the mission without the unmistakable evidence of the Holy Spirit's presence in leading men, women, and children to the feet of Jesus Christ. The work among the children has been remarkable, the numbers growing night by night as the mission proceeded. On Sunday afternoons, March 2 and 9, Mr. Olney addressed a united meeting of the Congregational, Baptist, and Primitive Methodist schools, with power and gracious results. Mr. Olney's words were direct and telling. The singing of Mr. Johnson was owned of God. On the concluding Monday night he told his life story, when the chapel was crowded. Large numbers have passed through the inquiry room; the influence of the mission will be felt for many days, and pastor, deacons, and members unite in praising God.

Missions in Gaols.

With a daily population of 18,300 men, women, and lads, the sixty prisons of this country afford remarkable scope for evangelistic work. The Church Army, which has been appointed a Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society by the Home Office, is the only society of lay evangelists allowed to hold missions within the gaol walls.

Nearly fifty prisons have been thus visited, many of them three and four times, including the four large convict establishments set apart for men. A convict prison, it will be remembered, is for the reception of all serving periods above two years, while local prisons receive shorter sentence men.

During a mission the Church Army working-man evangelist preaches daily in the prison chapel, at morning prayers, and twice on Sundays. He is also allowed the privilege of conversation, unattended by warders, in the cell of such men as desire an interview.

In following up the work every effort is made, with the warm support of the prison officials and the Home Office, to assist the men when they come into the outside world once more. Mr. Colin F. Campbell (hon. sec. of the Church Army Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society) makes quarterly visits to the convict prisons, and interviews such men as are shortly to be released and express a desire to be helped.

A prison Governor wrote recently:—

"Captain S—— finished on Monday morning one of the most successful missions we have had here. His addresses have been listened to most attentively, both by officers and prisoners, and have been much appreciated by both."

A Prison Chaplain also wrote last month:—

"I am so pleased that the missioner you sent here was happy in his eight days' mission. The officers regarded him with a kindly feeling, and the prisoners were also attracted to him. He carried out his mission entirely to my satisfaction. He selected some of the prisoners for assistance on discharge, and his was a wise selection."

Canon Aitken at Hexham.

A most interesting and encouraging mission closed a few days ago at the ancient town of Hexham, in one of our loveliest old abbey churches. The place was evidently a good deal stirred, and the congregations, good from the first, became very large towards the end, until on the last Sunday night people dared to climb into the triforium and face the accumulated dust and the steaming heat from below in order to hear the sermon. Canon Aitken was the missioner, and he was assisted by Rev. J. M. Spicer, vicar of Malew, Isle of Man, and by Mrs. Crouch, whose labours amongst the women were greatly appreciated, and proved very fruitful. The Canon's addresses in the morning on the spiritual life were much valued by the Christian people of the place, and there seems good ground for hope that they will leave good results behind in the increased earnestness and the fuller consecration of those who are seeking to serve God.

The evening services have been times of revival from the presence of the Lord. Some came forward bravely into the side chapel to seek for help; others were conversed with in their seats. Upwards of 200 memorial cards were distributed, when the supply ran short, and it seems probable that nearly another 100 will be needed. The last (or thanksgiving) night will not soon be forgotten. Canon Aitken and his helper took their seats in the front row, and invited those who either had received blessing or were seeking, to come forward for a memorial card. A very large proportion of those who applied professed to have decided for Christ at the mission, while many others testified to great encouragement and assistance. Mr. Spicer's work amongst the children was quite remarkable. His young friends came night after night to his gatherings, and their attention never seemed to flag. It has indeed been a time of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. Earnest prayers are asked for the large body of young people who seem to have yielded to God in this mission that they may become he strength of the Church in days to come.

The Forest Hill branch of the British Women's Temperance Association had a helpful meeting in the Primitive Methodist Church on Thursday evening, 13th inst., when Mr. Bob Johnson interested a large audience with song, story, and reminiscence, winding up with an urgent appeal for decision for Christ.

Mr. Henry Thorne has just conducted a ten days' Gospel mission at Major Road Baptist Church, Stratford New Town, E. (Pastor, Rev. W. Knight Chaplin). Each afternoon Mr. Thorne gave Bible readings that greatly helped many Christians, and in the evenings he preached the Gospel faithfully in a plain, straightforward manner, resorting to no sensational device, but resting his entire work upon God's Word. It is believed that lasting good will result from the effort.

Miss Reid, of Bridport, late of the China Inland Mission, Chefoo, gave three days' help at the week's Mission to Children recently held at Somerton, Somerset. Her earnest and practical addresses were earnestly followed by good and increasing audiences. The object lesson on "The Magnet" roused the keen interest of the younger children, many of whom, it is believed, have a clearer understanding than ever before of the strength and tenderness of the Saviour's love. The last address to older scholars contained a solemn warning lest privileges lightly esteemed should be taken away. Miss Reid also visited the large collar factory, where she addressed the workpeople.

Requests for Prayer.

For a rich blessing on a mission at St. John's, Woodbridge, by Rev. Dr. Morris, commencing March 22.

For blessing upon special services to be conducted by Mr. James Walker in Newcastle-on-Tyne, March 16-28.

For the Holy Spirit's power during a mission to be held at Merrion Hall, Dublin, March 30 to end of April, by Mr. Musa Bhai, Indian evangelist.

The Christian Temperance Campaign.

DR. J. Q. A. HENRY AT KIRKCALDY.

AFTER taking part in the temperance demonstration at Bradford, in connection with the annual meetings of the National Free Church Council (to which reference is made on page 21), Dr. J. Q. A. HENRY proceeded to Kirkcaldy, where, continuing his campaign, he commenced a week's mission on Saturday last.

Our own correspondent with Dr. Henry writes to the effect that a highly encouraging start was made. "On Saturday, Dr. Henry led a splendid meeting for children, in the Adam Smith Hall, in the afternoon. There were upwards of a thousand young people present, in addition to a large number of adults. Rapt attention was given while the speaker drew interesting and instructive 'Lessons from a wolf hunt in America.' He likened the drink traffic to the wolf, and showed that it is the bitter foe of all that is best in the community. He made a telling appeal to his hearers for united effort to combat and overcome the terrible evil. About 500 of the children at this meeting signified, by rising in their places, that they were members of the Band of Hope, and of the remaining 500 very many rose to testify to their intention to become pledged abstainers and Band of Hope members.

"At night, in Pathhead Public Hall, Dr. Henry addressed a large audience. The facts set forth, and the impassioned appeals made, produced a profound effect. In the afternoon Mr. BLACK presided, and at night Mr. LOCKHART. Sacred solos were given with much acceptance by Mrs. Barclay, and the Gospel Temperance choirs of Kirkcaldy and Pathhead rendered valuable assistance, their singing deepening the impression made by the powerful words of the speaker.

"The gatherings on Lord's Day last were full of spiritual fervour and stimulus. Dr. Henry preached in the morning in Dunnikier U.F. Church, and in the afternoon at Pathhead U.F. Church. Deep impressions were made on both occasions, Dr. Henry enlisting the earnest attention of his audiences. At night, a great audience assembled at eight o'clock in the Adam Smith Hall, when Dr. Henry kept the people spellbound while he urged the claims of Christianity and total abstinence. In response to his final appeal a large number of pledges were secured. Excellent meetings were held on Monday afternoon and night in St. Brycedale U.F. Church, one of the largest Nonconformist churches in Scotland, built during the pastorate of Rev. Dr. Stalker. A committee of local friends from all the churches of the town is actively engaged in carrying out the arrangements of this fruitful mission."

A WISE RE-ARRANGEMENT.

It has become apparent that there are many communities who desire to take advantage of Dr. Henry's able advocacy of Temperance principles, but are not able to undertake the financial responsibility involved in a deputation of thirteen persons. In order to meet the difficulty, and at the same time to carry on the work effectively, it has been determined to book engagements for Dr. Henry alone. The Jubilee Singers have, without question, proved a great attraction to the general public, but their co-operation is not essential to the success of this Christian Temperance Campaign under Dr. Henry. With the earnest co-operation of the churches, and the presence and help of a local choir, the work may be carried forward with great success. For further particulars regarding these or other features of the campaign, communications should be addressed to the Honorary Secretary, Christian Temperance Campaign, 12, Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C.

FUTURE MEETINGS.

Till March 21, Kirkcaldy; 22-28, Alloa; 29-30, Edinburgh; April 1-3, Macclesfield; 4-6, Redhill, Surrey; 8, 9, Helensburgh; 12-18, Dumbarton; 19-25, Airdrie.

Obituary.

REV. GEORGE SMALL.

THE death is announced of Rev. George Small, M.A., at Leytonstone, at the advanced age of eighty-seven. He was brother to the author of "I've found a Friend, oh! such a Friend." As a young man, he studied for eight years in Edinburgh University, being a fellow-student with the Bonars, McCheyne, and Burns. He was for some years a Baptist missionary in India, where his first wife was killed by his side through an explosion of gunpowder. His second wife survives him. Mr. Small was an accomplished Oriental scholar. He was a poet of no mean order, and was also the author of several text-books on Hindustani and Arabic, as well as of a work upon medicine for the use of lady missionaries in zenanas. For a time he worked among Asiatics in the East India Docks, being able to speak to them in their own dialects. Since relinquishing his evangelistic labours upon the ships, he has resided at Leytonstone.

MRS. GOODE, LLANDUDNO.

The Gospel cause has suffered a severe loss by the death of Mrs. Goode, widow of the late Dean Goode, of Ripon. The deceased lady, who was seventy-nine years of age, had been ill only a week. In connection with many departments of Christian work, Mrs. Goode laboured indefatigably and with an almost ceaseless energy. She abounded in acts of charity towards the poor, on whom, with a lavish hand and tender sympathy, she bestowed much of her substance. Mrs. Goode attached high value to the Press as a means of disseminating religious truth, and she rendered valuable service in re-printing and publishing some of her husband's Evangelical and Protestant books and pamphlets. Dean Goode, who died in 1868, was, it will be remembered, a powerful and prolific writer. His "Divine Rule of Faith and Practice" attained wide circulation, while "Rome's Tactics: A Lesson for England from the Past," was a masterly historical review. Mrs. Goode recently prepared a new edition of the latter work, making 50,000 copies in all. Dean Goode, at the time of his death, had just been chosen by the then Prime Minister—Mr. Disraeli—for the bishopric of Peterborough. Mrs. Goode was deeply respected in all sections of the community.

MR. J. WAKEFIELD MACGILL.

The death of Mr. J. Wakefield MacGill at Glasgow removes one who, for the last fifty years, has been well-known in Christian circles as a pioneer in home mission work. It was as a preacher to the poor in music halls and at street corners, and as a promoter of evangelistic effort upon new and special lines that he first became known to the people of Glasgow. For fifteen years he laboured unceasingly, gathered about him and trained workers, collected means, and planned fresh departments of work with unwearied hopefulness and remarkable success. In 1849 he founded the Round Toll Ragged School, three years later the Pont Room Ragged School, in 1858 the Mill Girls' Religious Society (with branches throughout the city) and the Bible Students' Society. Another visible result of his Glasgow work is the Grove Street Home and Mission Institute. The year 1879 saw him in London, where, in co-operation with Dr. H. Grattan Guinness, he founded Berger Hall, an institute similar to that in Grove Street, Glasgow.

Mr. MacGill's next sphere of labour was Manchester, as secretary of the City Mission. During his secretaryship he missioned with Gospel tents most of the neediest districts, and founded no fewer than twenty-four mission-halls. He was also the organizer and leader of an extensive rescue work among poor girls and for the reclamation of the drunkard. Bands of working men were formed whose duty it was to go out on Saturday nights, from 10 p.m. to 1 a.m., to pick up drunkards and poor girls. About twelve months ago, at the earnest request of the members of Grove Street Institute, Mr. MacGill returned to the scene of his early labours in the north-west district of Glasgow.

The scene at Mr. MacGill's funeral was most impressive, and one never to be forgotten. Hundreds followed the remains to Sighthill Cemetery, and at the grave-side joined in singing, "When the roll is called up yonder."

MR. HENRY CONDER.

Numbers of young men both at home and in India are mourning the loss of a true and valued friend by the death of Mr. Henry Conder, who was called home on Thursday last. For more than a quarter of a century the name of Henry Conder has been a household possession in Christian and business circles in the Bombay Presidency. Over thirty years ago he left England to fill the responsible post of traffic manager of the Great Indian Peninsular Railway, and at once identified himself with Christian service. One of the founders, and for twenty-five years President of the Y.M.C.A. in Bombay, he was to be found at the rooms of the Association almost every evening when not attending gatherings connected with other movements of an evangelical or philanthropic character.

Nothing was more to his liking than to get in a quiet corner with some soldier or sailor, to listen with sympathetic interest to what he had to say, and to give him fatherly counsel. He personally knew and understood the character of almost every member of the Association. Having no family claims upon him, the Y.M.C.A. president was delighted to take young men to stay with him for a short time in his bachelor home, and was always most thoughtful in ministering to the comfort of his guests.

Hundreds of young men in India have cause to be devoutly thankful for the influence of his wise and helpful friendship upon their lives. Since his retirement and return to this country Mr. Conder has been assiduous in his efforts among young men. A daily visitor at Exeter Hall, he rendered invaluable service, not only on the committee of the Central Association, but also on the National Council, in its home and foreign departments. The funeral took place on Saturday, at Highgate Cemetery, and was attended by representatives of the different organizations with which Mr. Conder had been so honourably identified.

Personalia.

PASTEUR DU PONTET-DE LA HARPE, who has been laid up for several weeks by a most severe attack of influenza and bronchitis, is now convalescent. Prayers are earnestly requested for a complete, and if it should please God, speedy recovery.

Rev. GEORGE WAINWRIGHT, of Dunedin, N.Z., and formerly of Westcliffe Tabernacle, Bournemouth, is returning to England. We understand it is Mr. Wainwright's intention to take a pastorate in this country. Letters to him may be addressed to 30, Dalebury Road, Upper Tooting, S.W.

Mr. J. D. McEWEN, of Brazil, left London last week for Nova Scotia. He goes to fetch his family, from whom he has been separated for about three years while pioneering in South America. He hopes shortly to return to Brazil, accompanied by his wife and children, and more missionary workers. Mr. McEwen was much touched by the kindness shown towards him during his brief stay in England. A Prayer Circle, forming a bond of interest in weekly prayer on behalf of Brazil, has been formed. Friends desirous of joining may communicate with the secretary, Mr. A. T. Dence, "Hillside," Byfleet.

NATIONAL BLIND RELIEF SOCIETY.

In thanking the readers of The Christian for their kind response in the past, I again bring before them two more cases that require immediate aid.

A BLIND MUSICIAN.—L. A., aged 50 years, has become blind through over-study. She worked 10 hours per day to gain a gold medal for music in order to support her parents, who died at the age of 92-82. She is extremely delicate and, owing to a cancer at the back of her eyes, suffers constant pain, and quite unable to earn her own living.

G. S., in whom I am interested, has been blind from lead poisoning since 1897. He was sent to the Exeter School for 2½ years, and then went to the Normal College. He had to leave the latter as the Doctors said the poisoning was beginning to affect his brain.—R. D. C.

The Rev. J. PULLEIN-THOMPSON, Hon. Sec., the Vicarage, 27, Tite Street, Chelsea, S.W., will gladly acknowledge donations, or they may be sent to the Office of THE CHRISTIAN.

Notes & Comments

Prospects of Peace. As we go to press the heart of the nation is again cheered by the prospect of peace in South Africa. The Acting President and Secretary of the former Transvaal Government, accompanied by two influential military officers, have come within the British lines under a flag of truce, and are now, with the official cognizance of the Cabinet, engaged in the discussion of peace proposals with Lord Kitchener. The failure of these negotiations to ensure a permanent peace would be a calamity of the gravest magnitude, and it behoves the people of God to pray earnestly that the Governments on either side may be inclined to seek Divine guidance, to yield much, and to forgive much.

A Terrible Indictment. The evidence tendered by Mr. Robert Knight—artisan and magistrate—before the Betting Commission last week, constitutes one of the most serious indictments ever made of our national vice. This gentleman, who for thirty years was secretary to one of the most powerful organizations of artisans, spoke with the utmost authority, and he drew an appalling picture of the effects of betting upon the character of working-men. In the mining districts, the University Extension movement has been killed, secondary schools are scouted by young men, intellectual pursuits have decreased, drink clubs replace lecture rooms, the bookmaker is both preacher and teacher, and the sporting journal the chief aliment to the mind. In a word, men have become intellectual and moral wrecks. And yet these same men complain about "foreign competition." The truth is that they are becoming incapable of holding their own against rivalry. The worst feature of the case is the complacent attitude taken toward the facts by those in high position and office. The refusal of the Duke of Devonshire to denounce the custom as a vice, and his justification of the bookmaker's calling, is a painful incident when we remember his position as President of the Board of Education; and yet he is only a little more courageous than many of our public men in stating his opinion. It would be a fitting and noble act on the part of the King if he took a leading part in reform by absenting himself from the racecourse in future.

Morals and Business. A case heard at the recent Leeds Assizes should be of great use to all employés—and their number is legion—who are practically compelled by their employers to engage in shady or dishonest transactions in business. A traveller, who had been dismissed from his post because he refused to employ dishonourable means in his business, sued his master for wrongful dismissal, and was awarded by the jury substantial damages. The young fellow repudiated the brutal dictum of his master—"morals! There are no morals in business—a man who talks like that ought to be in a lunatic asylum." It is well when men are willing to stand up on behalf of righteousness, although they lose their situations for it; and it is well when men who hold their employés by threats of dismissal unless they act unfairly are made to smart for it. Most ministers in large towns can tell of men who remain outside the Church of God on account of the dishonest practices which they are compelled to adopt in business. A little boldness on their part would accomplish their emancipation, for both the law and public opinion are on the side of the man who refuses to be a party to dishonesty in trade.

The Conference on Confession. A report of the proceedings of the Conference held at Lambeth in January last has been published—Confession and Absolution (3s. nett, Longmans). We know now how much and how little can be said by "advanced" Anglicans on behalf of auricular confession, and this is an advantage for many reasons. The points of agreement in the Conference constitute the most surprising feature of it. Substantially all the members agreed to two points, i.e., that the commission of our Lord, as recorded in John xx. 23, was given, not to Apostles only, but to the whole Church; and secondly, that the practice of auricular confession could not be justified from the practice of the early Church. Evangelicals will not complain if the Sacerdotalists will carry these two points to their legitimate conclusion. To admit that the whole Church—consisting of men and women alike—received the commission to remit or to retain sins, is to remove at one stroke the sacerdotal fabric; whilst the second admission should surely lead to a reconsideration of the position that seeks in the third and fifth centuries justification for questionable practices. If all parties would only agree to go right back to Christ and the Apostles, we believe there would soon be a return to simple Evangelical doctrine and practice.

Delegated Priesthood? On the day after the report of the Fulham Conference appeared, The Standard devoted a leading article to the subject, and asked pertinently, "If every Christian is a priest (as was admitted at the Conference), what is the sense of getting another to do for us what we can do for ourselves?" The question is, of course, a commonplace with every Evangelical, but it struck The Standard with all the force of novelty. The Church Times, commenting upon this article, endeavours to reconcile the sacerdotal position with the statement of the Conference by naïvely remarking:—

> We learn elsewhere that we have been made both kings and priests, but the fact that we have both the priestly and the kingly character, does not prevent us from delegating our functions to official and representative kings and priests.

And is it upon this, after all, that priestly assumptions repose? Others, besides The Standard, will take the commonsense view of the situation, rather than risk anything upon delegated functions.

Boys in the Confessional. If the Fulham Conference has but one result, that of calling the attention of parents to the fact that there is a desire and an insidious tendency on the part of High Church leaders to bring schoolboys and schoolgirls under the enervating influences of the confessional, it will have been pre-eminently useful. There are few, if any, directions in which sacerdotalism is likely to have a worse result than this; for it is calculated to sap the roots of all proper manliness, as those who are familiar with the methods and the baneful influence of Rome know well. The very idea of such a practice in our large schools is utterly repugnant to the English mind, and it would be an unhappy day for religious liberty in these islands if a different view were to obtain ground. The history of religion clearly shows that in every country sacerdotalism has always sought to obtain the power of interference with the most sacred family relations.

Evening Communion. The Bishop of Durham has the courage of his convictions, and his action in officiating at the evening Communion at St. Paul's, Onslow Square, on a recent Sunday, is significant, in view of the fact that certain of his colleagues have episcopally forbidden such Communions. The High Church view of the Lord's Supper is, it almost goes without saying, strongly opposed to that taken by Dr. Moule; and the writer of the "Devotions adapted for the use of the English Church," to which we referred recently, unhesitatingly states that anyone who "without necessity" breaks the rule of early and fasting Communion is said by Jeremy Taylor to "show only the signs of an evil mind." Further he adds, in reference to "such grave irregularities as evening Communions," that those who take part in them would seem to fall under the condemnation produced in Article 34 against those who substitute private judgment for the traditions of the Church. Evidently, Dr. Moule prefers to follow the evidence of the New Testament as to the Supper of the Lord.

England and the Vatican. The remonstrance addressed to Lord Salisbury concerning the sending of a British envoy to Rome, upon the occasion of of Pope's pontifical "silver wedding," will, it is understood, be made to him in private. We hope that it will be none the less vigorous on this account. To say the least of it, the sending of an envoy is most uncalled for. England has no diplomatic relations with the Vatican, and the Pope's "priesthood" does not concern the people of these realms. So far as the State is concerned, the Pope is a private person, and we fail, therefore, to see upon what ground an envoy is to be sent to Rome. Lord Denbigh cannot represent to the Pope the goodwill of the majority of English people towards his sacerdotal assumptions; the majority do not believe in them. The Italian Government is naturally very sensitive about this kind of thing, and we should do nothing officially that would even be likely to lead to unpleasantness. Italy has not yet forgotten the silly speech of the Duke of Norfolk a year ago, which created so much ill-feeling. Roman Catholics are quite at liberty to pay their respects to their chief, but they are not at liberty gratuitously to offer the respects of others who utterly disbelieve in the whole Roman pretensions.

Dogma and Christian Faith. A recent writer, dealing with an English translation of The History of Dogma by Dr. Harnack, Professor of Church History at Berlin University, takes exception to the great scholar's restricted use of the term dogma, and to his condemnation of it as "the foundation of Christian faith as Greek culture understood it, and justified it to itself;" and as "a work of the Greek spirit on the soil of the Gospel." The censure, however, has a wider application for there is a school of writers and thinkers in this country holding similar views and anxious to set aside all the hard and fast definitions of doctrine and faith. At the same time, as Rev. Dr. Garvie has said:—

While we have much to learn from those who have toiled in thought before us, while their goal must be our starting point, while we must recognise and respect the continuity of Christian faith and life, yet we must, if the living thought of to-day is not to be held in bondage by the beliefs of former days, distinguish between "the heavenly treasure" of Christian truth, and "the earthen vessels" of ecclesiastical doctrine in which it has been handed down.

A Successful Experiment. The New York Outlook details a plan for teaching children what to read, which has been very successful in America and might well be followed in this country. The accessibility of all kinds of literature to children through public libraries and cheap editions is one of the perils of the time. Libraries in all parts of the States have now seriously taken in hand the task of helping children in the selection of books. Special children's rooms have been established under the charge of carefully-trained children's librarians. The Central Library at Pittsburg endeavours to reach 20,000 children, and in 1900 had a total attendance at its meetings of 200,000. At the Hartford Public Library there are five-minutes' talks daily to children on books. By this means an interest is being created in the better class of literature, and the habit of reading set on a firm and pure basis. Once the taste for good books is formed, the danger of reading prurient and demoralizing works is minimized. This is a plan that might be followed in private by schoolmasters, Sunday-school teachers, and parents.

The Drink Death Rate. Indirect testimonies to the urgent need that exists for the restriction and repression of the drink traffic continue to multiply on every hand. In a recent annual report from the medical officer of health for Brighton, Dr. Newsholme, says:—

During the past year fourteen deaths were caused by alcoholism or delirium tremens. Of these seven were men and seven were women, and only two were over sixty years of age. The deaths do not represent more than a very minute proportion of the mortality really caused by alcoholism. As a rule, the real cause is concealed behind such headings as disease of the brain or spinal cord, apoplexy, heart disease, liver disease, Bright's disease, &c., which, with many other diseases, are caused to a very large extent by chronic alcoholic excess.

Dr. Newsholme refers to forty deaths from one of these complaints, "a disease which is almost solely produced by intemperance," and adds that alcohol is "the genius of degeneration."

A Subtle Form of Intemperance. There is a grave warning to the so-called moderate drinker in what Dr. Newsholme says in regard to alcohol being "one of the chief causes of premature old age." Allowing for his long experience as Officer of Health in a town of about 125,000 inhabitants, irrespective of the huge influx of visitors, his opinion should have the greatest possible weight:—

It is not sufficiently recognised that these evil causes are very commonly produced by the systematic indulgence in an amount of alcoholic drinks that would by most be regarded as moderate, and that those who, while never becoming intoxicated, daily take a considerable amount of spirits (especially if taken apart from meals) are much more likely to suffer in health and prematurely break down than the labourer who may get drunk once a fortnight, and be a teetotaler in the intervals.

Slum Life in the Provinces. It is to be feared that one result of the existence of so much literature in reference to the East End of London, is that of diverting the public attention from similar sordid and degraded life in most of our large provincial cities and towns. Yet the evils which bear so injuriously upon the existence of the poor in certain districts of the Metropolis are just those which are powerful in the degradation of multitudes in other and smaller places. Speaking recently at a meeting of the Home Mission Union at Bristol, Rev. W. Wale, referring to his parish in Birmingham, stated that families of six there were paid at the rate of 7d. for sewing hooks and eyes upon twenty-four gross of cards, and could with close and prolonged industry earn only 3s. 6d. per week. Others, for making "ladies' aprons nicely tucked" were paid 5d. per dozen, and for children's pinafores "beautifully made, with lace insertions," 9d. per dozen. It is not to be wondered that Mr. Wale added that many passed from his classes and church to the workhouse, and that "people in these slums did not seem to think Christianity in the form in which it exists in public worship is for them."

Precept and Example. In a recent issue of a monthly contemporary there is an appreciative article in regard to the work at the Woolwich Tabernacle, with its congregation of about 2,000; its Sunday-school, with 1,000 scholars; and its evangelistic efforts in the slums. The pastor, Rev. J. Wilson, however, places Christ in front of everything, and whenever that is the case there must be a blessing. Mr. Wilson says:—

I hear some people say they cannot get over the inconsistencies of Christians. Neither can I, but I try to get round about them. Get to Christ, and never mind the inconsistencies.

The pastor, however, knows the value of consistency, and he adds:—

One of our lads, formerly an apprentice at Siemen's factory, gained the Whitworth Scholarship the other day, taking the first place in the United Kingdom. He once told me there were two arguments which led him to Christ—the lives of the two best men in the factory.

The Kaiser and the Drink Traffic. It is gratifying to learn that the movement which has been inaugurated in Germany with the view of removing the manufacture and sale of drink from private persons and companies, and of placing the trade in the hands of corporations which would not derive pecuniary advantage from the traffic, has received the public approval of the Emperor. In a letter to the leader of the agitation, the Kaiser has stated that every effort having for its aim the diminution of the use of alcohol, and also the education of the public mind in regard to the evils resulting from drink, has his complete approval. It would seem that he has been observing with interest the work already done in England in this direction, which, slight as it is compared with the magnitude of the growing evil, may yet turn out to be as the leaven.

EASTER LIGHT.

IN a former contribution to this series we referred, in passing, to the despondency which filled the breasts of our Lord's disciples, when their hopes of attaining high positions in the earthly kingdom which they supposed He had come to found, had been brought to nought.

When He yielded up his spirit upon the cross, the ideals to which they had clung were dispelled for ever, and a sense of spiritual stupefaction reigned instead. The days that intervened between his burial and the Resurrection Morn gave rise, we may conceive, to a spiritual depression which was probably unique. Their ambition sank at its foundation when "by wicked hands" He was "crucified and slain." The Prince of Life was dead, and all their hopes were buried in his tomb.

And not their hopes only; their faith, in large measure, withered also. Bewildered and dazed, two of his followers, who apparently shared the mistaken belief of the twelve, poured out their mutual woes on the road to Emmaus: "We trusted it had been He who should have redeemed Israel," and the ground of their trust had opened beneath their feet. They "feared the Lord, but walked in darkness and had no light." It was all so incomprehensible; the collapse had been so sudden; it was past belief that what had seemed so sure should perish in a night.

Yet it had all arisen from their own imperfect knowledge, and lack of confidence in Him. St. Luke (ix. 45, 46) tells us that when He had spoken of his impending decease, "they understood not this saying, and they feared to ask Him," the immediate result of which had been that "they reasoned among themselves which should be the greatest." But when the lonely Stranger joined them by the way, He "expounded to them in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself;" later, in company with the eleven, "He opened their understanding that they might understand the Scriptures;" and finally, "their eyes were opened, and they knew Him." It had been hard to convince Peter of what He should suffer at Jerusalem (Matt. xvi. 21, 22); it is the more striking, therefore, to note the conviction with which that Apostle subsequently affirmed, "This Scripture must needs have been fulfilled" (Acts i. 16); and his bold assertion at Pentecost concerning Jesus, "Him being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God . . ." (Acts ii. 23).

What, then, had sustained them during the dark days of the Saviour's burial? With Faith shattered and Hope bedimmed, what was there left? Their Love. Tenderly they cherished the memory of what He had been to them, and of the wonders He had wrought before their eyes. Lovingly they reminded each other of the experiences of that blessed ministry, even to the washing of his disciples' feet. If they could not believe, they could love. Thomas, most sceptical of all, could not grasp eternal truths ("We know not whither Thou goest, and how can we know the way?"—John xiv. 5), but He could face death at his beloved Master's side ("Let us also go that we may die with Him"—John xi. 16). Their eyes were holden, their minds were darkened, but their hearts throbbed with a devotion whose foundations were laid in God. Of faith, hope, and love, the greatest of these is love (1 Cor. xiii. 13). This saved them from submersion in the waters of despair.

* The former series of "Practical Papers" (fourteen subjects) may now be had in book form. (Dreams and Realities. Cloth, 1s. Morgan & Scott.)

Have the ideals of earlier days melted in the noon of life's experience? Has hope deferred made your heart sick? Has your faith become unsettled by the disquieting influences of the times? Has the Christ of your youthful belief been laid in the tomb of dank uncertainty? You had thought that your religion would lead you to popularity or position, instead of which it has won contumely and reproach. You understood not the Scriptures, which foretell that "he who will live godly, must suffer persecution." Or you had failed to comprehend His way, and had not heard Him say, "What I do, thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter."

"Who is among you that feareth the Lord, that obeyeth the voice of his servant, that walketh in darkness and hath no light? Let him trust in the name of the Lord, and stay upon his God" (Isa. l. 10). A fallen sign-post at cross-roads gives the traveller no clue as to the way he should pursue. But if he raise it, and point the arm bearing the name of the town from which he started, down the road along which he has come, the others will also point aright. In the perplexities of Life or Faith, amid much that at present you do not know, act up to what you do know, of right, of morality, of God. "If ye love Me," says Christ, "keep my commandments." "Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you." Remember the days of old, "the kindness of thy youth, the love of thine espousals," when you followed your Lord even into the wilderness (Jer. ii. 2). Think tenderly of the gracious experiences that have been yours, so far as you have known the Lord. Cherish still your love for Him; let it support your dying faith. Cease not to "obey the voice of his servants," nor swerve from holiness of life. Seek fellowship with those whose hearts "burn within" them, as they ponder o'er the things of God; for He is not dead, but sleepeth; the Easter morn shall break, and your buried Christ shall rise again. Then, as Thomas placed his finger upon the wounds of his Lord, it may be also yours to say:—

My faith would lay her hand
On that dear head of Thine,
While like a penitent I stand,
And there confess my sin.

Thus will nobler ideals than ever animate your life, as you witness unto men that the Word of God is true; and the truths that once were hard to grasp, of these, like Peter, you will delight to speak. G.

Easter Hymn.

The Lord is good to all (Ps. cxlv. 9).

God is supremely good,
God is supremely great;
He is the life of everything,
From high to low estate.
Life in itself is He.
Life unto us is given,
That we might praise Him here below,
And afterwards in heaven.

Grant that thy life be ours,
To make it one with thine,
That we may live to glorify,
And for thy glory shine.
Light in itself art Thou,
Light unto us is given,
In perfect love to perfect us,
Like to our God in Heaven.

"O Lord! we raise our voice,
This Resurrection Morn,
To thank Thee for our Saviour, Son,
Lord of the morning dawn.
Glory doth crown his brow,
Glory that we may share;
O Lord! reflect thy glory now—
Be this our fervent prayer.

Good Friday and Easter.

By Rev. ALFRED TUCKER, Hitchin.

We are come again to that period of the Christian year which is set apart for the commemoration of the death and resurrection of Jesus—the vital and cardinal facts of the Christian faith, the essence of all revealed truth, the pith and marrow of the Gospel. It is not the moral principles of the New Testament, nor its ecclesiastical polity, nor its teaching respecting the mode of the Divine existence, which specially characterize Christianity, but Christ crucified and risen.

There is, to many minds, an advantage in connecting certain seasons with particular facts in the Gospel history. In these days of negative tendencies, all that emphasizes the historical reality of those sacred incidents with which our spiritual life is essentially involved, and which remind us of fundamental truths, should be carefully cherished. Life is apt to become a dull round of duties and cares, and even religion may be reduced to a mere routine of observances, a system of mechanical formalism; and sometimes seasons of a special character will help to animate our faith and give vigour to our hope, recalling our wandering thoughts to the first great principles of the doctrine of Christ.

Easter brings us a message of gladness and sounds a note of hope:—"Christ died for our sins, and rose again for our justification," that He might "deliver us from this present evil world." He died, not only to redeem us from the penalty due to sin, but also to rescue us from its corruption.

I. To deliver us from worldliness is the grand moral purpose for which our Saviour died. He effects this deliverance by winning our ardent and ever-growing love. When the whole heart goes out towards Him who has won our warmest love, He lifts us above the world; He breaks off the earth-chains. As Bunyan, in his immortal allegory, figures it, the Pilgrim, with his burden on his back, stands before the Cross, and Jesus crucified melts and wins him, links his soul to Him; the burden is loosed and falls away. When

. . . His love unknown
Has broken every barrier down, and opened to the eye of faith a new world that, by an irresistible attraction, draws off our hearts from this present evil world, then we can say, with George Herbert:

It was the sight of thy dear Cross
That weaned my soul from earthly things,
And taught me to esteem as dross
The mirth of fools and pomp of kings.

A man gave this testimony not long since: "I buried my father and my mother and did not shed a tear; I buried two of my fairest children, but my eyes were never moist; I buried their mother, a beautiful and faithful wife, but never a tear rolled down my cheeks. I never remember to have wept except when my mother punished me, till I believed that Jesus died for me. That broke my heart and won it." The dying love of Jesus has touched and melted and won millions of cold, stubborn hearts. Has it won your heart, kind reader? Are you delivered from worldliness, and is the separation clearly defined? If not, so far as you are concerned, Christ has died in vain. Let this be the cry of your soul:—

. . . I yield, I yield!
I can hold out no more.
I sink by dying love compelled,
And own Thee Conqueror.

II. Easter resounds the glad tidings of the resurrection. This great central fact is established by impregnable evidence. No other fact in the world's history is so abundantly proved. "It is Christ that died; yea, rather that is risen again!" Yea, rather! In vain the stone, the watch, the seal. He bursts the bonds of death. He lives who once was dead. The victory of the cross is succeeded by that of the tomb. Christ's claims are fully established. His death is all-efficacious as an atonement for human sin. Believers become the subjects of a new life, even as Christ entered upon a new life when He rose triumphant. In Christ we have passed out of the world of sin and death, into the world of resurrection life and glory. Thus must we "reckon" ourselves, and thus must we act, whatever our feelings may be. The Risen Christ is the pledge and earnest of our resurrection life. In God's good time every true believer shall be with Him and partake of his glory.

III. What fulness of consolation the Risen Christ has brought to light! Then shall we not rejoice with a true Easter joy? Surely, if we know experimentally the reality of a risen Redeemer, who has paid the ransom-price for our salvation, who has finished transgression and put an end to sin, we shall indeed be glad and sing for joy. Easter is as precious as Good Friday, and therefore, with beautiful propriety, has Keble taught us to sing:

O day of days! shall hearts set free
No minstrel rapture find for thee?
Thou art the sun of other days;
They shine by giving back thy rays.

To sing and talk, and read and hear of Him as "the Risen Christ," is one thing; to have a manifestation of Him in us and to us is quite another. Let us be satisfied with nothing less. This was the essential matter in Paul's experience, "It pleased God to reveal his Son in me;" and it must be the essential matter in ours. For our comfort and growth and usefulness, we need most of all the larger, the sweeter, and the more luminous discovery of Christ and his salvation. Let us seek this inward revelation in the spirit of ardent expectancy, and according to our faith it shall be done unto us. Let us, then, tell out the joyful news—He is risen! Alleluia!

"Talitha Cumi."

(AN EASTER MESSAGE.)

What is the message that Easter is bringing?
After the darkness, and gloom, of the night,
Sunbeams are shining, where thick mists were clinging—
Mystery soon will be merged into sight.

Rise, O sad heart, from thy weakness and sorrow,
Soon will all nature awake into life;
Yesterday past, look with hope to the morrow—
Peace is proclaimed o'er the din and the strife.

Long was the night, but the morning is breaking;
Cold was the winter, but springtime is here;
Open thine eyes! See, the buds are awaking,
Birds are now trilling their notes sweet and clear.

Listen to Christ, as He calls thee from slumber;
"Talitha Cumi"—"O maiden, arise!"
Sleep then no longer, but work in my vineyard.
Wouldst thou win souls? Then be watchful, be wise.

Chill was the grave, but "the Lord has arisen;"
Standing beside thee, He calleth thy name.
Rolled back the stone and burst open the prison,
Spread the glad news — Christ "through death overcame."

Eastertide brings thee the message of gladness—
Peace, joy, and deliverance are waiting for thee.
Arise from thy slumber; the Master's voice calls thee.
Tell others "He lives," from all sin to set free.

"Thrust forth Labourers."

AN APPEAL TO CHRIST'S CHURCH.

WE speak of our home heathen, but missionaries and others who have lived in heathen lands say that heathenism there is inconceivably more heathenish than the heathenism we see at home. This is certainly true at least as to its extent, though in the sight of God the ungodliness of Christendom may be more ungodly than that of heathendom, in so far as it is sin against greater light. "And if the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness!"

Great as the need of missionaries has always been, it has been largely increased in India by the recent famines, the last of which has caused the death of eleven in one district, has partially or completely disabled others, and at the same time has thrown thousands of children on the missionaries' hands, who need primary education and training in "honest trades for necessary uses" (Titus iii. 8, marg.).

Every thoughtful person must have observed the utter inadequacy of the workers at present in the field, and of the work possible to them, as compared with the responsibilities laid upon his people through all time, by their ascending Lord. Every Christian has said or sung, if not in these very words:

Five bleeding wounds He bears,
Received on Calvary;
They pour effectual prayers,
They strongly plead for me.
"Forgive him, oh forgive," they cry,
Nor let a ransomed sinner die.

Every believer has rejoiced in the blessings which have flowed to him from those atoning wounds; and in their daily silent but effectual intercession for himself. But in how few cases does he fulfil his Lord's command, either personally or representatively, to go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature—the good news that He is the propitiation not only for our sins, but for the whole world! We sing:—

The dear tokens of his passion
Still his glorious body bears,
Theme of endless exultation
To his ransomed worshippers:
With what rapture
Gaze we on those glorious scars!

But how insufficiently, how feebly, have we entered into the mind of the Apostles who bore witness of that which was in the beginning, that which they had seen and heard, and beheld with their eyes, that which their hands had handled of the Word of Life; and which they declared and showed unto us, in order that we also might have fellowship with them, and that our joy might be fulfilled.

Jesus, by the grace of God, tasted death for everyone, and we have proved it—

Who did for every sinner die
Hath surely died for me.

But how little have we been concerned that they who know it not should have fellowship with us. How little pains we have taken to declare it to them that their joy may be fulfilled!

Did we listen to cunningly-devised fables when those who were with Him in the holy mount, eye-witnesses of his majesty, made known to us the power and presence and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ? "For He received from the Father honour and glory when there came to Him such a voice from the majestic glory, 'This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.'"

If men spake these things from God, being moved by the Holy Ghost, is it not his mind that we should, by every means in our power, make them known to the ends of the earth? "To do good and to communicate forget not, for with such sacrifices God is well pleased."

What proportion is there between the need of the nations with their teeming millions, and the handful of missionaries sent out with the good tidings of great joy to all people, that there has been born a Saviour, Christ the Lord, who has lived and died for them, who has been raised from the dead and glorified for them, who is on the right hand of God, and ever liveth to make intercession for those who come unto God by Him?

Is there no way by which the Church which is in God the Father can be aroused to her high and holy calling? Is there no way of awakening her conscience toward God—her compassion toward her fellow-creatures lying in darkness and the shadow of death?

Not many years ago, a man of God was affected with concern for churches which were heavily in debt. He visited one after another, got the pastor and officers to call a meeting of the members, laid before them the humiliating fact of their indebtedness, which in some degree, at least, tied their hands and closed their lips; and showed them visions of increased usefulness if they were freed from this incubus. Then he appealed to them to rise to the occasion, and clear off the debt at once. In many instances, wealthy men came forward, whom it cost nothing that they could feel, and others not wealthy, who gave what they did feel, and the debts of many churches were wiped out by that wise and energetic man's campaign.

In order to induce men to give, there must be a definite object, and a personal interest in that object. Those congregations were made to feel the scandal of their debt, and their personal interest in its removal. They responded, and the debt was gone.

What is the heaviest debt which strangles any existing church compared with the debt of Christians to Christ, on the one hand, and to the world for which He died, on the other? Every one of us is equally with our beloved brother Paul, a debtor to the Greek and to the Barbarian, to the wise and to the unwise—and should be ready, as much as in us lies, to preach the Gospel—to all men.

Is there no way of making the churches of Christ feel the sin of leaving the multitudes to perish; of giving every member to learn by experience "how beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings; that publisheth salvation, that saith unto Zion, 'Thy God reigneth'"? And that saith unto heathendom, "It is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners"?

The Father desires the last behest of his beloved Son to be obeyed. Therefore He will supply the messengers and the means to fulfil the great commission if undertaken by methods in accordance with his own will and Word.

Both messengers and means must be supplied from the people of God. For Jesus said, "Go ye." All cannot go abroad, or there would be none to bear witness at home. But each Christian individually, and each church, and the whole Church collectively, is responsible and privileged, "according to the effectual working in the measure of every part, to make increase of the body, to the building up of itself in love."

Does not the command "Go ye!" imply that at least every church should provide and support one missionary? Many churches should supply and support more than one. That this is easily possible is unquestionable. In doing so, the church would come into living contact, not only with the individual missionary sent and supported, but with mission work universally. No one can supply the tenth or the twentieth part of a missionary without coming into vital connection with the whole missionary enterprise throughout the world.

We mentioned in these columns seven or eight years ago a church, neither large nor wealthy, whose pastor formed a Missionary and Prayer Union, the sole condition of which was that each member should pray and give for missions daily. The daily gift might be a farthing, a penny, a shilling, more or less, as the giver could afford. At the end of a year the gifts enabled the Union to provide in whole or in part for a missionary to India, and it continues to do so. The missionary chosen has proved a true servant of Christ, and he has taken a wife as devoted and efficient as himself.

What that church has done, every church on an average in Great Britain and America could do. It only needs the goodwill and earnest endeavour of the pastor to take the initiative. A young girl of a missionary spirit was the chief helper of the pastor in the case mentioned.

Let none fear that this would be the last straw laid upon an already overburdened people. "There is that scattereth and yet increaseth; there is that withholdeth more than is meet, and it tendeth to poverty." "The liberal soul deviseth liberal things, and by liberal things shall he stand."

Many missionaries are maintained by churches, Y.M.C.A.'s, Y.W.C.A.'s, and other associations, by parents and circles of friends, and a few have resources of their own. For the most part, amounts from friends for specified missionaries are remitted through the Society to which they belong, and in all cases they are, or should be, held sacred for the person designated. A periodical correspondence with the friends who sustain, no less than with the Mission, tends to preserve the interest on both sides; it encourages the heart and strengthens the hands of the missionary, and keeps alive a missionary spirit in the circle at home.

There is a cry in India for many more devoted men and women to do the usual spiritual work of a missionary, settled in towns and cities, and itinerating through villages and country places. Besides these, educational and industrial missionaries are imperatively needed.

We must not distinguish the spiritual from the educational and industrial work. All is spiritual if we are walking in the Spirit. Paul was not neglecting his spiritual work when he was making tents that he might not be chargeable to the carnal Corinthians.

"Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that He will thrust forth labourers into his harvest." M.

Easter Morn.

Morn of triumph, morn of gladness,
Light supernal beams around:
Earth puts off its robe of sadness,
Christ arises, joys abound.

Strong the bars of death that bound Him,
But each bar is broken now;
Glory's peerless rays surround Him,
Light adorns the Conqueror's brow!

Hail Emmanuel! Hallelujah!
Hail the Victor from the grave!
Hail Emmanuel! Hallelujah!
Mighty now to bless and save.

Shout his triumphs! Seraphs, praise Him!
Join, ye ransomed, swell the song!
In your highest transport raise Him—
All to do Him honour throng!

Samuel and Saul.

The Inner and Outer Conflicts.

(1 Sam. xi.)

By Rev. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

THE eleventh verse records a great victory. It was the first public act of the reign of Saul, taking place a month after his inauguration. It at once justified his selection, and silenced the voice of detraction; he stood forth before the eyes of his own people, and of surrounding nations, as every inch a man and a king.

But in this chapter, for eyes that look beneath the surface, there is the record of another fight. There was the outward fight that Saul made for Israel; there was the inner and previous fight that Saul made for himself, against himself; and it was because he had conquered in the latter, of which there was probably no symptom or sign to the outward eye, that he carried himself erect in the fight with Nahash.

This is always so; within the fight there is another fight. Within the fight that men are waging with the sin and darkness of the world, there is always the inner fight, which they must wage with themselves, and for themselves.

THE INWARD FIGHT.

I.—Saul's inward fight, conflict, and victory. (1) He fought the subtle temptation to pride. Samuel, eager to constitute the new kingdom, called a great national assembly at Mizpah, where so great a defeat and victory had been recorded in earlier days. In their teeming multitudes the Israelites gathered there, and proceeded to elect their king by an appeal to God through a lot. After prayer the lot was cast, and the disposing of it was left to God. First the tribe of Benjamin was taken, then the clan of the Matrites, then the family of Kish, and ultimately the lot indicated Saul, the son of Kish, but he was not to be found. They looked for him everywhere in vain. And it was only when, for the second time, they appealed to the direction of the Urim and Thummim, that he was discovered hiding among the baggage-waggons.

This modesty was extremely beautiful, and our admiration of the natural traits of Saul's character cannot but be greatly enhanced by his unobtrusiveness. Those that assume to themselves high positions, yielding before the proud spirit of self-assumption, fail; but they who humble themselves, who generally think others better than they are, who deprecate notoriety and show, are those whom God exalts.

(2) There was the strong temptation which assailed him to vindictiveness. Amid the shouts, "God save the king," that applauded his nomination there were the voices of detractors, men of Belial, who whispered, "How shall this man save us?" These voices must have stung the heart of Saul. Nevertheless, he quenched the desire for revenge; he trampled beneath his feet the smouldering embers of vindictiveness. It was not that he was pusillanimous, for we are told, in this same chapter, that when he heard of the cry of Jabesh-gilead, "his anger was greatly kindled." He was capable of flaming forth against wrong, but in this case he held himself well in hand. To use the old English phrase of the A.V., He held his peace. The more one examines that phrase, the more fascinating it is—to hold your peace, not to let it go, not to let it be taken or snatched from you, not to let it be trampled under foot in anger, but to hold to it in the midst of irritation and fret, to hold your ground. "He held his peace."

The Hebrew, as suggested by the margin, is still more striking. "He was as though he had been deaf"—he pretended not to hear, albeit every word had struck deep into his soul. It is a great power when a man can act as though he were deaf to slander, deaf to detraction, deaf to unkind and uncharitable speeches, and treat them as though they had not been spoken, turning from man to God, leaving with God his vindication.

(3) There was one more temptation by which he must have been plied, the temptation to ostentation. When the assemblage was dispersed he returned from Mizpah to Gibeah. He had been designated by Samuel, and kissed by him in token of homage. Sign after sign had indicated him to be God's choice for Israel; he had stood forth amid the people's clamour, the acknowledged king of the land; yet when back again in Gibeah, in spite of temptation to ostentation and excess, he was noble enough to return to his rustic life; he took again in hand his plough, and for one whole month he drove the oxen across the fields, meditating much on the strange chance which had befallen, and wondering when God would open the door for him to step forth into the manifestation and enjoyment of the royalty which was already his.

II.—The outward conflict. One evening, as Saul came back from the field, he heard that low wail of distress and panic by which the Eastern populace makes known its anguish; and as he drew near to Gibeah he asked what it meant. "What aileth the people that they weep?" Then the story was told how, across the Jordan, in the land of Gilead, the city of Jabesh-gilead was hard pressed by the Ammonites, who, a hundred years before, had been disastrously defeated by Jephthah, but who had never relinquished their claim to the land. Under Nahash, the king, they had gathered in overwhelming numbers around the beleaguered city. Its citizens had tried their best to extricate themselves, but in vain. One week of respite alone had been extracted from the contemptuous clemency of Nahash; and if at the end of that week no deliverance came, then the right eye of every man would be put out, which, of course, would make him useless for purposes of war, because the left eye was, of course, always covered by the shield.

Then the man who had conquered himself became suddenly aware of the uprising of an altogether new power in his heart. We are told that "the Holy Spirit of God came mightily upon Saul"; a little further on we learn that "the fear of God fell on the people"; and still further on, "the Lord wrought a great salvation for Israel."

If you will be true in the inward battle, if by the grace of God you will trample upon the sins which so easily beset you, the time will come in your life also, when the Spirit of God will come upon you with an almost overwhelming power, and bear you forward to do what otherwise would be absolutely impossible; and as He works on you, He will work also on the people and on the foe.

Instantly Saul laid hold of his bullocks, slew them, cut them in pieces, and by messengers sent those pieces throughout the land. Instinctively, the entire people throughout the whole land of Israel obeyed the royal summons. Three hundred thousand Israelites and thirty thousand of Judah rallied "after Saul and after Samuel." They were at first but an undisciplined mob. Probably they were armed with scythes and goads, for the Philistines had deprived them of all other weapons; but Saul, in the power of God, numbered them—i.e., disciplined, arranged, and marshalled them, directing them by three different routes to fall upon the Ammonites in the morning. A message was sent to Jabesh-gilead to tell the people that help was coming, and their hearts were glad. Then, as the morning broke over the quiet hills and valleys of Gilead, and the little city was astir with expectation and hope, from three different sides Saul launched his army upon the sleeping hosts. Panic-stricken, they sprang to their feet; hardly awake, and dazed with the clamour of the battle-cries, they were unable to resist the onset of the men of Israel; and the rout was so complete that, by the noontide, two men were not left together. It was an auspicious beginning for the new reign.

Would you not win such a victory over the sin of the world? If so, there must be the self-mastery. Gird yourselves to fight "the good fight of faith." We are reminded that there are several circles to that fight. First, there is, of course, the outer circle of circumstances. A man must always begin with these, and rightly so. It is quite wise on your part to give up that business which is a constant source of temptation; to remove from that house where bad people live; to renounce that literature, those books, and that recreation, which are constantly causing you to offend, to extricate yourself from that friendship or fellowship which has been your curse. That is the first thing to do. Get right with your circumstances; touch not, taste not, handle not; come out and be separate. At any cost deliver yourself from the conditions of life that tempt you to sin.

Secondly, there is the inner circle of habit, for if our circumstances are like our clothes, our habits are like our skin, and every man has got to fight his lonely fight against habit; it may be of alcoholism; it may be of narcotism; it may be of impurity and immorality; nothing but the power of God can break the bonds that bind you. That is the second great fight in a man's life.

Thirdly, there is the battle against heredity. It may be that your father was a passionate man, and has passed on, perhaps from his ancestors, strong and vehement desires; that your mother was a vain, or proud, or quick-tempered woman, and that she has passed on to you something of her own quick, sensitive nature, that you cannot keep calm and still, cannot hold your peace, cannot seem as if you were deaf. Everyone has to meet with a certain number of predispositions in his life, which he has inherited, and which make the battle harder. Enumerate them, consider them, know them, then in the name of God put the grave of Christ between you and them, and let them meet you only through Him that died. In acting thus you may break the entail, and arrest for others that awful inheritance into which you have come.

When your outward circumstances are adjusted, when by the grace of God you have broken the spell of habit, when you have died to heredity, then you come face to face with the inner citadel of yourself. There are things that you must not do, temptations to which you must not yield, an inner self which you must crucify. Thus we fight our fight, and win in the power of the living Christ.

"I Have Touched Him!"

In a popular southern health-resort there is a shop well-known for its extensive assortment of illuminated photographs and sacred pictures. One day a Bible-woman, on her way to the mothers' meeting she was accustomed to hold each Tuesday in the lowest part of the town, stopped before this shop window, attracted by a series of pictures representing the different scenes of suffering in the last days of our Saviour's earthly life.

For her, such pictures had not the danger they possess for many, of exciting a merely sentimental emotion which has no practical effect on the character, for already her whole heart was yielded in loyal service to "the King." It was very solemnizing and impressive to her to pause a moment in her daily round of absorbing activity, and listen to the pathetic appeal, "Come, see if ever was sorrow like unto my sorrow"; and, as she looked, a thrill of deeply-touched feeling made her exclaim in a low voice, "And all this was for me!"

She was startled by a voice at her side, saying earnestly, "And why not for me, too?" Turning, she saw a man of refined and dignified bearing, who was looking at her with wistful inquiry in his eyes. Her reply was prompt and decisive, "For you, too, most surely, if you believe."

"How can I?" was the next question. The Bible-woman, much as she was interested in the unexpected encounter, could not prolong the conversation, for the time of her meeting was near. So taking from her satchel a booklet, entitled "Who Touched Me?" she handed it to the gentleman, saying respectfully, "This, sir, will answer your question much better than I can do; and I am sure you will excuse my hurrying away, for I have a meeting every Tuesday at three o'clock, and I must not keep the poor women waiting."

The book was received with a graceful gesture of thanks, and the good woman, as she hastened away, prayed earnestly that its pages might be illumined to the reader by the gracious Spirit's light.

During the week, her work lay in a different part of the town; but on the following Tuesday, at the same hour, she was passing along the same street, when, coming near the print-shop, she saw the gentleman standing. He came eagerly forward to meet her, and, with a joyous expression lighting up his noble face, he said, "I have touched Him, and I feel that He has touched me; but I want to know more about Him. Can you tell me?"

The Bible-woman was perplexed. Of a naturally retiring disposition, she shrank from what appeared to her the presumption of "trying to teach so fine a gentleman;" and then, too, her women were waiting for her. But she remembered an evangelistic service to be held that evening in a mission hall, where she knew he would hear the simple Gospel; and telling him of this, and explaining her inability to stay for longer conversation, she started off at her usual rapid business-like pace.

Her meeting over, anxious thoughts began to crop up in her mind: "I'm not sure that the mission hall was the right place to send a gentleman like him to," she thought. "Perhaps I ought to have directed him to one of the churches; anyhow, after I've had a cup of tea, I'll step that way, and look in before the mothers' prayer-meeting."

When she arrived, the service had commenced, and the motley audience, gathered principally from the roughest population of the neighbourhood, was held silent under the spell of a man's voice; a simple, unlettered man, but "filled with the Spirit," his words and gesture proved that where that Divine Teacher dwells He refines the roughest vessel, making it meet for the Master's use. There was wonderful pathos in his homely words; and as the Bible-woman looked, she saw what moved her to deep emotion. In the centre of the building, side by side with some of the most notorious "roughs" of the neighbourhood, sat her new acquaintance, his refined appearance in strange contrast with his surroundings, he evidently forgetting all else in listening to the message which was so evidently one of peace to him. And so, with a thankful heart, she left him. She had been used to lead him to the door of the fold, she saw him entering in, and she knew that henceforth the Good Shepherd would fulfil his promise of still waters and green pastures.

Work on the Blackdown Hills.

For nearly forty years the Lord has been pleased to manifest his power and grace through the Gospel preached on the Blackdown Hills, and the work still prospers in the seven mission rooms scattered over the district. Having just paid a visit to the scene of my late father's indefatigable labours, where for twenty-eight years it was my privilege to render service, I am more than thankful to be able to report progress in almost every station and branch of the work. The services held on Lord's Days are invariably well attended. Notwithstanding bitterly cold weather, the Hills being covered with snow, and the roads far from pleasant, yet the meetings at Clayhidon and Bolham were literally packed, and these largely from the families of former converts who were led to Christ in my father's days. It was a delightful sight to me to see, at the meetings one Sunday, scores of young men and women who were scholars in our day and Sunday-schools, now on the Lord's side, living godly lives; and many of them serving the Lord Jesus as teachers and local preachers.

NEW WORKERS RAISED UP.

Since the last notice in The Christian we have been led to wait upon the Lord that He would raise up some permanent resident evangelists and workers, who should be able to give their whole time to visiting and preaching. This has been accomplished through God's grace, and two brethren had been led to undertake the work in the eastern and western districts. Both of these were among the earliest fruits of my father's labours, and being thoroughly acquainted with the various mission stations and outlying districts, will (with the still continued and most acceptable help of friends from Wellington, Taunton, Uffculme, Tiverton, &c., who on Lord's Days render valued service in preaching) be able to accomplish much more among the people. This, however, has involved us in greatly increased responsibilities, and we earnestly crave the prayers of God's people that the great need may be met, and thus the work of God be carried on with vigour and without burden and care to the superintendent and treasurer.

SERIOUS FINANCIAL POSITION.

A large adverse balance was due to the treasurer at the end of the last financial year, which has not yet been made up. For such a mission to cease would be a calamity, and a great dishonour to the Church of Christ. Nor do we think this will be. The day-school and four Sunday-schools are most encouraging, hundreds having been truly converted to God since their establishment. A visit to those districts by any of the Lord's people would convince them of the reality of the work, and of the importance of maintaining it in full force. I shall be pleased to send a copy of our last annual report of the mission to any reader who would wish for one, and shall rejoice to be still able to superintend the work as in former years, as the Lord Himself shall strengthen me and supply the need. Communications and contributions for the work should be addressed to me, either at Clayhidon, Wellington, Som., or 10, Albert Road, Clevedon, Som.

Education of the Blind.—A conference of leaders and teachers of the blind will assemble in London, April 22, to discuss methods and prospects of education. At a preliminary service on April 21, all the officiating clergy will be blind. A choir is expected from the Royal Normal College for the Blind, and the preacher will be Rev. N. F. McNeile, vicar of Brafferton, Yorks.

Among the Jews.

THE BARBICAN MISSION.

The headquarters of the Barbican Mission to the Jews are in Whitechapel. Erected in memory of a former president of the work, Prebendary Gordon Calthrop, the Mission House is a capacious and well-appointed building. A staff of devoted men and women, with many voluntary workers, find full occupation for hand and heart among the Jews who enter its walls. There are meetings of some sort every day in the week, and home visitation is carried out in a systematic manner.

My object in calling at 82, Whitechapel Road, on Saturday afternoon last, was to watch the assembling of men to hear the Gospel, and to listen to the message as it might be proclaimed. I heard, by the way, good things of the daily Bible Class, the Home for Inquirers and Converts, and the Reading Room, which offers friendly shelter and good companionship to Jews from many lands. It would have been a pleasure to see more of these agencies and operations, which have been blessed to many.

THE HEARERS.

In the course of the afternoon, over two hundred men found their way into the very comfortable chapel. Many types were represented; before the meeting had proceeded far, I detected among the company Pharisees and Sadducees in all their essential qualities. There were men who looked down upon their fellow Jews and every one else; they came in with airs, and went out with contemptuous smiles. The restlessness of the synagogue was occasionally apparent; and some of those present were undoubtedly actuated by curiosity rather than a genuine religious concern.

To a very encouraging extent, however, the audience was made up of patient and well-behaved men. The converts and inquirers were easily distinguished; they bowed in prayer with a purpose not shown by others, and the singing was largely led by their voices. There were old men, near the end of life's pilgrimage, also young men, rejoicing in a measure of freedom from Rabbinical bondage, and readily associating themselves with the old-time inquiry—"What think ye of Christ?" Taken as a whole, the hearers did their part well; they followed with animated interest the message of the missionary.

THE PREACHING.

The message was eminently timely. From first to last the service was conducted by the director of the mission, Prediger C. T. Lipshytz. The Scriptures read were Isa. lv. and John vii. 37-53; and the text of the sermon was Isa. liii. 6: "All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all." Needless to say, the discourse was controversial; it is still necessary to "confute the Jews, and that publicly, showing by the Scriptures that Jesus was the Christ" (Acts xviii. 26, 28. R.V.).

Regarding the particular chapter from which the text was taken, the question which the eunuch propounded to Philip is still asked: "I pray thee of whom speaketh the prophet this?" The answer of the missionary was very clear; the Servant of the Lord was not the prophet himself, nor the Israelitish people, but the Messiah of old-time promise, for whose appearance the pious in Israel were waiting. The Sinless One who was wounded for our transgressions; the Man of Sorrows who bore the sin of many and became the Lord of Righteousness; Jesus Christ, the Son of God, who suffered, and died, and rose again to deliver us from evil and bring us to God: these were points and positions maintained in the eloquent and comprehensive discourse, which occupied nearly an hour in delivery. The prophet knew that Israel would not receive his message. Hence he inquired, "Who hath believed our report" (or doctrine)? The same question is ever and anon asked by the devoted evangelist among the Jews. But, all the same, the preaching goes on, "whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear" (Ezek. ii. 5).

Methodism and the Masses.

A STORY of remarkable progress was unfolded at the annual meeting of the London Mission of the Wesleyan body, held on Tuesday of last week at Wesley's Chapel, City Road, N.

Mr. Josiah Gunton, who presided, said that when the Mission was started some sixteen years ago, he was not in full sympathy, but having studied its operations he had become a convert with regard to its usefulness. The mission has now eight branches, twenty-one ministers, thirty-five lay agents, and seventy "sisters of the people." The work is carried on in forty different buildings, where there are 8,000 persons in membership.

THE SECRET OF SUCCESS.

An enthusiastic address followed from the general secretary, Rev. W. D. Walters, who described the origin and early efforts of the Mission, and said that God has made the undertaking a marvellous blessing to London. As an illustration of the results of the work, Mr. Walters instanced the Clerkenwell (Central) Mission, where remarkable advances are being made among the working-classes. A congregation of 1,500, consisting of working-men and their families, gathers in the Mission chapel at every Sunday evening service, and at least 600 attend the monthly communion. As Christ has been exalted, infidelity has gone down. In the medical branch there are 160 medical men affiliated to the Mission. The needs of the starving children of the slums are also ministered to, 50,000 breakfasts being given every winter. One indirect result of the establishment of the Mission has been the commencement of similar operations in other great cities, while the work has been an inspiration to circuit life throughout Wesleyan Methodism. The secret of the success and strength of the Mission, Mr. Walters contended, is its spiritual force. More than 1,000 people met together every week at the various branches of the Mission to pray for the prosperity of the work.

REDEMPTION AND HEALING.

After telling appeals from Mr. R. W. Perks, M.P., and Rev. Walford Green, came a forcible address from Rev. J. E. Wakerley, who said that the evidence of the influence of the Mission upon particular districts is remarkably clear. Citizenship has been affected for good, and the municipal life of the districts influenced. The homeless and the friendless are cared for, and Saturday evening engagements provided to counteract the influence of the public-house. There are 200 crippled children under the care of the Central London Mission alone. Above all, men and women are week by week being brought into the light, and are finding redemption and healing through the precious blood of Christ.

THE MESSAGE OF THE CHURCHES.

The last speaker was Rev. J. Gregory Mantle, who said that his connection with the Mission has deepened the impression that the Gospel is as attractive and powerful as ever. People turn away from preachers who feel that they have exhausted the Old Book, and who have to go to Matthew Arnold, and Tennyson, and Carlyle. Souls do not want to know what Matthew Arnold has to say, but what Jesus Christ has to say. The agnostic, and the the theosophist, and the mental scientist have no message to which the human heart can respond; but when the Christian preacher comes with the "old, old story of Jesus and his love," the human heart replies, "That is what I want." Mr. Mantle concluded with a vivid account of the rescue work carried on in Piccadilly by Sisters Margaret and Faith, of the West London Mission, and related a touching story of a young Scotch girl, who, enticed from her home by a nobleman and betrayed, was identified at a midnight supper by Sister Margaret by means of a photograph, and restored to her mother in her native village.

A Southwark Ragged-School.

FOUNDED by Thomas Cranfield in the last decade of the eighteenth century, the ragged-school in Kent Street, Southwark, has been the centre of a good and far-reaching work. Being in the line of the ancient Roman Watling Street from Dover to London, Kent Street was for centuries the only entrance into London from the south-eastern counties, and the squalid, degraded outlook was of old anything but reassuring to ambassadors and foreign grandees who visited the city for the first time. In face of the roughest opposition on the part of the poor inhabitants, Cranfield, assisted by his devoted wife, entered this haunt of crime and disease with the Gospel. The late Mr. William West became superintendent in 1804, and held that office until 1866, a period of sixty-two years.

The school has for long been a station of the Southwark Sunday-school Society, of which Rev. F. B. Meyer is president; but at the same time it is associated with the Ragged-School Union. The school-house, which was never of a very substantial kind, has been rebuilt at a cost of about £1,000. The treasurer is Mr. G. H. Payne (350, Kennington Road), son of the oldest deacon at the Metropolitan Tabernacle. There are 500 names of children on the school roll. Having two sets of teachers, the school is open morning, afternoon, and evening on Sunday. On each evening of the week, except Saturday, more than one meeting is held; and on three nights of the week opportunities are afforded for recreative exercises, the baths alone being of great service, the art of swimming also being well taught.

Much importance is attached to the evangelistic service, which is held regularly on each successive Friday evening. This, being intended for the very poorest class, is conducted by members of a Bible-class which meets at the Metropolitan Tabernacle. Two meetings are held successively, the first being for 350 girls, the second for as many boys, each service being restricted to an hour. On leaving, each child receives a substantial supper.

These semi-destitute children are from time to time indebted to the Corporation of London Freemen's Orphan School for cast-off clothing. Other friends have sent similar gifts, and have thus enabled some of the otherwise too literally ragged scholars to obtain situations as a start in life which otherwise would not have been open to them.

The work thus carried on is of course entirely unsectarian; there are no paid officials, and no small part of the expenditure is supplied by the workers, the main part of whom were former scholars. This is surely an encouraging example of training the poor to become Christian teachers of those of their own order. In some measure, the school also differs from many others of its kind on this account: the teachers have been accustomed to bring their own children, and their friends' children to the school, and no harm has ever been known to result from their mixing with the children of the district, while the blessing to the school-children has been very great.

The school, which has been rebuilt after a century of hard and good service, was opened in a becoming manner recently by the Marquess of Northampton, supported by other friends of the Ragged-School Union. This school now promises to enter upon a new era of usefulness, which is likely to satisfy and encourage those who have supported the work. The Marquess made a most effective speech, a grandson of the founder was present, and much enthusiasm prevailed.

Y.W.C.A.—The Rothesay, N.B., Association is a thriving centre where many departments of religious work are carried on with encouraging results. Operations, however, are much hampered by the want of an institute. Miss M. A. Law, hon. sec., Ardbeg, Rothesay, who has devoted much time and attention to the work, has endeavoured to raise £600 for purchasing and furnishing suitable premises. She hopes that outside help may be forthcoming to provide the required balance of £400, some £200 having been collected locally.

Dublin Medical Mission.

WITH a ten-years' record of remarkable activity the Dublin Medical Mission enters upon a new decade, with a wider field of usefulness before it, and with reassuring prospects. Many friends of the mission will learn with regret that, coincident with this anniversary, a change of secretaryship is being made, through the resignation of Mrs. E. E. Figgis and Mr. W. R. Wigham. For some time past those intimate with the executive have realized that the work is expanding, and interest in the mission widening to such an extent as to render it impossible for an honorary secretary to cope with it. Added to this was the hope in the minds of many that a branch dispensary might be started in another part of Dublin, bringing additional duties to the already overburdened secretary.

The need for a mission hospital has been abundantly proved by Dr. Clayton and Dr. Barnes, and it was felt that the best means of realizing the idea would be the amalgamation of the Cottage Hospital Council and the Dublin Medical Mission committee. Accordingly, the amalgamated bodies continue under the name of the Dublin Medical Mission, with Dr. Barnes as secretary.

In the course of a letter to subscribers, Mrs. Figgis writes: "I have every confidence in the ability of Dr. Barnes to fill the position capably, and I am convinced that his appointment at this time is no mere chance, but that every step of the way, the Master has guided in this matter. The Mission is at present £250 in debt, and it seems unfair to Dr. Barnes that his term of office should commence with this weight." Mrs. Figgis is naturally desirous that this burden should be removed, and will be glad to hear from friends willing to assist. She may be addressed, Hawthorn, Sidney Parade, Dublin.

A Needful Lecture Campaign.

ARRANGEMENTS are being made by the Bible Defence Union of Scotland for a five days' Conference at Perth in the second week of August. We expect to have Dr. A. T. Pierson with us from America.

It has occurred to us that, in connection with this visit, Dr. Pierson could render a larger service. Courses of lectures might be arranged for in some of the large centres in England and Scotland. Many of us view with increasing alarm the steady advance of a teaching that is subverting the very foundations of belief. But surely that alarm should lead to action.

Dr. Pierson is universally recognised as a scholarly, profound, and eloquent exponent and defender of the things most surely believed among us, and his help at the present crisis might be of signal and enduring service to multitudes. Will those who love the truth make this possible by communicating with me, care of the Editor of The Christian? John Urquhart.

Albion Hill Home, Brighton.

THE work of the Albion Hill Home is principally one of rescue. A shelter is offered to the homeless fallen, and the Home is the means of reclaiming those who appeared to be in a hopeless condition. In the course of the forty-seventh annual report, which has just been issued, Prebendary R. Snowdon Smith says:—"Not only is it desirable to build up in forming the character, establishing the principles, and instructing the mind; but it is also necessary to pull down and destroy the evil habits, desires, and propensities which a life of sin has fostered. The prejudice which very naturally existed against taking servants from the Home has been removed by the almost uniform good conduct of those who have obtained situations."

Many of the letters of the former girls are most affecting in their expressions of warm and simple love and gratitude for the benefit derived from their residence in the Home. One girl writes: "I am about to leave my place where I have been for over six years, and before doing so would like to thank you for your kindness to me while I was at the Home." Another letter reads: "I cannot thank you enough for all your kindness to me, and I do wish that I had been a better girl and not given you so much trouble."

During the year 1901, fifty-seven girls were admitted and twenty-seven sent out to domestic service. The secretary is Rev. Reginald C. Macdonald, Home Villa, Queen's Park, Brighton.

Befriending the Sailor.

WESLEYAN METHODIST SEAMEN'S MISSION.

THE adaptability of the Wesleyan Forward Movements to the needs of working class districts has been abundantly proved by the results attending the Missions established in different parts of London. Special classes are met and successfully dealt with in each case. The Seamen's Mission differs from the other branches, however, in addressing itself mainly to one particular section of the community; and the leaders have experienced the great joy of seeing the work of the Lord prosper in their hand more and more as the years have passed.

On the human side, the secret of the success of the Seamen's Mission is to be found in the personality of the men who have been at the head of it. Since 1843 a continuous testimony has been borne that hope for the raising of the sunken, and the purifying of society, lies only in the finished work of the Redeemer. The four years during which the present superintendent has been in charge have been a time of special activity and expansion.

Born at Stone, in Staffordshire, in 1847, Rev. David Roe (18, Stainsby-rd., Poplar, E.) was the child of poor, hard-working parents. Little value was placed on education, and as soon as the boy was able, he was sent into the fields to earn his own living. The first great turning point in his life was his conversion at the age of twelve, but the good seed seemed for a few years to lie dormant where it had been sown. Four years later, actuated by ambition to "get on," and a desire to see the world, he made his way to America. When leaving, his mother assured him that she would not cease to pray that he might be within a year brought back to whole-hearted allegiance to the Lord Jesus Christ. That mother's prayer of faith was answered, and a useful life was thus won to the Master's service.

"One night," he says, "after a pleasure drive, I strolled into a place of worship. I was reminded of my mother's parting words, and realized that it was within a few weeks of the expiry of the year. It was a 'revival service,' and many were deciding for Christ. I waited a fortnight, all the time under conviction, and then yielded myself to God, joining the Methodist Episcopal Church."

The consciousness of ignorance now came home vividly to Mr. Roe's mind, and so determined was he to regain lost ground, that by hard work during four successive summers he saved enough money to put himself to school for the winter months of each year. That such a man could not remain silent on the greatest of all subjects was borne in on the minds of those who knew him best; and one Sunday morning he was startled to hear his minister announce, without previous communication with himself, that "Brother Roe" would preach in the evening. After some hours spent in prayer and preparation, he went into the pulpit in a state of fear and trembling. But the minister knew his man, and the result proved true insight. At the end of the service he said, "Brother Roe, you are evidently called of God to preach, and it is our duty to make arrangements for you to go to college at once." Mr. Roe pleaded that he had no means; but a vacancy was found at Wyoming College, Pennsylvania, and within a week of the preaching of that first sermon he found himself at college. For three years he remained there, working for his own living from the outset. At the end of the first year he was placed in charge of a small church which had very much fallen away; and during the following year two other small causes were placed under his charge. At each of these places he proved his possession of the qualities and powers which have borne more abundant fruit in London. On account of a breakdown in health he was recommended to turn his face homeward. Returning to England, he studied for a time at Didsbury College, and was ordained at Birmingham in 1879.

Indomitable energy and singleness of aim characterized Mr. Roe wherever his lot was cast. When he was appointed to Willesden Circuit, for instance, in 1885, the congregation was recognised to be in a very languishing condition. But his advent infused new courage and energy into the workers, and from the very outset a change for the better manifested itself. Larger attendances at the services proved that a new interest had been awakened, and the fact that the membership doubled in two years showed that the movement was a truly spiritual one. Every organization connected with the chapel was influenced by the spirit of the pastorate, a special development being visible in the number and size of the Bible-classes.

It was, however, in Bow Circuit Mission, that this zealous seeker after souls first turned his attention specially to East London, and proved to the full his grip of the problem of the lapsed masses. Four years ago, when the superintendentship of the Seamen's Mission fell vacant, it was felt that he was the man peculiarly fitted for the post, and subsequent experience has vindicated the wisdom of the appointment. Besides expansion along the old lines, new avenues of service have been opened up. Three months ago we gave an account of the laying of the foundation stone of the Victoria Seamen's Rest. Attractive reception rooms and dormitories will be provided for the men, model dwellings will accommodate the wives and families of some of those who are at sea, and a settlement will be formed for the accommodation of helpers, who will take up residence in the midst of the work.

A GOOD YEAR.

Few figures are given in Mr. Roe's annual statements; but the fifty-eighth anniversary was celebrated last Thursday by large gatherings, and with much quiet satisfaction. The chair was taken in the afternoon by Mr. George E. Morgan, M.A., who based a few words of encouragement and stimulus to the helpers on the difficulties experienced by Zaccheus, owing to the denseness of the crowd, and his own smallness of stature. These have their counterpart in Christian service to-day, as workers in large cities realise the vastness of the population, and their insignificance in dealing with it. But these facts should only stimulate to greater earnestness; and, if necessity demand, somewhat unconventional methods, as when Zaccheus (a respectable middle-aged man!) ran and climbed a tree, they must not hesitate to cast aside the elements of respectability and dignity, if by any means they may save some. "Let us not mind so much what the world will think of us, if we are in the line of working for God. We need not be too particular about our reputation; the highest reputation we can have is that we be found faithful."

Mr. Roe was able to speak of a record year. In addition to work directly among sailors, much is done for the denizens of the neighbourhood. The Mitre Children's Mission has been started to care for the poorest and most neglected of the children, and has been crowned with immediate success. Among the agencies are a Sunday-school, with more scholars than the school-room will properly accommodate; a cripples' parlour, where afflicted little ones are regularly entertained and instructed in the way of Life; a factory girls' Bible-class and social club, which is doing a fine work among the girls; a Pleasant Thursday Evening, when the little ones are told again of the Children's Friend in bright, interesting fashion.

The committee rejoice to find that the interest in the Mission is wider and more influential than at any other time during its long history. Doubtless this is largely due to the scheme for the new buildings, and in connection with the Victoria Seaman's Rest, a scheme has already been set on foot whereby the new buildings may become known in a practical and useful manner all over the world.

The aim is to secure active association with Seamen's Homes in distant lands. Already correspondence has taken place which promises to associate the work of such homes in Australia, China, India, New Zealand, Africa and America with the work at home. Men who have been under care here will be given introductions to similar missions at the ports to which they are bound, and the officers of such missions will be advised of the coming of these men. In turn, similar notices will be encouraged, and arrangements made for the reception of men so passed on, a plan which meets a need long felt in sailor work.

A Prayer Union has been formed, and friends are invited to join in daily intercession for the salvation of sailors, at the hour when the Bible class is being conducted at the Rest.

Rev. Edwin H. Ellis (of the East London Tabernacle) expressed in the heartiest terms the good will of the neighbouring churches and ministers; while a most helpful and instructive turn was given to the whole proceedings through a Bible-reading by Rev. J. Gregory Mantle, on the taking of Jericho, and the unusual methods employed, in obedience to the Divine command.

A sum of £300 was asked for on behalf of the ordinary work, with a statement that £6,000 is still required on account of building operations. The "Distress Fund" is also exhausted, because the demands have been more numerous than usual from the homeless and friendless, the sick, and the starving. This splendid work is deserving of hearty support.

At six o'clock a meeting was presided over by Mr. C. J. O. Sanders, when the sisters and agents of the Mission gave some account of their work, and bore testimony to the blessing and success experienced.

The day closed with a great public meeting, when the Hall was filled with a crowd representing many classes. The chair was taken by Mr. W. B. Bawn, L.C.C., and Mr. Roe was able to report contributions to the amount of £965 towards the £6,000 required. After the financial statement had been submitted by the treasurer (Mr. George Lidgett), encouraging addresses and hearty greetings were given by Canon Barker, Rev. W. Hollings, Mr. J. S. Randles, M.P., and others.

M. Alfred Boegner,

DIRECTOR OF THE PARIS EVANGELICAL MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

THE subject of this sketch is a native of Alsace, having been born at Strasburg in 1851. Trained in a Christian home, he early decided to devote himself to the career of a pastor, and had gone through the greater part of his theological studies in his native city, when the Franco-German war, followed by the annexation of Alsace, compelled him to choose between German and French nationality. He unhesitatingly chose the latter, completed his course at Montauban, and for three years filled a pastorate of the French Protestant Church in the north-east of France. Thence he was summoned to Paris in 1879 to assist the late M. Casalis, who, after having been one of the founders of the Basutoland Mission, had been since 1856 director of the Paris Missionary Society, and head of its missionary college. In 1882, M. Casalis retired, and from that time M. Boegner has been the "director"—pretty much what in England would be called the general secretary—of the society, which includes in its committee representatives of the three chief branches of French Evangelical Protestantism—the Reformed, Lutheran, and Free Churches.

When M. Boegner undertook this responsible post, the Paris Society already occupied three fields of missionary labour—Basutoland, Tahiti, and Senegal. Of the first, which has been lately described in these columns in connection with the recent visit to this country of M. Casalis, the son of M. Boegner's predecessor, it is unnecessary again to speak at length. It will suffice to revert to the fact that Basutoland has long been a British Protectorate, as giving the Paris Society a special claim to the sympathy of British Christians. Tahiti was the first field of labour taken over by the Paris Society as a legacy from the London Missionary Society, the annexation of that island to France having rendered the continued work of English missionaries impracticable. Our French Protestant brethren stepped in to save the missions there from being swallowed up by Roman Catholics. The Senegal Mission, which M. Boegner personally visited during the winter of 1890-91, has always been the weakling of the Paris Mission; the post is one of great prospective importance, but the urgent claims that have arisen since its foundation, first in one direction and then another, combined with the Society's limited resources, have prevented its expansion.

Four years after M. Boegner's appointment as director, the Paris Missionary Society became for the first time possessed of a home which it could call its own, the Maison des Missions, 102, Boulevard Arago, near the Paris Observatory. Its erection was due to the energy of Dr. Gustave Monod (one of the brothers of the famous preacher, Adolphe Monod), who collected the needful funds, chiefly among his old patients. There M. Boegner was joined by his old schoolfellow and friend, F. H. Krüger, of whose career as teacher of the missionary students at the Mission House a sketch appeared in these columns soon after his death in 1900. The number of these students rapidly increased, and has generally averaged twelve to fifteen. In the management of this beautiful and commodious home—already, however, become too small for the needs of the society's growing work—M. Boegner has had an efficient helpmeet in his wife, who is a daughter of the eloquent pastor and senator, Edmond de Pressensé. Notwithstanding the claims of her own family, Madame Boegner finds time to be a sympathetic friend, both to the young men who came under her care as students, and to the numerous missionaries on furlough, and their wives and children who pass through the Mission House.

Meanwhile, the three mission fields have increased to seven, and all these, except Senegal, have themselves seen constant expansion. The readers of The Christian are already conversant with the Zambesi Mission, itself an outcome of missionary zeal kindled amongst the society's converts in Basutoland, and which has as its leader M. Coillard, one of the most inspiring missionary heroes of our time.

The Tahiti mission has also developed missionary activity as regards other French islands of the South Seas. Work has been taken over from the L.M.S., in circumstances similar to those which occasioned the transfer at Tahiti, in the Loyalty Islands and in Maré, while in New Caledonia and some other islands, the work is mainly carried on by native evangelists, with a certain amount of superintendence from French missionaries.

M. ALFRED BOEGNER.

The French Congo Mission, founded in 1892, after a preliminary journey of inquiry by two missionaries, has seen a large measure of success. There, also, two recent deaths have seriously weakened the mission, and the climate necessitates frequent furloughs. In this field, too, the competition of Roman Catholic missions is a constant menace.

The greatest extension, however, has been in Madagascar, and has arisen out of the conquest of that island by the French in 1895. In view of the grave fears that the noble work of the British missions, particularly of the L.M.S., might be destroyed by Jesuit aggression, the Society sent two delegates, Professor Krüger and Pastor Lauga, to inquire as to the desirability of commencing a French mission. They found that such an effort was urgently necessary. M. Lauga commenced a Protestant service at Antananarivo, and did not leave until a temporary successor had been found in the person of M. Escande, a missionary from Senegal, at home on furlough, who readily accepted the Society's appeal to take up the work. Early in 1897 the first band of missionaries went out, headed by Paul Minault, one of the most powerful preachers whom Protestant France could furnish. Together with M. Escande, he was assassinated before he had been many months in the island.

The circumstances of this event are obscure; the murderers were soon caught and executed. But the Protestants of France had reason to suspect, behind the Malagasy assassins—who did not even take their victims' watches—the hand of the cruel and unscrupulous foes of their Huguenot forefathers—the Jesuits. Never was there a more striking illustration of the French rendering of a verse in Proverbs: "The evil one doeth a work which deceiveth him." The foul murder of two of their best-beloved and most trusted missionaries aroused the Protestants of France to put forth such an effort as they had never made before, so that within three years no less than fifty-two adults went forth to found the new mission.

This visit to Madagascar, following on that of Rev. R. Wardlaw Thompson and Mr. Evan Spicer, of the L.M.S., was abundantly blessed. The Jesuits, who had celebrated the conquest of Madagascar by Te Deums, had spared neither force nor fraud in the propagation among the terrified Malagasy of the falsehood: to be loyal subjects of France, you must be Catholics. The presence of French Protestant missionaries was in itself a refutation of the lie; M. Boegner was able to obtain from General Gallieni, who had gone out to Madagascar with strong prejudice against the English missionaries, and especially those of the L.M.S., express assurances that the work should be left unhindered; and shortly after his return, a decree was issued for the organization of the schools of the island.

On his way back to France, M. Boegner made a brief stay at Basutoland, which he had already visited with his wife in 1883. He passed a week with M. Coillard, at Buluwayo, as the latter was returning to the Zambesi. Before leaving Madagascar, however, he had contracted the fever of the island, which laid him aside more or less completely for about a year after his return. Only in the autumn of 1900 was he able to resume the responsibility of his post, thus liberating his colleague, M. Bianquis (who had occupied his post for some two years), to go to Madagascar, and take up the important position of French pastor at Antananarivo, and head of the French mission in that island.

The heroic efforts made by the French Protestants, with the generous help, both in men and money, of their brethren in French-speaking Switzerland, have brought about a financial position which has weighed very heavily on M. Boegner, as head of the Paris Mission. The total expenditure of the Society has increased three-fold within ten years, and although deficits were averted in 1899 and 1900, thanks to many generous gifts from the wealthy, and many touching sacrifices on the part of the poor, a year ago there was a deficit of 110,000 francs (£4,400), which threatens to be greatly increased this year.

The Paris Missionary Society has for many years past adopted "the policy of faith," so well known to the friends of some of our own missionary institutions. It has never refused to enter into new fields of work, while maintaining the old ones, whenever the call of God appeared clear on the one hand, and on the other hand the workers presented themselves in response to that call. Many of the French Protestant churches have already responded nobly to the present need. The Basuto Christians, notwithstanding the losses recently sustained by them through bad crops and cattle disease, have subscribed considerable sums towards the needs of their "fathers" of the Paris Mission. In Madagascar itself, one missionary gives up his whole salary for 1902; another, 1,000 francs out of his; a third, a supplementary sum of 300 francs to which he has become entitled by passing an examination in Malagasy; two others, a month's salary each. M. Boegner writes:—

For myself, everything is summed up in 2 Cor. iv. 1, especially emphasizing the words, "as we have received mercy." I cannot, indeed, always say, "We faint not." I try not to faint; yet often I feel as if the waters were almost meeting over my head.

Will not British Christians sustain this intrepid worker by their prayers, and by their gifts? Joseph G. Alexander.

Scriptures for Jews in India.

A TOUCHING appeal has reached me from Calcutta for Yiddish Scriptures. Mrs. Lennard, writing from the Y.W.C.A. Home, Calcutta, says:—"The Lord has called me to Calcutta to work among the Jews. It has cost me much prayer and many years of consideration; but now the Lord has said, 'Go, and I will be with thee. Fear not.' There are 4,000 Jewish families in Calcutta. They emigrate here in large numbers from Russia, Poland, Austria, Bulgaria, Roumania, Egypt, &c.; all these are Yiddish-speaking Jews. Very little is being done among these; some of them have sunk very low in sin and degradation, and yet they are very accessible. A Christian lady took me round to some of the houses, because she had heard that I could speak Yiddish. It almost broke my heart, as we went from house to house, to find in what an awful state of sin they are living. The children are very much neglected. The boys and girls wander about the streets; no school will take them in. I have come to Calcutta to give my whole time and life to the work. The Jews are very anxious that their children should be taught. They say, 'Have a school for us, and we will send our children. They are also most willing to have the complete Bible in the language they understand (Yiddish), and to be taught or taken step by step in their own Scriptures."

Mrs. Lennard tells of two encouraging cases of conversion of young Jews, and adds: "I was brought up as a child in a Hebrew school on the Continent; my playmates were Jewish girls; our neighbour was a rabbi; I was always in their house, almost lived there. I have had a love for the Jews ever since my childhood, for the Lord gave me abundant opportunities to mingle with them, and thus to learn their habits and ways. May I ask your help in organizing a Calcutta Jewish Mission? I want a boarding school for the Jewish children. Pray do not delay, because since I came here the Roman Catholics have got jealous; they see the Lord prospering me, and they are going to step in. The Lord has scattered his chosen people among us, and He expects us to lead them to a knowledge of the truth as it is in the Lord Jesus." Similar appeals come from all parts of the world. The hunger for the Bread of Life is everywhere increasing.

Home Settlement for Young Men.—Among useful institutions already fulfilling the same objects as the proposed Y.M.C.A. Club, is the Home Settlement at Womersley House, Crouch Hill, N., over which Rev. W. Darlow Sarjeant presides. Hon. sec. Mr. J. H. Waterman, Regent House, Regent Street, W.

THE NEEDS OF CYPRUS.

REV. HENRY EASSON writes from Dunblane, N.B., that he is obliged, on account of health, to retire for a time at least from active work in Cyprus. A friend in New York has provided the 1,500dols. necessary for the rebuilding of the chapel at Larnaca, to the burning of which we called attention in May last. It is expected that 500dols. (£100) more will be required for furnishing and equipment. The work is under the charge of Mr. W. M. Moore, M.D. (American R.P. Mission, Larnaca, Cyprus), who is well fitted for the post.

HOSPITAL WORK IN ASIA MINOR.

The American Hospital and Dispensary at Cesarea, Asia Minor, which, from the time of its beginning in 1886, was carried on by Dr. William S. Dodd, with the co-operation of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, has, by the organization of a board of trustees, passed from being a semi-personal affair into a public institution recognised by law. While maintaining the closest connection with the Missionary Society, it has now secured an independent corporate existence of its own.

The number of new cases seen at the dispensary during last year was 3,233, old cases and patients visited 3,042—6275. Nearly one-half of these were Mohammedans. "One point in evangelistic part of our work has not yet been acted on. We need a Bible reader among the patients while they are waiting for treatment. Friends have sent gifts for this purpose, but the right person has not yet been found. There is here a great opportunity for direct spiritual work which we long to improve." The treasurer is Mr. James M. Speers, 14, West Twenty-third Street, New York.

IS THE DAWN BREAKING IN SPAIN?

The recent rioting in Barcelona is simply a sign of the general excited state of Spain. It is more than probable that striking changes in the administration of the law will take place when Alfonso XIII. takes the sceptre from the Queen Regent, who has fostered the growth of religious order and the suppression of liberty. Those interested in the spread of the Gospel in Spain prayerfully anticipate the dawn of liberty during the next six months. The ministers of the Spanish Reformed Church write most hopefully of the near future, and it seems that at length numbers of the Spanish people are turning from Roman superstition to the Gospel light, but much remains still to be done.

Rev. J. Blackburn Brown (English Chaplain in Seville) writes to the secretary of the Spanish and Portuguese Church Aid Society (Rev. T. J. Pulvertaft, Church House, Dean's Yard, Westminster, S.W.): "If only our snug English Protestants in England realized the state of things here, your funds would be much greater than they are, and the prayers of your friends would go up, and their sympathies would go out in practical and tangible ways to an extent now undreamt of, and beyond your wildest hopes. I wish I could render one-tenth of the help I should like to."

THE WORD OF GOD IN TUNIS.

The following from Miss M. Grissell (North Africa Mission, 23, Rue Al-Djazira) will appeal to the hearts of lovers of the Word of God: "Bibles in many languages are found in the depôt in Tunis, and people of many nationalities, not always customers, find their way there. Sometimes it is only idle curiosity, sometimes deep heart-longing leads a poor soul to turn in to inquire the way of comfort from the missionaries, or their representative, a converted Jew. Days there are very varied; a morning spent in wearisome waiting may alternate with another when a constant stream of visitors taxes all the attention. Perhaps an Arab with Koranic difficulties is quickly followed by a so-called Christian striving to break from the bondage of priestcraft, or by a Jew who cannot yet accept the only true Messiah as his Saviour. Each day the depôt stands open as a witness to the truth, a place where the Bible is ever at hand, and where all who will can search for themselves 'whether these things are so.'

"We are moving the depôt to a more favourable position, at the same time considerably increasing our rent. It is so important in the midst of this large Mohammedan city, that we dare not close it: and in faith we continue to exhibit our treasure, inviting the prayerful sympathy of those who, realizing its preciousness, wish others to possess it also."

MANDARIN-SPEAKING CHINESE IN SHANGHAI.

At the instance of representative missionaries and other Christian friends, of all denominations, resident in Shanghai, a union church for Mandarin-speaking Chinese has recently been formed. The need for such a church has long been felt. Mandarin-speaking Christians from the interior, who settle in Shanghai for purposes of trade, do not feel at home in the Shanghai vernacular churches, as the dialect is strange to them. The London Missionary Society has granted the use of its Shantung Road Chapel for this work, until funds permit of the erection of a suitable building in one of the crowded and busy thoroughfares of the city.

A council, representative of several missionary agencies, has been constituted, and it is felt that, under the blessing of God, this new movement will be a bond of union between the various denominations in China, and will powerfully manifest "the unity of the Spirit" to the Chinese heathen world. Self-support will, it is confidently anticipated, be reached after a time, but in the earlier stages of the work it is necessary to appeal for the free will offerings of Christian friends in Great Britain and America. About £200 (2,000dols. Mexican) will be required for the first year. Rev. Dr. Stevens (Lee Wood, Ilfracombe), formerly minister of the Union Church (foreign), Shanghai, is hon. secretary and treasurer in Great Britain.

PROTESTANT MURDERED IN BRAZIL.

The following account of the murder of a native Christian appears in the latest issue of Help for Brazil, from the pen of Mr. Telford:—"A woman staggers into the room. 'Oh, they have murdered my husband! they have murdered Jhusa!' On the way to worship, while in a hollow, the party was attacked by several armed men. A young man succeeded in eluding their grasp, as also the woman; but our poor friend, losing his head for the moment, ran into the bush—the worst place possible, as he could not run far—and there he fell pierced through the heart by the assassin's knife.

"The young man who brought the tidings, and I, ran to find the officer of police, and on the way we were insulted very much by the people. This officer with four soldiers was soon on the spot. There under a tree, lay the dead body, the widow bending over it, crying most bitterly. The assassins had made good their escape. In a short time the body was put into a hammock and carried to the gaol, and there examined. While I was leaving the gaol, I overheard one person say, 'Let us finish with these Englishmen.' Others were saying that I would not be allowed to go out of the city alive; and one, to crown the others, said that if all were of his mind, they would cut me up on the street. The funeral procession only numbered five, and to carry the body the long distance to the cemetery did not appear a very easy task; but after we had gone a good way, a man came forward to help us, and his good example was followed by others. We had a guard of two soldiers with us. Arrived at the grave, I thanked the persons who had helped us, and asked them to remain while I read a part of 1 Cor. xv., said a few words, and offered prayer. The people were perfectly quiet. Afterwards, however, it was said that if it had been known I was to conduct a service at the cemetery, people would have been there to shoot me.

"That night a soldier was sent to our house to keep guard, but, fortunately, nothing happened. We visited the widow the following morning, and were able to console her somewhat. Her faith in God, I am glad to say, has been strengthened."

Student Volunteers

AT TORONTO.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THE fourth convention in connection with the Student Volunteer Movement, which met in Toronto, Canada, from February 26 to March 2, was a memorable gathering. The 2,955 delegates who registered their attendance represented twenty-two countries, 465 educational institutions, eighty-two foreign mission boards, with a number of other interested agencies. The Toronto people turned out in great numbers, and the vast auditorium of Massey Music Hall was always thronged, while in the evenings many hundreds were unable to gain admission.

In reviewing the intervening four years, Mr. JOHN R. MOTT (chairman) pointed out that this movement touches the life of 800 institutions of higher learning, and that 1,853 students had already sailed for the foreign field. The increase of missionaries was 60 per cent. over the preceding four years, and this number promises to become greatly enlarged, inasmuch as there are now 325 classes with 5,000 students engaged in the systematic study of foreign missions. Altogether the students had contributed during the past year over 40,000 dols. for foreign missions, a large sum from young men and women who are facing the large expenses of a college education. As a result of the missionary enthusiasm, Mr. Mott referred to a quickening of the religious life of the colleges, which was also felt in the churches.

The aim for the coming four years, he said, would be a large increase in the number of students engaged in the study of missions, as well as in volunteers for the foreign field, who should be helped with better preparation for their life-work, and held true to their pledge; an increased missionary responsibility for those students who remained at home; a quickening of the religious life of the colleges and seminaries; and the solidity of the movement as a world-wide missionary enterprise.

The later addresses were strong, able, and inspiring utterances. The opening meeting was devoted largely to the subject of personal religion, when two very uplifting addresses were delivered by Mr. Robert E. Speer and Mrs. Howard Taylor. The evening meeting of the first day was marked by addresses of welcome from leading representatives of the different denominations, including Bishop Sweatman, of the Church of England. To these cordial greetings, expressing oneness in spirit and aim, both Mr. Mott and Rev. Dr. J. Ross Stevenson (vice-chairman) responded with stirring addresses.

The second day was largely taken up with the discussion of missionary work in different lands. Sectional meetings were held in a number of churches. China was the country considered at the morning meeting of the main gathering, when Dr. Howard Taylor, Dr. Ament, Miss Noyes, and others told of wonderful progress. At the evening meeting in Massey Hall, Rev. C. A. R. Jonvier spoke on India; Dr. H. G. Underwood, on Korea; Rev. W. R. Hotchkiss, on Africa, and Drs. W. S. Ament and Howard Taylor, on China. It was, throughout, a story of great things for the extension of the Kingdom of God.

The third day might be termed "Educational Day." The character and scope of the discussions can be imagined from the following topics: "The Supreme Importance of Missionary Education among Young People," "Missionary Literature," "The Place in Colleges and Theological Seminaries of the Study of the Extension of Christ's Kingdom," "The Pastor as an Educational Missionary Force," "The Pastor of the Church as a Mission Captain," "Lessons from Master Missionaries." The concluding hour will be remembered by the response to an appeal for funds to send out missionaries, when 15,000dols. a year for four years was quietly promised. This amount will be largely increased from other sources.

The "Money Problem" was the general topic of the morning of the fourth day. The Hon. S. B. Capen, LL.D. (president of the American Board), spoke first on "Money and its Place in Mission Work," and was followed by Rev. J. F. Goucher, D.D., on "The Financial Co-operation of both Rich and Poor Indispensable;" Rev. S. Earl Taylor on "The Financial Support of Missions by Young People;" and Rev. Luther D. Wishard on "How 1,000 Missions are Supported." In the evening addresses were delivered on "The Challenge Presented to the Present Generation."

Sunday, the closing day, opened with a very fine sermon by Bishop M. S. Baldwin (Huron), whose text was, "Jesus, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever." After the sermon Mrs. Howard Taylor made a most earnest appeal to the large audience to heed the call of Christ. The afternoon meeting was largely given up to the question of personal religion, when powerful addresses were given by Bishop Thoburn and others. The closing gathering was most impressive. Passionate warnings were given to the students to beware of "after-convention temptations," and to carry back to college life the spirit and message of this convention. Then followed a season of self-consecration, when one hundred missionaries were dedicated to the preaching of the Gospel in heathen lands. The presence of the Divine Spirit was most manifest, and the uplifting influences of the hour will never be forgotten.

Mr. Moody's "Boys."

THE school for young men at Mount Hermon, four miles across the Connecticut from Northfield, is just completing its twenty-first year. It is not merely a Bible Training School, nor a school for the training of evangelists or mission workers, as many suppose. Mr. Moody believed in each man serving God in that particular line of life for which he is best fitted, so Mount Hermon aims to give an all-round education and training to fit its men for usefulness in life. It takes young men who cannot get an education elsewhere, and without reference to age, except that they must be over sixteen, and without reference to knowledge of books. Its studies begin with elementary grades, and take a man high enough to enter college. Many of its graduates have led their classes in college, and what is better, have stood as leaders of manly character in the Christian work of the colleges. The largest number, however, of its 3,500 students have not gone to college but are out in life.

A principle of Mr. Moody's for which the school stands, is that no young man should expect others to do for him what is in his own power. The student at Mount Hermon pays only 54 dols. for each term of sixteen weeks, but this he must furnish, and when his money is gone, he stops school and goes to work, earning more. Another idea of Mr. Moody's was to keep the school going all the time. He abhorred an idle building as he did a lazy boy, so the year is divided into three terms of sixteen weeks each, and the course is so arranged that the student can drop out for one or more terms and come back and take up his studies where he left them. The summer term, which begins May 1, and runs to the middle of August, was a new idea about which many were sceptical, but two years' experience has proved that it is one of the best terms of the year for the students. In northern Massachusetts it is not too hot in the summer for good study, and there is every attraction in the location of Mount Hermon for open-air life and recreation.

Mr. Moody was an ardent believer in the teaching of the Bible as a part of each man's training for usefulness, and in the summer term this is specially emphasized. Beside the regular Bible courses of the school, a daily Bible class is held, in which visiting Bible teachers bring to the students, for two weeks each, the best they have to give them. For the next summer term, these teachers will include such men as Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, leader of the Northfield Extension Movement; Rev. F. B. Meyer (London); Rev. Arthur T. Pierson, D.D.: Professor E. I. Bosworth, of Oberlin; Professor Elmore Harris, of the Toronto Training School; Mr. David McConaughy, late National Secretary of the Young Men's Christian Associations in India; and Mr. Paul D. Moody, Mr. Moody's son.

During the summer term only, provisions are made for young men who see no way of obtaining a fuller education, but would like to spend any period, from two weeks up, in special study of the Bible and other branches. Young men who want to know more about Mount Hermon should write to the Principal, at Mount Hermon, Mass, U.S.A.

A Useful Experiment.

THE question of the "saloon," the American institution corresponding to the British public-house, has been very much "up" before the citizens of New York for several months. Innumerable letters have been written in the papers, and not a few public meetings have been called. Among other speakers who have addressed meetings held under the auspices of the Y.M.C.A. here has been Rev. George L. McNutt, of Indiana, widely known now as "The Dinner-Pail Preacher." About three years ago he left his pulpit and became a day-labourer or "dinner-pail man." He had not spent much time at day labour before he found out what an important factor the saloon has come to be in the social life of the community, and his address on this subject is one of the most bright and interesting talks of his extensive and varied repertoire. One of the strongest holds that the saloon has on this city (and many others) is that it provides the only public conveniences that are available to "the man in the street." I know this city pretty well, and I do not know of half a dozen (outside the saloons) in the whole city, excepting the elevated railroads, which provide them for their passengers. It is not easy for a citizen of a British city, well supplied in this respect, to imagine the conditions produced here by things as they exist.

Mr. McNutt has referred to this feature of life in our city more than once in speaking to crowded audiences at the West Side branch of the Y.M.C.A., probably the largest in the United States in respect of membership. This branch has a magnificent building, but like most, if not all others through the country, has (or had on Sunday) painted on the door leading to its lavatories and "toilet-rooms" the words, "For Members Only." As a result of some remarks made by Mr. McNutt recently, it has been decided, not merely to remove the forbidding legend from the door leading out of its splendid hallway, but to put a sign outside the building, with words like this on it: "Toilet and Lavatory Accommodation Free to the Public. Come in and Use them."

In the opinion of many, that sign and the influence it is likely to exert, not only throughout this city but throughout the country, will accomplish more practical results in a year, in impeding the manufacture of drunkards, than fifty big mass meetings on total abstinence principles. It may be said that this is a matter for the municipality to see to, but up till last November, the vested interests of the liquor traffic had far too much weight with those in authority, to permit of the present and prospective loss to the saloons in the sacrifice for the benefit of the whole city involved in making proper provision in the interest of the public comfort and decency.

ROGER MARTIN.

Ladies in Reduced Circumstances.—Rev. E. A. Stuart, of St. Matthew's, Bayswater, calls attention to the needs of Mrs. Sheppard's Annuitants' Homes (hon. secretary, Mrs. Chadwick, 27, Ossington Street, Bayswater, London, W.). At the Homes which were founded in 1855, rooms and attendance are provided for ladies aged not less than fifty-five, and who possess an income of not less than £25 a year. Mr. Stuart, who is chairman of the institutions, adds: "To such, free house room makes all the difference between poverty and comfort." The ladies are required to be members of an Evangelical body. About forty are benefited. There are seven houses, three in The Grove, Hammersmith, which belong to the Society; and four in Bayswater, which are hired. The ladies board themselves, and the other expenses are met by the subscriptions of the charitable.

SUNDAY, March 30. Exodus xiv.

TO turn from the straight road for Canaan down by the western, or Egyptian, shore of the Red Sea, seemed madness, for it not only delayed the march to the frontier, but brought the whole of the people into a position of imminent danger. Presently further progress became impossible. A steep range of mountains blocked the march; on the left was the sea, and behind the Egyptian hosts. Yet that position gave God his opportunity of deliverance, and led to such an overthrow of Egypt as secured Israel immunity from attack from that quarter for two or three centuries.

Do not question with God, if He bids thee turn from what seems to thy judgment the wiser course. Not a moment of thy life is left to chance; every step is carefully calculated; what seems fatal is the path which He has chosen, and to walk in it with Him is certain peace and safety. "Fear ye not; stand still and see the salvation of the Lord."

We must ever go forward. The mistake of so many is to cling to the past; to past experiences, emotions, deliverances, and exploits. But there are wonders awaiting you beyond the thin curtain that veils the future, which shall cast into the shade all that has been.

"Israel saw the Egyptians dead upon the sea-shore." There should be a finality in our experiences. We should not always carry the same weights, or be subjugated by the same tyrannical oppression. There should be a clear leaving behind, and a stepping up into a life where the power of old sins is broken for ever.

MONDAY, March 31. Exodus xv.

This chapter is well summed up in the words of the Psalmist:—

Then believed they his words.
They sang his praise.

They soon forgot his works.
They waited not for his counsel (cvi. 12, 13).

At one moment we may be standing in the light of victory and success, with our foes at our feet and our heart's desire attained; but in a brief space we may be murmuring against our lot (24). If instead of living in our circumstances we only lived in God; if we had learned with the Apostle to be satisfied with all that pleased our Heavenly Father, whether cloud or sun, adversity or prosperity, then the peace of the soul would be unbroken. "Though the fig-tree shall not blossom . . . yet will I rejoice in the Lord."

This noble Psalm seems to anticipate the song of Moses, the servant of the Lord and the Lamb. Some day we, too, shall stand on the sea of glass, having the harps of God. Ah, what triumphant strains shall ring out over the shores of eternity, when the final victory of our Lord shall have been achieved, over the beast, and his mark, and the number of his name; and when the devil shall have met with final destruction. Let us read these words again, ascribing all the glory to Christ, who on the cross became our strength and song. "Who is like unto Thee, O Lamb of God? Who is like thee? Thou leadest forth thy people whom Thou hast redeemed; Thou wilt guide them by thy strength; Thou shalt bring them in, and plant them in the mountain of thy inheritance. Thou shalt reign for ever and ever."

The waters are bitter, but the tree of the cross, which stands for submission to the will of God, will sweeten them. Yield yourself to God, and believe that He will heal thy diseases (v. 26), and forgive thy sins (Ps. ciii. 3), and bring thee presently to Elim.

TUESDAY, April 1. Exodus xvi.

It is wonderful to think of "the largeness of heart" which God is able to bestow on man, that he should have faith enough to believe that God could supply so immense a host in the wastes of the desert. For though it is evident that the provision of manna was from God—it was He who gave bread from heaven to eat—yet it is equally clear that it was through the faith of Moses that the Divine power wrought.

Recently I came across a modern illustration of this. In 1865, Mr. Hudson Taylor was greatly exercised by the thought that at the rate of a million a month the people of China were passing into eternity without God. He was at Brighton, and, leaving the house, went down to the beach in the early morning of a summer's day. He had no doubt that, in answer to prayer, labourers might be given, but he could not believe that God would sustain them year after year, when they were practically buried in the depths of that unknown interior. All at once the thought came, "Why burdened thus? If you are obeying God, all the responsibility must rest with Him, and not with you." "Very well," was the immediate, glad reply; "Thou, Lord, shalt be responsible for them, and for me too!" And the burden, from that moment, was all gone.

It is thus that we are taught the wonderful possibilities of faith, to which nothing is impossible. Faith is a kind of hinge on which the mighty power of God rests; once God undertakes to do a thing, He will not forget, nor be unpunctual, though forty years should pass.

The manna was an emblem of Christ, the Bread of God, which comes down from heaven. In Him there is enough for each, enough for all, enough for evermore. But we must feed on Him, not so much by praying to Him, in the sense of supplicating distinct gifts at his hand, as by meditation, communion, and the fellowship of holy thought.

WEDNESDAY, April 2. Exodus xvii.

It was a long march from Sin to Rephidim, where, again, there was lack of water, and again the chiding of the people with their lot. Ah, my soul, thou must not blame them, for thou hast often chidden also; but, for all that, when thou hast called in thy trouble, God has delivered thee and answered thee in the secret place of thunder, and thou hast seen his work (Psa. lxxxi. 7, xcv. 8).

It is supposed that the smitten rock was at some distance from the camp, because Moses had to go on to it with the elders of Israel. Probably it was part of the Mount Sinai, at some elevation above the valley, so that the waters would flow down to the assembled host, and perhaps would continue to do so during their sojourn in those regions, and in their march from Horeb by way of Mount Seir, unto Kadesh-barnea (Deut. i. 2). Notice especially Deut. ix. 21.

Travellers tell us that the traditional rock of this miracle is a mass of granite, nearly twenty feet square and high, the face of which is covered by a number of fissures, at equal distances from each other; and which suggest by their appearance that strong and long-continued fountains of water had once poured from and over it. "That Rock was Christ" (1 Cor. x. 1-4). It was as though Christ Himself was presenting Himself to be struck! (see the remarkable phrase v. 6).

Amalek took a mean advantage of the people (Deut. xxv. 17, 18). In our moments of depression, or elation, we are most prone to the sins of the flesh, of which Amalek is a type. The uplifted hands of the Lawgiver are, of course, the emblem of prayer, but we must work as well as pray. Here is a blessed employment for the invalid, for the lonely saint, for the aged. Do not cease to pray for us, who in the plain are covered by the dust, and deafened by the din of the battle!

THURSDAY, April 3. Exodus xviii.

It is probable that this visit of Jethro took place during the year that Israel dwelt under the Mount; but the story is inserted here, that there may be no break in the majestic story which follows. It is interesting to know the significance of the names of Moses' sons, as each admits us into his inner soul, and teaches us how lonely and strange he felt himself to be, and how constantly he was looking upwards for help.

In Moses' recital of what had taken place since last he had seen Jethro, he evidently said as little as possible of his own share in the wonderful events that had transpired; he told of all that the Lord had done unto Pharaoh and to the Egyptians; and his recital aroused the liveliest feelings of adoration and gratitude in Jethro's heart. Let us so speak of God that others may think well of Him, always putting forward what is bright and beautiful in his dealings, that all who hear our speech may respond to our invitation, "Come, magnify the Lord with me, and let us exalt his name together."

Jethro gave Moses good advice. It is always better to set others to do God's work, than to carry the whole burden ourselves. Mr. Moody used to say, "It is better to set 100 men to work than to do the work of 100 men." Really God must needs call some men home, for they so insist on being to the front in everything, that others fail to obtain the opportunity to learn how to use their talents for the King!

FRIDAY, April 4. Exodus xix.

This chapter introduces the covenant of Sinai. We are enamoured with the hopes held out, and, without considering the fickleness and weakness of our hearts, we cry, "Name thy conditions, great God, and we will gladly fulfil them. All that the Lord hath spoken, we will do."

We hardly know what we say when we bind ourselves by these engagements. On the one hand we do not realize the infinite holiness of God; on the other, we do not know ourselves. We have yet to learn that of ourselves we can do nothing—that there is a fatal flaw in our spiritual constitution, that there is a law in our members working against the law of our mind, and bringing us into captivity to the law of sin, which is in our members, so that when we would do good evil is present with us. Everyone must be brought to an end of himself before he can begin to appreciate the glory of the Lord Jesus as a perfect Saviour. The law is our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ, and we pass through the bitter failures of the first covenant to the victorious experience of the second, in which there are no conditions of obedience left to our fulfilment, because the Lord Jesus has fulfilled all on our behalf, and we stand in Him; his obedience is reckoned to us, and his Spirit secures an inner obedience in our hearts (Heb. viii.)

SATURDAY, April 5. Exodus xx.

These Ten Words lie at the basis of all moral government. They express, in a concise form, the verdict of man's conscience. As the Apostle says, the Gentiles show the work of the law written in their hearts (Rom. ii., see the whole argument). Thus, even where this code has never been recited, its essence is ever in operation. There is a common foundation of morals the world over. Even that law of the observance of one day in seven has its counterpart in the heart of man; first, in the universal spiritual instinct that worship is due to the Eternal God; secondly, in the physical craving for one day's rest in seven; and thirdly, in the seasons which are marked out by the heavenly bodies.

But what a revelation the Decalogue gives of the evil of the human heart! You may tell of the moral condition of a nation by perusing the legislation, which has been called for from year to year. The sins which are forbidden are those which have been rife. And as we read the shalt-nots of God, we become aware that the world is full of ungodliness, oppression, impurity, theft, murder, and coveting.

Let us read these words over, for our careful self-examination, adding to their light the further illumination of Matt. v. Let us see how much they mean, and realize how infinitely we have fallen beneath their level, if not outwardly, at least inwardly; and then let us turn to Christ, and ask Him, by his Holy Spirit, not only to keep us from violating the letter of the Divine Law, but to fill our hearts with such a positive love for Himself, and a reception of his indwelling, that we may not fulfil the law of sin, but that the righteousness of the law may be fulfilled in us, as we walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit. Then, if our days are not long in the literal sense, they shall be deep and blessed, as the days of heaven (v. 12 and Eph. vi. 2, 3).

THE KIRKCALDY MEETINGS.

CONTINUING his fruitful meetings at Kirkcaldy, Rev. Dr. J. Q. A. Henry aroused much sympathy by the powerful address which he delivered in Pathhead Public Hall on Thursday evening last.

Rev. W. Milne, who presided, said that considerable interest had been awakened by the temperance addresses given in Kirkcaldy by Dr. Henry; he expressed an earnest hope that combined efforts would be made to conserve the results of the mission.

Dr. Henry, who followed, referred in glowing terms, to some notable characteristics of the Anglo-Saxon peoples, particularly their reverence for the Bible. Proceeding, he dealt with the burning question of Temperance, and said that a nation is safe only when it has the courage and consecration to attack the strongholds of sin in its midst. He pointed to drunkenness as a national sin, and urged those present to take the opportunity of joining the ranks of total abstainers. In the course of the evening solos were rendered by Mrs. Barclay and Mr. Cormack, of Edinburgh, while the choir gave admirable aid.

On the following day Dr. Henry delivered an address in St. Brycedale Hall, in which he gave helpful suggestions for carrying on the work. In the evening, the final gathering of the mission was held in Pathhead Public Hall, when Dr. Henry set forth the medical evidence in connection with the physical aspects of the drink question, and delivered a stirring and convincing address.

A correspondent writes:—"A striking feature of the Kirkcaldy meetings was the frequent attendance, in considerable numbers, of ministers, who have much appreciated Dr. Henry's advocacy of temperance. Another feature was the large attendance of men. At the closing meeting Mr. Mackintosh, one of the large employers of labour in Scotland, testified that Dr. Henry had done great things for the temperance cause both in securing a large number of pledges (upwards of 750) and in stimulating the growth of temperance sentiment, especially among Christian people.

IMPRESSIVE MISSION AT ALLOA.

The meetings held at Alloa, March 23-25 made a deep impression upon the large audiences which gathered to hear Dr. Henry. The mission began on Saturday afternoon with a meeting for children in the Town Hall, Mr. Robert Procter presiding. Dr. Henry gave a splendid address on the dangers of drink, and made a kindly appeal to children to band themselves together in their youth against the habit and traffic. Pledge forms were distributed among children to take home and get signed, with their parents' consent, and return to their Sabbath-school superintendents. Many children asked for forms. At the close Dr. Henry addressed the committee, and it was heartily recognised that he was treating his subject from a high Christian standpoint, and in a manner calculated to unite all sections of temperance workers.

On the following morning Dr. Henry preached in the Parish Church (by courtesy of Rev. L. McLean Watt) to a very large congregation. He gave an eloquent discourse on Rom. xiii. 10: "Love worketh no ill to his neighbour: therefore love is the fulfilling of the law." In powerful terms he appealed to all Christians to take their stand against the drink.

In the afternoon, through the kindness of Rev. Robert Mackenzie, Dr. Henry preached at the West U.F. Church. Taking part of Psa. lx. 12, "Through God we shall do valiantly," as his text, he pointed out that the great and outstanding enemy of mankind, and the first and foremost obstacle to the progress of the Gospel, is the drink curse.

A crowded meeting was addressed in the Town Hall in the evening. Rev. R. Mackenzie presided, and Dr. Henry spoke eloquently from 1 Sam. x. 14, "Come and let us go to Gilgal, and renew the kingdom there." He described the enormous extent of the drink evil, and enriched his utterance with apt and forcible quotations from authoritative sources, urging all to do what they could to roll away the reproach from the land. Although no pressure beyond the speaker's appeal was brought to bear upon the people, no fewer than 117 pledges were signed.

At Redhill, where Dr. Henry is to conduct a mission on April 4, 5 and 6, earnest efforts are being put forth to arouse the people to a sense of the iniquity of the drink traffic, and the importance of taking energetic action to combat the evil. A meeting was held on March 19 in the Wesleyan Chapel, at which Mr. E. Glanville, Rev. L. Ashworth, and other friends, gave telling addresses, and there is every prospect of the forthcoming mission exercising a wide and helpful influence.

FUTURE MEETINGS.

March 27, Alva; April 1-3, Macclesfield; 4-6, Redhill, Surrey; 8, Helensburgh; 9, 10, 11, Rutherglen; 12-18, Dumbarton; 19-25, Airdrie.

Obituary.

MR. WILLIAM ALEXANDER BOYD, BELFAST.

MR. BOYD, one of the band of Christian workers who followed our troops to the seat of war, met his death by drowning on the 5th inst. at Mafetory, Basutoland. Mr. Boyd was converted at the meetings of the Junior Y.M.C.A., Mercantile Academy, Belfast. He resigned the secretaryship of this Association and his other Christian work in his native city to minister to his fellow-countrymen of the 2nd Royal Irish Rifles in South Africa. During the whole course of the war he has been conducting meetings with great success, and after many hairbreadth escapes, at last met his end by drowning, a fate which has been the lot of many men during the war.

GENERAL J. J. ESTEY.

The death of General J. J. Estey, who passed away about three weeks since at Brattleboro', Vt., U.S.A., removes an earnest Christian worker who gave ardent service to many religious undertakings, and was widely esteemed for his piety and devotion. His name was well known, too, as director of the Estey Organ Company. General Estey was president of the local Y.M.C.A., and held various offices in connection with the Baptist denomination, of which he was a member.

The departed worker was one of the men whom Mr. Moody loved as a friend, and to whom he confided his plans. General Estey had been the treasurer of the Northfield Seminary ever since that remarkable institution was established by Mr. Moody. He helped forward its work in every possible way, as he did that of the boys' school at Mount Hermon, of whose board of trustees he was a member. A Brattleboro' paper says:—"The best tribute that can be paid to General Estey's memory is to say that to his most intimate associates, in the business office, to his own sons, he stood as a type of genuine Christian manhood." Mr. Ira D. Sankey writes:—"He was a splendid man, and we shall miss him very much."

Cross and Crown.

AN EASTER VISION.

A shadow creeps
Over the sun-kissed Palestinian plain:
Beside a Cross a mother stands and weeps,
Her sword-pierced heart wrung with new travail-pain.

The darkness falls
Over a world which bid its Saviour die.
Across the hill, to Pilate's judgment-halls,
Echoes his last exceeding bitter cry.

An awful calm
Hushes the rude and cruel soldier-host.
Unseen, an angel bears a crown and palm;
Unseen, the Dove descends—the Holy Ghost.

. . . . . .

The morning breaks—
Break forth creation in one rapture-song!
He lives who died: Jesus who slept awakes—
First fruits of Resurrection's countless throng.

Sowing and Reaping

IN WESTERN SOUDAN.

AT the invitation of Mrs. Elborough Woodcock, a number of friends assembled at 8, Buckingham Gate, a few days ago, to meet Bishop Tugwell on his return from Western Equatorial Africa. The proceedings were opened by the Bishop reading a portion of Scripture and offering prayer. An inspiring address was delivered by Mr. L. H. Nott, who went out to Hausaland in 1894, but was compelled to abandon the work on account of ill-health. In giving some particulars of his experience while in that country, Mr. Nott acknowledged the hearty reception accorded by the inhabitants, and their willingness to learn from the white man. The people number ten millions, are chiefly Mohammedans, all speaking one language, but the country itself has little to recommend it. The Hausas are possessed of a noteworthy literature; their language has been reduced to writing for 100 years, they having adapted the Arabic characters. Pathetic reference was made by Mr. Nott to the education of the Hausas. Again and again he had met boys who knew the Koran by heart, but yet confessed they could not understand a word of what they recited. Happily there is no idolatry in Hausaland. The Moslems adhere strictly to the practice of praying five times a day, and yet they know nothing of communion with God. Extracts from some of the songs used by the Hausas were read by Mr. Nott, unfolding beautiful truths, yet making no mention of the power by which these precepts can be interpreted in action.

Bishop Tugwell followed with some interesting details of his journeyings in Western Equatorial Africa. He spoke of the indications to be seen on every hand that the people were anxious to hear what the missionaries had to say. It is hoped that a college will soon be inaugurated at Kano, and that when the heart of the country is reached a widespread movement will be initiated for the preaching of the Gospel. The speaker referred to the kindly disposition of the natives as well as the Kings of the different tribes. The labours of the missionaries give promise of abundant fruit, and the Bishop appealed for the remembrance in prayer of Dr. Miller and Rev. G. P. Bargery, who are conducting a campaign to Kano, and are now at Zaria.

The Y.M.C.A.

THE forty-fifth annual meeting of the Brompton Road, S.W., Association was held recently in St. Columba's Church-room. Col. Macgregor, who presided, bore earnest testimony to the spiritual character of the work carried on. Addresses were also given by Dr. A. T. Schofield, and Rev. Archibald Fleming, the newly appointed minister of the church.

An interesting and profitable series of lectures on "The Tabernacle of Israel in the Wilderness" was given by Mr. Herbert Francis, of Gloucester, at the Newport, Mon., Association, March 10 to 14 inclusive. The meetings were held each afternoon and evening, some of the leading ministers of the town presiding. The meetings were much appreciated, and have been helpful to many.

A large number of young men assembled at the Tottenham and Edmonton Association, on Sunday afternoon last, to hear an address on "Gambling" by Mr. Frederic L. Porter, of Hackney, who described the gaming arrangements at Monte Carlo, and spoke of the terrible tragedies which have resulted from the wreck of hopes and lives by play at the tables. Mr. Porter's wise words were fraught with instruction, and the meeting is certain to have a helpful effect upon the young men of the district.

The Scottish National Council of Y.M.C.A.'s have appointed Mr. George Douglas Turner, M.A., to be their Foreign Mission Secretary at Lahore, as successor to Mr. J. H. Oldham, B.A., who had to return home on account of his health. Mr. Turner is the son of Rev. Dr. Turner, of Jamaica, and has already many relatives in the mission field. He was educated at the High School and University of Glasgow, and for the last two years has been a student at Glasgow United Free Church College. He has taken a warm interest in the work of the Student Volunteer Missionary Union, and has special qualifications for the work at Lahore for which he has offered himself.

"Can God. . . . ?"

MISSIONARY DANGERS AND DELIVERANCES.

IT is not the obedient child of God who asks such a question as this. God is the source of all power—He is the Blessed and Only Potentate, the Lord God Almighty (1 Tim. vi. 15; Rev. xxi. 22). It is the unbeliever and ungodly who ask, "Can God?" (Psa. lxxviii. 19, 20).

Sometimes when the question is asked there seems to be no answer. At other times a rude shock is given to the impatience of men, and God makes his power known. I will recall two cases in which God arose for the deliverance of his people; and then I will call attention to the miracle of miracles whereby God vindicated his name and showed his mighty power in the sight of men. I hope you will look up the Scripture references.

(1) Let your thoughts travel to Madagascar, in 1894, during the riots that attended the occupation of the island by the French. A mission station was besieged by wild men, and preparations were being made to burn it with its occupants. Of course, the Christian workers committed themselves to God; and they feared not the taunts and yells of the people as they shouted, "Where is now your Saviour? Where is now your Christ?" When the outlook was dark in the extreme, God sent deliverance in a most unexpected way: a rescue party arrived, and the rioters were dispersed.

(2) Another case—this time the scene is in inland China. A missionary (one of many) had been very cruelly treated, and was bound to the block for execution. While the disciple of Christ lifted his heart to God, the Boxer rioters jeered him, saying, "Now ask your Jesus to deliver you!" While the missionary was asking God to show forth his great power, for some reason quite unexplained the angry men released their victim from the block. They led him to the river side for further cruelty; but although exhausted in body, the missionary received power sufficient to make renewed exertion in his own behalf. He leaped from the midst of the crowd, got over the river, and to the surprise of the onlookers, got clean away—"cast down, but not destroyed."

Now, as to the great display of God's power. I need hardly relate the facts as they come to mind this Easter time. Jesus of Nazareth, having been taken, and by wicked hands crucified and slain, God raised Him up from the dead (see Acts ii. 23, 24). You will remember the cruel taunts that were cast at Christ when on the cross. "He saved others; Himself He cannot save. If He be the King of Israel, let Him now come down from the cross. . . . He trusted in God; let Him deliver Him now" (Matt. xxvii. 40-43). Does God deliver? Yes; but in his own way. Christ was not delivered from death; he died, and then was delivered out of death. Hence He ever liveth, being Lord of the dead as well as of the living. He expires but revives; He robs death of its sting and the grave of its victory. Being risen from the dead, He dies no more, and has the keys of death and the grave (see Rom. vi. 9; xiv. 9; 1 Cor. xv. 54, 55; Rev. i. 18).

At this Easter time let us praise God that in his great wisdom and mercy, Christ was allowed to see death. He "tasted death for every man" (Heb. ii. 9). Sinners asked, "Can God?" and then did as they would to Him who was the Lord of Glory. Yet a little while, however, and their question was answered—God raised up Christ "no more to return to corruption," and thus the way was opened to eternal life and heavenly glory (Act xiii. 34).

God is a God of deliverances. You will remember "his mighty acts" in the case of Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego. When cast into the fiery furnace for refusing to worship the golden image set up by Nebuchadnezzar in Babylon, and the idolatrous king asked, "Who is that God that shall deliver you out of my hand?" the faithful Hebrews calmly answered, "Our God whom we serve is able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace, and He will deliver us out of thy hand, O king!" Nebuchadnezzar afterwards praised God, who had "sent his angel and delivered his servants that trusted in Him." (Dan. iii. 15, 17, 28). Never again would he ask "Can God?"

For all such deliverances let us praise God. Sometimes He gives us freedom from present enemies; sometimes He helps us to withstand such evil forces, and defers the day of freedom and joy. But at length He gives us full and complete deliverance. When men ask "Can God?" let us answer God can; and let us remember the proof afforded by the story of Easter and the experiences of God's people all down the ages.

Calvary and Easter.

(Rom. iv. 25.)

Pause awhile, O young or hoary,
Rich and poor, ye bond or free,
See the King of life and glory,
Crucified on Calvary!

Manifold were our trangressions,
All our guilt on Him was laid,
But for bane He grants us blessings,
Cancelled is the debt He paid.

Hark, the temple's veil is rended,
Death is dead, and life is born:
Lo! the fearful battles ended—
Calvary's night, then Easter morn.

Lo! He is not dead but living,
All his works their Maker praise;
Nature lifts her glad thanksgiving,
Let us loftier pæans raise.

The Risen Life (Luke xxiv. 1-12; Col. iii. 1-4).

OUR Lord's resurrection is not only the joy of all who love Him, but is the keystone of our religion. If He did not rise, as St. Paul says, our faith is vain, we are yet in our sins, and are of all men most miserable (1 Cor. xv. 14-19). But if He was raised, a divine authentication is placed upon his Person and work. He is declared to be the Son of God with power, by the resurrection of the dead (Romans i. 4). It has been asserted again and again that there is greater evidence for the resurrection than for any event of modern history. If you say that the evidence on which you believe that Jesus rose from the dead is not sufficient, you may equally say that there is not sufficient evidence that the battle of Waterloo was fought and won by Wellington. Every fragment of evidence for the latter is available for the former.

The details as they are given by the Evangelists are very touching and beautiful. The manner in which the angels, the women, and the Apostles gathered around the empty tomb, heaven and earth meeting, the unfallen beings of eternity mingling with the fallen children of men, in common adoration and love to the common Lord; the way in which the women discovered that the stone which they so much dreaded had been rolled away—emblem of all other difficulties, which will disappear when we desire to do our best for Christ; the speed with which they ran and told of the wonders they had beheld to those that mourned and wept—presage of the work that women were to do in after centuries, in announcing the tidings of the Saviour's resurrection; the unbelief with which the news was at first received—showing that the Apostles were not open to the charge of credulity when they first believed and then announced that Christ was risen; the argument which Peter deduced from the care with which the linen clothes were folded together—indicative that no rifling hand had stolen the precious body, and that no hand of friend had removed it, for in either case the clothes would have been wrapped around the inanimate form: all these things, and many more, start out from the wonderful story, so wonderful that it cannot have been invented, so sublime and transcendent as to be worthy of the Christ. The very difficulty that commentators have had in piecing the stories of the Gospel into one coherent narrative only proves more absolutely their veracity; for, had four men sat down to invent this story of the resurrection, one of their first considerations would have been to have told the same tale in the same order. The wonderful variety of incident which gathers around Easter is a proof that these things were verily so.

You will remember that story in the life of the late Dr. Dale, in which he tells how, on one occasion when preparing a sermon on the Resurrection, the truth was suddenly burnt in upon his conscience that Jesus was actually and really living, and present in the room where he sat, and always about his path. He sprang to his feet, and walked backwards and forwards in his study, saying, "Jesus is alive; He is here, and I must make people know it." Would that the Spirit of God might produce in our hearts a similar consciousness, that to us, too, there might be a vivid realization that He who died liveth for evermore, and is as present in our room where we sit, as he was to John in the lonely Isle of Patmos (Rev. i. 17, 18).

But this is not enough. We are taught in the Epistles, not only that Jesus rose, but that, in the thought and purpose of God, we rose in and with Him. As the whole race passed out of Paradise in the persons of Adam and Eve, so all the redeemed family of God passed in the second Adam into the triumphant life of the Heavenlies, where He lives, throned above all power, principality, dominion, and might, in this world and that which is to come. To understand this, and enter into it by faith, is to obtain the secret of victory over all the power of the inner man, for if all evil powers are beneath the feet of Christ, they are also beneath our feet as we live in unbroken fellowship with Him. The Christ-life has conquered and risen and ascended; and just in so far as that life is ours, we too shall live above the power of the devil, and not under it, as conquerors and not slaves, as those who belong to the army of the ever-victorious Leader.

Attach a little bullet to a piece of cork, and it floats with the cork; attach yourself by faith to Christ, live in Him, and let Him live in you, and you will experience at once his blessed lifting power.

Saul of Tarsus Converted (Acts ix. 1-20).

Golden Text: Acts iii. 19.

FOR many weeks after the death of Stephen, Saul continued his inquisitorial search "into every house" and synagogue in Jerusalem; and many more saints suffered martyrdom there under his vote. When he was satisfied that his work had been effectual in Jerusalem, he resolved to follow the fugitive saints whom he had persecuted "even into strange cities" (xxvi. 10, 11), and obtained authority from the high priest to search Damascus first.

Saul as he left Jerusalem.

A man of ardent temperament, intense, energetic, whole-souled (never did things tamely or by halves); a man of strong will, determined nature, and great power of influence; an educated Jew, a self-satisfied Pharisee, a relentless persecutor of the Church of Christ—such and more was the haughty "Saul of Tarsus" as he rode at the head of his armed band. Flushed with his Jerusalem success, and fuming with eagerness to show more fully his burning zeal for "the traditions of his fathers," he thought "he was doing God service," but was self-and-Satan-impelled all the time, a zealous but a misguided man.

The ringleader of a "reign of terror" was arrested by "the Prince of Peace." Saul aimed at the believers in Damascus, but his shaft reached their Saviour first. Saul was met and conquered by the divine love and grace of "Jesus of Nazareth," and the persecutor becomes "the bond-slave of Jesus Christ"—Rom. i. 1—"a new creation."

Saul as he entered Damascus.

Note the contrasts. Instead of the defiant self-righteous Pharisee, mounted and armed with official authority, there walked into the city a blind man, led by the hand, distressed, but "in his right mind," a convicted sinner, an humble penitent coming to take the place of a learner among the disciples. It was here he prayed, here he was baptized, and here in the synagogue he preached for the first time "Christ, that He is the Son of God." When he left Damascus it was not with chained captives for Jerusalem, but, himself the persecuted, was dropped over the wall in a basket for safety by the loving hands of the disciples.

What did Saul see?

1. JESUS, as He is, and not as he had imagined. A Saviour from sin and self-righteousness (1 Tim. i. 15), "loved me" (Gal. ii. 20).
2. Himself undone. His past life an awful mistake. His goal a myth. His ambitions burst like an air-ball.
3. The remedy for sin (Phil. iii. 8-10).
4. He learned to speak the name of "Jesus," which he had not dared to do as a Jew.
5. A new path of service for him under a new Master.

What did Ananias see?

"A wild boar in the vineyard" (Acts viii. 3).

A dreaded enemy; and then a broken-hearted sinner, praying, and a brother in the Lord.

A wandering sheep gathered into the fold.

What did Jesus see?

1. A mistaken, sinful man.
2. A chosen vessel to labour in his cause.
3. A powerful teacher in his school.
4. A soul who could be taught to pray.
5. A man He could count on for suffering (Acts v. 41; ix. 16), for his name's sake (2 Cor. xi. 23-28).

What does Jesus see in me?

"Lord, Thou knowest all things; Thou knowest that I love Thee" (John xxi. 17).

A great sculptor was seen once to go up to a piece of rough marble and embrace it. He was asked why he did so? and his answer was, "I am embracing the angel which I see in the marble" (not yet hewn out).

"What wilt Thou have me to be, Lord?"

"Make me all Thou wouldst have me to be."

Home Missionary Circle.—Members will rejoice to know that the Circle is steadily widening. Testimonies to hand prove that by Divine blessing H.M.C. principles lead to spiritual success wherever adopted by Church or individual Christian. This simply means the attestation of the old saying, "God is as good as his word." May it please Him to lead into the H.M.C. many more who will by Bible study, Bible speaking, and Bible living seek to win souls! Arrangements are now being made to establish two corresponding secretaries—one in London and one in the provinces. Under God this will greatly strengthen the hands of the hon. organizing secretary, and lead to the rapid enlargement of the sphere of usefulness. About Books.

REV. F. B. MEYER'S DAVID.

THE seventh volume of the present re-issue, in new and attractive form, of Rev. F. B. Meyer's Scripture Biographies (2s. 6d. each. Morgan & Scott) is David—Shepherd, Psalmist, King, and one of the best. All the men of old who "spake from God, being moved by the Holy Ghost," claim a high and peculiar place in the interest of God's people; but none has so entwined himself in the personal affections of generation after generation as the sweet singer of Israel. Through Abraham, Moses, Elijah, and Isaiah we hear the voice of the Lord, and the men who were so honoured claim our highest veneration; but over and above that, David is our dear and sympathetic friend.

His life and work may be studied from so many points of view that it was necessary to make definite choice; and Mr. Meyer, while sketching every period of David's life, has concentrated attention on the passages tracing the steps by which the shepherd became king. No palliation is made of failure or sin, these being rather used for the drawing of the deepest lessons of the book, by showing how truly sin, repented of and forgiven, is put behind God's back; and how the sinner, whose conduct gave great occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme, could yet be the man after God's own heart, doing all his will.

The use made of the Psalms lights up many historical passages, while these again are made to serve as the setting which brings out the attractions of the greatest poems in the world. For instance, the fifty-sixth Psalm will be a message of comfort to stricken ones who feel their misery all the more keenly because they can trace it to their own act, when they learn to take its expressions of renewed confidence in God in connection with the time of declension at Gath, and they will find that even as they too cry the Lord will deliver their souls from death and their feet from falling.

None will learn the lessons of David's life save those who have eyes for a spiritual giant, towering up above all his fellows in the long period between Abraham and the incarnation of our Lord. Such a reader will be taught to pass over the spots and blemishes, and to ponder deeply the gracious dealing of the Lord in moulding into the perfect pattern a great soul completely surrendered. The parallelisms are pointed out between David and David's Greater Son; and then, when all comparison fails, we find we are the better prepared for the vision of David's Lord.

A MISSIONARY STATESMAN.

THE modern history of many lands is to be read most truly in the pages of missionary biography; but probably Japan is the only country in which the awakening and progress have been witnessed within the compass of one generation, and can be described in the story of a single life. The trader and diplomatist come and go, as a rule the missionary alone can speak of "the land of his adoption," and the title Verbeck of Japan sums up the narrative of a life consecrated to the service of God, as told to the world by Mr. W. E. Griffis.

It was characteristic of Guido F. Verbeck that he should in 1891 suddenly discover himself to be without nationality. Having been more than forty years absent from his native Holland, he had lost his original standing there, while his naturalization in the United States, whither he then went, had never been completed. Doubtless the Dutch Government would have been glad to make some exceptional arrangement for the enrolment of a son who had earned for himself so good a degree; but he preferred to apply for the formal protection of the Japanese Government, and while the document drawn up in Japan was renewable annually, it conferred an honour unique in the history of the country. The biographer has successfully portrayed "a faithful brother man and a child of God, one whose tender love to his Father was shown in a life hid with Christ, and a constant ministry of service to his fellow-men."

In addition to his direct efforts for the spread of the Gospel among the men and women around him, Dr. Verbeck played an important part in the making of the history of the nation. His first ten years of quiet work saw a complete revolution in the Government, and in 1870 the young statesmen who found themselves at the head of affairs called into their counsels the teacher who had been the instrument of the opening of their minds, and for a number of years he was the trusted adviser of those in authority. The educational system of the country was largely shaped by him; and the Standard version of the Scriptures in Japanese owes more to his hand than to any other. The book will be a valuable addition to missionary libraries; but it also commands the interest of many classes on account of the sidelights it throws on contemporary history and the development of a most interesting nation. (Oliphant. 6s.)

THE BIBLE STUDENTS' LIBRARY.

THIS series of volumes, some of which have taken a high place in the esteem of devout students of Holy Scripture, has now been completed. The authors have included one and another of the most reliable writers of our day, and in the course of the series many a lesson in accuracy and reverence has been read to teachers of the modern critical school. The last three volumes (6s. each. Eyre & Spottiswoode) are :—

The Student's Handbook to the Psalms. By the late John Sharpe, D.D. This is not a commentary, but a study of the words and thoughts of the psalter, written in simple and untechnical language. Says the author :—"I have endeavoured to show that the several books of Psalms were compiled in succession, so that the order of the Psalter is practically chronological; that the historical headings are not the wild or foolish guesses of ignorance, but authentic statements in accord with the contents of the Psalms, and throwing much light upon them; that the Psalms ascribed to David are genuine works of the historical David, the well-known king, and not merely attributed to him as the ideal psalmist, or from lower motives." Dr. Sharpe contends for a distinct Davidic style, and a development of doctrine. The chapters on the structure and characteristics of Hebrew poetry are very readable; those on the Names of God in the Psalms, the Messianic Hope, and References to the Life beyond the Grave are deeply instructive. Though not specially erudite, this work is distinctly useful. Rev. Dr. Sinker supplies a brief memoir of the lamented author.

Samuel and His Age: a Study in the Constitutional History of Israel. By G. C. M. Douglas, D.D., joint-principal of the United Free Church College, Glasgow. In this volume the controversial element is more prominent. The views of Professors Robertson Smith, Driver, and H. Preserved Smith are examined in the light of the teachings which have all down the ages been derived from the inspired record. Principal Douglas shows the great importance of his subject. He says: "Just as we understand Samuel, his character, his position, his offices, and his work, or fail to understand him, we shall succeed in understanding, or fail to understand, very much of Jehovah's dealings with Israel." After vindicating the historical position of Samuel, and studying the relation of Samuel and David to Moses and Joshua, Dr. Douglas sketches the career of his hero—his prophetic office and priestly work. After dealing with Samuel as judge, and as handing over his office to a king, he explains the three-fold appointment of Saul, and what followed, both for Samuel and the kingdom. In view of the prevalent tendency to reverse the order of things in Bible history, we welcome this thoughtful and comprehensive treatment of a specially interesting section of that history.

The Grammar of Prophecy: An Attempt to Discover the Method Underlying the Prophetic Scriptures. By R. B. Girdlestone, M.A., Hon. Canon of Christ Church. This is a work which will be widely welcomed. It presents no new system of interpretation, but is an examination of the facts and principles that lie at the base of all systems that are in any way pertinent to the teachings of Holy Scripture. Canon Girdlestone is careful to explain that he uses the word "Prophecy" in the sense of prediction—the utterance of the Divine purpose; and the word "Grammar" in the sense of the method of the subject considered. With evident truth he remarks: "If a method can be detected in the prophetic utterances as a whole, we are certainly losers if we do not make use of it." After a careful perusal of these pages, we cordially assent to another remark: "Perhaps the neglect of the study of prophetic method is one secret of the great variety of opinions amongst students of prophecy; and it may account for the fact that so many have given up the subject in despair." This is a singularly thoughtful book. It deals with large ideas, though details are by no means overlooked. No hobbies are brought out, but the pages are replete with suggestion, set forth in a spirit that is far removed from party controversy. Expositors of all schools will find this work helpful; while such as are of no school at all cannot but be impressed with a book which, though indirectly, yet with much power, presents the argument from prophecy for the inspiration of the Sacred Scriptures.

Specially intended for the members of Christian Endeavour Societies, The Greatest Things in the World (2s. A. H. Stockwell), by Pastor R. A. West, is a pleasantly written presentation of "the best gifts." It will help young believers to realize of the true perspective and proportions of the spiritual as compared with the temporal things, and enable them to be ready with a good reason for the hope that is in them.

The Churches.

 The Editor will be glad to receive "post-card" notes for this page, of* SPIRITUAL PROGRESS AND EFFORT in the Churches. They must be prompt, reliable, and NOT TRIVIALITIES; and be accompanied by sender's name and address.

Church of England.

Rev. the Hon. W. Talbot Rice, rector of St. Peter-le-Bailey, Oxford, has decided to accept the vicarage of Swansea, in succession to Rev. Chancellor J. Allan Smith, offered to him by the Church Patronage Trustees.

The Commission of Inquiry which the Bishop of Lincoln appointed in January, 1901, to investigate the spiritual requirements of the borough of Great Grimsby and the adjoining parishes report that the population of Grimsby has grown in eighty years from 4,000 to 83,000, and that there is urgent need of new effort. They recommend the formation of four new district parishes, the building of four new churches for these, and of another mission church.

At a recent meeting of the Bristol branch of the Church Pastoral Aid Society, disclosures were made as to the plight of the poorer classes in that city and elsewhere. Rev. W. Wale, of St. Basil's, Birmingham, said that for sewing on twenty-four gross of hooks and eyes workers receive 7d., whilst "ladies' aprons nicely tucked" are paid at the rate of 5d. a dozen. Rev. E. Despard, the Society's secretary, speaking on the subject of infant mortality, said that parents insure children as heavily as they can, and then give them gin to bring on convulsions.

Speaking at Liverpool on Saturday last, Canon Hay Aitken, alluding to the vice of betting and gambling, said it would be difficult to name any particular form of evil practice that produces such harvests of mischief or such certain destruction of human character as that particular vice does. Gambling brings men down from their high ideals, and sets before them the most sordid and repulsive form of selfishness a man can possibly besmudge his soul for. It fills a man with the desire to get his neighbour's money without an equivalent. The evil will not be removed by legislation, but only by establishing a higher, nobler, and worthier public opinion.

Congregational.

One outcome of the Twentieth Century Fund has been the formation, in connection with the Church Aid Society, of a special fund for aiding new pastorates, so as to maintain an efficient ministry in the early years of newly-formed churches.

The thirty-third anniversary of Rev. J. W. Atkinson's settlement as pastor of Latimer Road Church, E., was celebrated on Thursday last, when the People's Hall adjoining the church was crowded with sympathetic members and friends. Mr. Atkinson gave an encouraging account of the evangelistic and relief operations.

The Church at Barmouth has passed a resolution approving of Dr. Parker's scheme and of the proposed title "The United Congregational Church." Anstey Church, at a special meeting held to consider Dr. Parker's proposals, approved a federation of Churches, and suggested as title "The Congregational Church Union."

The Twentieth Century Fund of Sherwell Church, Plymouth, has now been closed, the amount raised being £1,175. Of this, one-third will be sent to the Central Fund, and the remaining two-thirds devoted more directly to local objects—extinction of the church debt and necessary repairs to the buildings.

In connection with Christ Church, Westminster Bridge Road, S.E., negotiations have been opened with Dr. Pierson, of America, to obtain his temporary services for the autumn and winter, and at the request of the officers Rev. F. B. Meyer has consented to retain, for the time being, his present position, and will resume his ministry at the conclusion of the arrangements with Dr. Pierson.

The new mission premises, built by the church and congregation of Kensington Chapel, W., have been opened. The People's Hall, as it is called, has cost £5,000 to build, and is a handsome block, towering up above the houses round. Rooms are provided for various departments of work, and all the rooms are lofty, bright and airy. The Sunday school already taxes the accommodation of the new building to the utmost.

Baptist.

In accordance with the suggestion of Rev. Dr. Maclaren, collections were taken in the Baptist churches on Sunday last on behalf of the Twentieth Century Fund. The total number of churches promising collections is nearly 1,250.

Since Rev. W. H. Gaussen undertook the pastorate at Woodside Church, Croydon, the membership has doubled. The existing temporary iron building is now unsuitable both as to size and character, and a scheme has been launched for the erection of a school chapel.

On Friday last a drawing-room meeting was held in the house of Mr. John Pearce at West Dulwich on behalf of the work of Pasteur Saillens in Paris. Pastor Archibald Brown presided, and over 100 were present. At the close of a most interesting address by the "Pasteur," a collection was made, Mr. Pearce and the chairman acting as deacons. The offering amounted to £34 4s.

Anniversary services were held at the church at Totteridge Road, Enfield Highway, on Sunday, March 16, when the pastor, Rev. A. W. Welch, preached. On the following Wednesday, after a sermon in the afternoon by Rev. E. G. Gauge, of Regent's Park, a public meeting was held at which Mr. Herbert Marnham presided, and addresses were delivered by Revs. W. Stevenson, A. J. W. Back, and Thomas Douglas.

The third anniversary services in connection with the Fareham (Hants) Church were held on Thursday, March 20. In the afternoon a sermon was preached by Rev. Charles Joseph, of Cambridge, who also gave an address in the evening. Mr. Joseph's visit was very much appreciated. The attendances were excellent. Addresses were also given by Revs. E. F. Piggott, G. Roberts Hern, Edward Haggis, and the Pastor (Hugh A. Ellis).

Methodist.

The returns of Primitive Methodist churches to the forthcoming Conference indicate that a larger increase has been made during the connexional year just ended than for many years. It is expected that the membership will have reached 200,000.

Mr. John Harker, a Free Methodist, of Liverpool, has offered £500 towards the cost of employing for three years an organizing secretary, who shall visit Sunday schools, and promote efforts for augmenting the missionary income. His offer has been accepted by the Committee.

Presbyterian.

The Westminster College students are this year raising funds for the establishment of a mission in Unsio, South China.

Highbury Church, N. (Rev. P. Carmichael), reports an income of £1,274, which more than met expenditure, and a membership of 577, including 189 in connection with the Hoxton mission.

Society of Friends.

In connection with the meetings of Hereford and Radnor Monthly Meeting, which were held recently at Llandrindod Wells, a public meeting was held, when addresses were delivered on "The Living Christ." The meeting for worship on the following day was well attended, and in the evening addresses were given on the basis of the Society, its principles, and the responsibility involved in membership.

After some years of struggle and steady foundation work, Friends at Acton, W., have at last entered into possession of a new meeting-house, a capacious iron building. It is neatly and brightly fitted, and comfortably accommodates 250 to 300 persons. Besides being used by the morning and evening Friends' meetings, the premises are also used by the adult school in the morning as a general assembly room and by the children's school in the afternoon, as well as for the regular Wednesday evening lectures and other special meetings.

A united meeting of the local branches of the National Protestant League and the Women's Protestant Union was held in the Gospel Hall, Wood Green, N., on March 18, when Mr. J. W. Flower delivered a lecture on "Priestly Bondage, or Christian and English Freedom—Which?" Rev. F. Horace Newton, of Hornsey Park Baptist Church, presided. Mr. Flower's address was a striking examination of the character and claims of the Papacy in the light of Scripture and history, and clearly showed the anti-Christian nature of the Romish system.

Seven years ago Pastor Thomas Wheatley commenced his labours at West Green, N., and since that time the religious and philanthropic work which he has promoted has received warm and deserving recognition. In addition to the usual meetings, the sick are visited, the needy are helped with food, clothing, and monetary aid, while four deserving widows are receiving regular support. At a social gathering recently held, Mr. Wheatley urged the need for deeper interest inlerest in the mission, that its agencies may be extended and a wider influence exerted in the neighbourhood.

Fallen Asleep.

In her seventy-sixth year, Mrs. ELIZABETH CHOWN, widow of the late Rev. J. P. Chown, formerly of Bloomsbury Chapel, London. Mrs. Chown had survived her husband for many years.—Aged eighty-five, Mr. CHARLES TYLOR, a well-known member of the Society of Friends, and at one time editor of The Friend.—At Northampton, aged eighty-two, Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL, for nearly sixty-five years a temperance worker and local preacher.—On February 14, at Calcutta, Mr. F. J. E. LAKSHMAN RAO, suddenly, from meningitis, after sunstroke.

B. Shrimpton, 136, Lenhurst Road, Manor Park, Lee, S.E. (for holiday makers); Rev. Joseph Beaupré, Wincanton (for races).

Appeal.

For the Friends' Mission Institute, 488A, Commercial Road, London, E., Mr. John Reeves, secretary, appeals for "gifts of clothing for the men, women, and children attending the Institute, and for books for the library, toys, and hospital letters."

Canal Boat Mission and Day School.—The present missionary commenced his labours in 1895, previous to which he spent sixteen years in the Eastern district of London, among the canal folk. On going to Brentford he was struck with the large number of children who played about by the canal side while the boats were unloading and loading, which means one or two days. After consulting with a few friends premises were taken and opened, in 1896, as a day school and mission room. Over 600 children have attended since the opening, and the mothers often tell how well their children are getting on, and that the little ones can sing "Jesus loves me." It is now found necessary to erect a new institute, at a cost of £800. At present there is in hand or definitely promised £260, but it is desirable that there should be a much larger sum before operations are commenced. Communications may be addressed to Mr. J. H. Whitehorn, The Corner House, Chesterfield Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

The Christian.

☞ To avoid delay it is requested that all letters relating to business matters should be addressed to the firm, Messrs. Morgan and Scott, and not to its individual members. Letters of a personal nature should in every case be so marked.

Communications for The Christian should be addressed to the Editor, 12, Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C. All advertisements should be sent to Messrs. John Haddon and Co., Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

☞ The Publishers request that all orders for The Christian by post, and remittances for same, be addressed to "The Christian" Postal Department, Bouverie House, Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

Cheques and Post Orders to be made payable to Messrs. John Haddon and Co. at that address. (For Subscription rates, see Page 1 of Cover.) Postcard or stamped envelope should be enclosed if receipt is desired.

Notes & Comments

The Spiritual Message of Spring. The coming of spring is the noblest parable in Nature of the Divine abundance. All things are a revelation of the Creator's eternal power and Godhead, and the world never seems so lovely as when we remember that it is God's footstool, and heaven his dwelling-place. Natural beauties are lifted into a new and holy place in the mind when their divine message is thus realized and acknowledged. During the next few months there should be a freshness and a glow of spiritual thankfulness in our outlook on the earth. For "she is not a charnel-house and a grave, but Godlike, and my Father's."

The Perpetual Easter. Eastertide is past, but the influence of the season must not be allowed to pass away. The thoughts of all devout believers have been centred on the great Sacrifice and the great Uprising, which are the two piers on which the temple of our faith is upheld. The Cross is our surety of emancipation from the guilt and terror of the past; the empty grave is our pledge of emancipation from the terrors of the future. Sin—the first enemy of mankind, and death, its last foe, have both been conquered, and we owe it all to Him, who died for our sins, and who was raised for our justification. These thoughts have been brought home vividly to us through the anniversaries of Good Friday and Easter Sunday. But they are thoughts for every Friday and every Sunday, and for all the days before and after. We cannot feast on them too often, nor rejoice in them too much. To remember and then forget, is not to remember at all.

The Easter Life. The salutation, "Christ is risen!" with which each Russian greets his neighbour and friend on Easter Day, would be a very beautiful one but for the fact that it has become a pure piece of formality, meaning no more for the majority than our common greeting of, "How are you?" Ideally, however, it represents very much for every Christian heart and life; and whether uttered by the lips or not, it should be the dominant note to which all life is harmonized. "If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God." The Christian is born into this, and it must ever be his native element. In union with our risen Lord, we occupy a position of victory from the beginning of our new life. "Our feet are where other men's heads are." The realisation of this, our grand privilege, will mean practical victory over the world, the flesh, and the devil.

Mental Indigestion. One of the Lenten preachers to City men offered some valuable suggestions, as he also passed some equally forcible strictures, upon the reading habits of the age. One of his criticisms was directed against the practice of an extensive but superficial reading of anything and everything that came from the press, the result of which he described in the phrase, "mental indigestion." It is a phrase worth considering, for it really explains a great deal. We are inclined to believe that much of the looseness of prevailing thought, and much of the scepticism and doubt that are abroad, are due to this vicious habit of rapid and scrappy reading. Men taste a little of every author, and such indiscriminate feeding results in a jumble of ideas which the term "mental indigestion" happily describes. It is always the little knowledge that is a dangerous thing. Lord Bacon's word is as true now as when he first wrote it: "It is the half knowledge that removes from God—a full science conducts to Him." It will be a good thing when men have the courage to refuse to taste of every literary dish that is set before them; and to confine themselves to what will really feed the mental and moral life.

Pastoral Visits. The Record, in dealing with the pressing topic of "The Decline of Church-going," lays stress upon the Bishop of Liverpool's words the other day, in regard to the need for more regular work in the direction of visiting. After making all necessary allowances for the difficulties which our modern city and suburban life has put in the way of pastoral visitation, there can be little doubt that this important part of ministerial work is not given due prominence. "The claims of multiplied organizations" take up in too many cases all the pastor's time, and, as the writer of the article in question has said, "less of organization and more of personal contact with the people would come nearer to the ideal of the Christian pastor." The judicious use of willing helpers in what may perhaps be designated as detail work, and the consequent relief afforded to the over-burdened pastor, would enable the latter to bridge the gulf which so often divides the pew from the pulpit.

Thou, and thy Son, and thy Daughter. Speaking in a very practical way at the recent Conference on Sunday Observance, held by the English Church Union, Canon Brooke said he felt with all his heart that it was the highest classes who were the greatest offenders in the matter of Sunday desecration; and that it was those who had six days out of seven to do what they liked, and also did what they liked on the seventh, who were the greatest hindrances to Sunday observance in this country. In this matter, however, as in all points of Christian duty and conduct, the fulfilment of the Divine rules depends upon the individual. To draw a hard and fast line for the "upper classes" is less difficult than it is to make a rule binding upon one's self. The Fourth Commandment limits its bearing to the individual householder and to those within his gates, and upon his obedience to its provisions the national rest was built.

A Poor Remedy. The new Education Bill, which is ostensibly meant to furnish a solution for the "religious question," is likely, if it is passed, on the contrary, to accentuate the evil, by introducing it into the municipal elections. For if Education in the future is to be in the hands of the County Councils, the candidates will have to pledge themselves to one side or the other of the religious aspects of the case, which will greatly complicate and embitter the electoral contests, and further endanger the situation. Many of these candidates will have no competency for the settlement of the question, nor will they have any genuine religious interest in it. This would be a distinct evil, which does not exist to anything like the same extent under the present system. The Bill will not pass without a fierce controversy, and this feature will be one round which the conflict will wage with most bitterness. The system which has on the whole worked so well is not likely to be lightly surrendered by those who have fought so hard for it in the interests of religious freedom.

The Church and the Mission-Hall. One of two recent speakers, in their laudable desire to emphasize the necessity of the churches welcoming "the lapsed masses" to places of worship, have, it seems to us, perhaps unwittingly, done some little injustice to the work of mission-halls. When churches build mission-halls in order to make a permanent division between well-to-do and poor folk, nothing can be more contrary to the Spirit of Christ. That some halls have been built in this way, there can be little doubt. But, on the other hand, poor people often prefer the simpler and homelier service of the hall to the more formal service of the church, as well as the sense of comradeship which prevails. The real need is for the churches to realise their responsibility to evangelise, as well as to seek their own profit. Until then, if the mission-hall is to do its work in the best way, church members must help it in a practical manner by presence as well as with purse. They must cease to regard it as an inferior kind of religious work, and come to look upon it as a vital part of their own life.

Courageous Magistrates. The Farnham Licensing Bench has performed a bold and worthy act in cancelling nine licences in that inebriating town. The state of things had become so intolerable that the magistrates acted on their own initiative, and gave notice of their intention some months ago to the parties interested, subject, however, to any alternative proposals from them. But the brewers and drink-sellers had no care for the morals of the town, so long as their pockets were filled, so the magistrates took the drastic step noted above. There is still a licensed house to every twenty-four adult male inhabitants! Let us hope reform will yet further go. Meantime, other magistrates, please copy!

A Heavy Incubus. The burden which the brewer and the publican, with the co-operation of the State, place upon the over-weighted shoulders of the rate and tax-payer for the maintenance of police, prisons, workhouses, and lunatic asylums, has of late frequently been supplemented by the huge expenditure called for when public-houses have been suppressed in making street improvements. The outlay in London in this respect has recently been enormous, and the municipal accounts of most of our large towns show a proportionate similar item. Some idea of the total taxation necessitated by these contributions to the wealth of the brewer may be formed from a case in Bristol a few weeks ago, in which the arbitrators awarded £6,040 to a brewery company as compensation for the suppression of one of their "tied houses." The State gave the licence free of charge, the ratepayer has to purchase it for over six thousand pounds!

"Inexorable Death." The death of Mr. Cecil Rhodes, while still under fifty years of age, removes one of the most potent personalities from the troubled world of South African affairs. What place he will ultimately occupy in the judgment of history, cannot now be forecast. Among his last words he said: "So much to do, and so little done!" and the tragic close to a brilliant career, while yet its aims were only half accomplished, comes home with vivid force. Neither wealth, nor medical skill, nor high position could stay the inevitable march of the disease which, ever since the Raid, had been slowly sapping at the roots of his constitution. The last year had been a pathetic pilgrimage in search of health, a persistent but fruitless endeavour to elude the "last enemy." The end has come to the empire-builder which at last must come to all. Friends and opponents are agreed that the aims of his life, if essentially material, were impersonal and unselfish. The methods by which he pursued his ends were, however, tainted with the "financier's" fallacy that "money can do anything." This has been the great heresy of this age of millionaires, and it is well that so sordid a theory should be exposed. There are ethical and spiritual laws which run deeper and stronger than the current of any human will, and they are violated at the peril of those who tamper with them. South Africa, for the last ten years, has been a seething vortex of struggle between rival ambitions. What is growing clearer, as the years go by, is that the inimitable laws of right and wrong cannot be slighted with impunity. They vindicate themselves over the wreck of individual plans and projects, and move on steadily and irresistibly to their Divinely appointed end, whoever may stand in their way.

The Opium Traffic. In a well-informed and optimistic article, a correspondent of a London daily places before the public some sound reasons for believing that the days of the opium traffic between India and China are numbered. Within the Chinese Empire itself the Anti-Opium Movement is spreading, and if Chang Chih-Tung's influence, which is already considerable, affects young China, as it is hoped it will do, then the importation of foreign opium will soon cease. Another significant thing is that England has just allied herself with Japan, a country hostile to the last degree to opium smoking, and the two Powers cannot act consistently in China until the opium traffic ceases. There will be no compromise in the matter on the part of Japan, for already that Power has taken drastic measures to stop opium-smoking amongst its Chinese subjects in Formosa and elsewhere. Opium occupies the first place on the Japanese list of articles the importation of which is wholly prohibited. It will be a remarkable and humiliating thing for England if this cursed traffic ceases owing to foreign influences destroying our opium trade! There will be no virtue in such a necessity. We yet have time, by our own act, to kill this abominable merchandise. Already we have been warned by the diminution of the receipts more than 50 per cent. since 1880. Is our Indian Government wise enough to act promptly in the matter?

Making a Clean Sweep. A worthy example of drastic dealing with a public evil comes to us from Belgium, in which country an Anti-Gambling Bill which has been before Parliament for a year, or more, has finally passed the Lower House and the Senate, and been sent to the King for signature. It definitely suppresses all gambling clubs and houses, and also provides for the immediate closing of the notorious establishments at Ostend, at Spa, and elsewhere. Unhappily, however, as in other cases in which wealthy and demoralizing corporations have been allowed to develop to the public detriment, there is, in the case of the gambling tables at Ostend and Spa, a false recognition of so-called vested interests, and the ratepayer will have to bear the burden of compensation to the enemies of public morality.

A Grave Situation. The growing tendency towards "cornering" important industries in the interests of monopoly, is being exemplified on a large scale in the "Tobacco War" now going on between two great "combines," one American and another of English origin. In this case the battle is being waged over a needless luxury, but if either side is successful it is clear that the conflict will not end here, but be afterwards carried into the region of necessaries, in which case the vital interests of the public at large will be seriously jeopardized. Indeed, a "Meat Trust" is already spoken of. These commercial rivalries are introducing a dangerous and immoral element into modern life, and embody the most dangerous feature of the accumulation of wealth in the hands of the few. It should not be forgotten that consumers have the ultimate remedy in their own hands, and not till they realize that it is so will this grave peril be conquered. The present benefits that each side offers to the tradesman and the buyer, means, ultimately, that both will be at the mercy of the millionaire monopolist.

Christianity and Competition. Mr. Compton Rickett writes in the current Young Man on the place of competition in business, and on the influence of Christianity on this vital element in human life. He defends the principle of competition, within limits, as one that is inherent in nature, being her method of producing finer types of life; and in business, as defending the buyer against undue profits on the part of the seller, and economy and ingenuity in manufacture and distribution. But this principle must be Christianised. This is done by the spirit of fair dealing being insisted upon, and by the seller refraining from pressing his superior knowledge to the injury of an incompetent buyer. Christianity has softened the great economic laws, elevated labour, and transformed the relationship between master and servant. This is a temperate view of a difficult question, showing that the hopeless contradiction which is sometimes thought to exist between the spiritual life and the laws of business is not essential, if business relations are purified and permeated by the spirit of true religion.

*Practical Papers.

THE CAUSE OF DOUBT.

"Open Thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of Thy law" (Psa. cxix. 18).

THE world is full of doubts and doubters. Cries of "Lo here!" and "Lo there!" rend the air, and the hearts of men grow sick and weary of continual seeking after truth. In the parks on the Lord's Day, hear the babel of many voices, each setting forth its theories of life here and hereafter—so-called orators ventilating their sceptical nostrums (many of which are based on neither sense nor science); dispensers of claptrap; windbags, that collapse at the first prick of sound argument; skittles, that tumble at the first straight ball. There are, no doubt, some fools who will believe anything; there are greater fools who believe nothing.

But to the real doubter doubt is a real thing, not to be discussed lightly before a gaping crowd, but rather to be fought out in the solitude of the heart. He feels its burden; a real conflict rages in his soul. It is agony to him to know that there is a contradiction somewhere between what he has been taught and what he feels, as he wrestles in the endeavour to reconcile his experience and his creed.

The writer of the Psalm quoted above had his spiritual horizon overcast, but there was a rift in the clouds through which shone a gleam of light. There are four points in his prayer which form the infallible test of a sincere doubter. (1) He was HONEST. He recognised that his eyesight was at fault. (2) He was SENSIBLE. He went to the right source for healing—"Open Thou mine eyes." (3) He was EXPECTANT—"That I may behold." (4) He was DEFINITE—"That I may behold wondrous things out of thy law." Thinkers, troubled by doubts, who will examine themselves by these four characteristics, and fearlessly carry them out, will soon step forth upon firmer ground.

I.—Be Honest.

Admit that the fault is in yourself. "I cannot see," is the honest man's conviction and confession. That is about the last thing one likes to do. From the days of Adam downward, man seeks to lay blame on others. Many people will not see—that is the trouble; and there are none so blind as they. Others say they cannot see, and that, therefore, they will not believe. Such a position lacks both logic and commonsense. In Mark iv. 26-29, we read of a man who "should cast seed into the ground; and should sleep, and rise night and day, and the seed should spring and grow up, he knoweth not how. . . . But when the fruit is brought forth, immediately he putteth in the sickle, because the harvest is come." Consider, then,

TWO PRINCIPLES.

1. As a matter of fact, in our everyday life, we do believe in things we cannot see, and we act upon that belief. The man who says, "I will not believe because I cannot see," gives the lie to that contention every day. Tell him he has no brains, and he will wax very wrath; although he has never seen them, yet none believes in their existence so firmly as he. Or he denies the reality of a pain from which his friend is suffering, because, forsooth, he cannot see it! It is useless to argue with such a man. You can only say, "Wait till you have it, and you will know it!"

* The former series of Practical Papers (fourteen subjects) are published in book form. (DREAMS AND REALITIES. Cloth 1s. Morgan & Scott.)

2. In everyday life, we do believe in things we cannot understand, and we act upon that belief. When daily duty compels us to take the morning train, we do not stand gazing at the engine, and refuse to proceed because we do not understand how the engine works. If we did we should be left behind! Arriving at our office, if need arises to send a telegram, we do not refrain from doing so because we do not comprehend the mysteries of electricity; nor, returning home, do we despise the warmth of a fire, if the night be cold, because we have not mastered the science of heat. So, too, in this passage of St. Mark's Gospel. The husbandman puts seed into the ground, which springs and grows up, "he knoweth not how," but is glad enough to reap the benefit thereof. Let us exercise at least as much commonsense in matters of faith, as we do in those which concern us day by day, for it is as illogical as it is unpractical to refuse to believe because we do not see or understand.

You may put a blind man in a beautiful garden, but he might as well be in a turnip field, for all the difference it will make to him, if he cannot see the beauties of the flowers. But they are there. So is it when we come to this Book of God. Let us admit candidly that our failure to appreciate spiritual things arises from our own defective vision. The fault lies not in God, nor in the Scriptures, but in ourselves. There may be mystery in Christianity, but there is still more in unbelief. Let us at least choose the mystery of light, rather than cling to that of darkness.

II.—Be Sensible.

Go to the right source. "Open Thou mine eyes." In the case of physical ailments, you consult, not a mechanic, clever though he be, but a physician, because you believe that he is best able to effect a cure. Do you know the composition of his medicines, or the process by which he treats you? No. But you avail yourself of what you do not understand.

"If any man lack wisdom," says the Apostle, "let him ask of God." Do you lack wisdom? Turn not for light to the writings or words of man, when it can be had for the asking from the Divine Source of light. Ask of God and it shall be given you, and "if any man willeth to do His will, he shall know of the teaching, whether it be of God" (John vii. 17 R.V.). We have already noted two principles; here are

TWO FACTS.

(1) Sin. You may call it by whatever name you will; you may argue about it or try to explain it away, but you know it, and you feel it every day. It is here, and our business is to drive it out, as we would pursue a mad dog to the death.

When a lifeboat goes out to a sinking ship, the brave fellows do not wait to inquire the cause of the disaster. The urgent necessity is to save the lives of those in danger of death. When that is done, due investigation may ensue. Eternity will suffice to teach us why God permitted sin to enter the world. What is urgent to-day is to fight it in ourselves, and to help those who have fallen to stand upon their feet again.

The second fact is Christianity. Respected and obeyed, or scorned and disregarded, it is well established in our midst to-day. Hostile and heathen writers bear witness to its origin; history declares how it took root and sprang up, like the mustard seed, until it became as a great tree, spreading abroad so that the nations of the earth, like birds, found refuge in its midst.

Christianity did not create sin; it does not profess to explain sin; it cures it. Sin is the disease, Christianity is the remedy. Christ is the Great Physician by whom alone its efficacy can avail. To Him, then, let us go for healing, that our defective vision may be exchanged for perfect sight. Then shall we see things as God sees them, and come into line with his point of view.

III.—Be Expectant.

When we turn thus to Him, we must expect an answer—"that I may behold." Do you really want to understand? Or is your "doubt" a mere shield to ward off the arrows of conviction? When an earnest soul speaks with you about spiritual things, do you confront him with some smart objection with which to silence him? Here is a case in point:—

A young man being urged by a friend to become a Christian, inquired, "Must I believe in the Genesis account of the Creation?" "Yes," was the reply. "Then," said he, "I cannot, and will not," and the interview got no further. Later on, another pleaded with him, but with the same result. By this time he was congratulating himself on being "appeal-proof." On a third occasion he adopted similar tactics, but the new comer was wiser than his predecessors, and said, "My dear brother, before we go into that, there is a prior question that you must settle first; then I will gladly discuss the other with you." Feeling that he had found a foeman worthy of his steel, the young fellow asked guardedly, "What is your 'prior question?'" "This!" was the reply, "How do you stand in relation to God, on account of your sin? If God called you into his presence to-night, would it make any difference to you how, when, and where the account of Creation came to be written? Would it not, on the other hand, make all the difference in what condition you appeared before your Maker?" After further conversation, the young man said, "I see where I was wrong," and he yielded himself to Christ. Having thus settled that "prior question" first, what was the result? Questions of Biblical difficulty were approached, not in a hostile, but in a friendly mood. Now he wanted to see, whereas before, he had been wilfully blind.

IV.—Be Definite.

If you have a specific difficulty, take it to God, and expect that He will give you light upon it. Deal with one thing at a time; you cannot traverse the entire ground at once. Expect something definite—that you may see "wondrous things" out of his Book; and there are wonders in it; the Book itself is the greatest wonder of all.

But some will say, "Ah, it is the wondrous things in the Bible that constitute my difficulty." Then be bold and face them! There are many things hard to be understood; but there is also much within the range of even a modest comprehension. Be thankful for that to begin with. If bones are found in the portion set before you at your meal, you do not cast away the whole repast because they are impossible of mastication; you leave them, and enjoy the meat. There is plenty in this Word of God that you can understand; feed upon that meantime, that your spiritual life may grow thereby. The Psalmist had only a portion of the Bible, we have all; but he saw more in the part than most of us see in the whole. He only had the Law, we have that, and the Gospel too.

All doubts and difficulties prove the want of one thing. What is it? Go into a dark room, and try to make your way to the other side. Immediately you stumble against this piece of furniture, or that. What are you to do? Have it all removed? No, get a light! and though the obstacles remain just as they were, you can see your way round them. And more than that; some of those pieces that were a hindrance to you in the dark, are the very things that minister to your comfort in the light. There are doctrines and facts in the Bible, to which these may be compared. Approached in the dark, they wound your prejudice, and offend your reason; but seen in the light of God, though they still remain, they trouble you no more; and some of the very doctrines that aroused your indignation will most of all minister to your spiritual life and peace.

Only those in the Kingdom can understand the things of the Kingdom, for "the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; they are foolishness unto him, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned" (1 Cor. ii. 14). Confess your lack of wisdom; seek that which cometh down from above; do the will of God, so far as you know it, until you emerge into the light of day. G.

*The Rock in Horeb.

(Ex. xvii. 1-7; Num. xx. 7-13.)

By Rev. K. MOODY-STUART, M.A.

IN regard to the rock in Horeb, and its stream, there is no indication whatever in the sacred narrative that the miracle was continued during the forty-years' desert sojourn. When Paul, therefore, says that "they drank of that spiritual Rock which followed them," he either refers to Christ Himself being in the midst of Israel, through the whole desert sojourn, as the people's spiritual sustenance and refreshment; or, if he calls the drink furnished by the Rock "spiritual" because it was supernaturally given, he indicates that the stream accompanied the camp in its divinely chosen movements. Or it may be that other rocks yielding water were found by the pilgrim Church wherever they pitched, maintaining, in the ordinary course of Providence, supplies which were miraculously inaugurated and closed at the two Meribahs. . . . Let us inquire how this Rock resembles Jesus Christ, and what lessons regarding Him it teaches to the intelligent beholder.

Its want of imposing grandeur to the eye taught the Israelites that their Messiah when He came should not appear to be different from other men. As this rock was formed of material like the surrounding rocks, so Christ's body was formed of the dust of the ground, like our own. "He was made in the likeness of sinful flesh." More than once He escaped violence simply by being lost in the crowd. Though He was, to the eye of faith, "the chiefest among ten thousand and altogether lovely," yet He was despised and rejected of men.

> The Saviour came; no outward pomp
> Bespoke his presence nigh,
> No earthly beauty shined in Him
> To draw the carnal eye.

Some persons acknowledge that the world sorely needs renovating and reviving by spiritual influences from above, such as might be presented under the figure of life-giving rain descending from the clouds of heaven; but they refuse to receive such influences when offered to them through the channel of the human nature of Him whom his people accept as the world's Redeemer. No doubt his human nature was derived (though without taint of sin) from our own, but it became the wondrous receptacle of that Divine Spirit which proceeds from the Father and the Son, and became the channel through which alone his spiritual influences can be communicated to men. To such objectors "the Rock of Ages" is but a "rock of offence," but the man who is deeply sensible of his own need will thankfully use the words of

* Part of one of the suggestive studies in Light from the Holy Hills: Lessons from Old Testament Mountains. (2s. 6d. Morgan & Scott.)

Psalm cxiv.; and, as he quaffs the living and life-giving stream of grace, will praise Him,

Who by his power did turn the flint
Into a water-spring.

This rock was distinguished from other rocks by the Presence of Jehovah upon it—no doubt, in the pillar of cloud: "Behold, I will stand before thee there upon the rock in Horeb" (Ex. xvii. 6). So the Baptist was told that he would recognise the Messiah by a similar sign: "Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending and remaining on Him, the same is He which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost." Jesus said of Himself, "The Spirit of the Lord God is upon Me." Very probably the symbol of Jehovah's presence on this rock was not visible to all the people whose encampment was miles away; but it was so to Moses. The Shekinah cloud of glory may have been hid from their view among the other clouds that robed the mountain. As John alone saw the dove lighting on Jesus, and Moses alone may have seen this cloud, so his countrymen perceived no special Divine presence in Christ. The eye requires to be divinely opened to behold the divinely-manifested presence.

THE GIFT OF THE SPIRIT.

This rock had a hidden store of precious water within it, visible only to the eye of the All-seeing. Its fountain of springing water represented the Holy Spirit, of which Jesus said, "If any man thirst, let him come unto Me and drink. But this spake He of the Spirit which they that believe on Him should receive, for the Holy Ghost was not yet given, because that Jesus was not yet glorified" (John vii. 37). Under the symbol of pure water bursting forth from a rocky fountain, the Holy Ghost is represented as the source at once of life and satisfaction to men perishing from the unquenched thirst of their immortal spirits for that which no stream of earthly satisfaction could ever supply. . . .

After Christ's death all that is required of those who are seeking the gift of the Holy Spirit is that they should "speak to the Rock, and it shall give forth its water"—i.e., should pray to the living and glorified Saviour, and He will give us that Spirit who came down on the Church at Pentecost after his crucifixion, of whom He said, "If I depart I will send Him unto you." If the stream which flows now from the rock in Kadesh is the very stream which first sprang forth under Moses' rod, it teaches us that the Holy Spirit is still proceeding from the ascended Christ in as great fulness as ever, to satisfy the thirst of every one who will come to the living Rock of Ages and drink therefrom. However this be, the invitation is still given: "The Spirit and the Bride say, Come; and let him that is athirst come; and whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely." . . .

"Rock of Ages, cleft for me
Let me hide myself in Thee!"

The Conference on Confession.

DEAR SIR,—The assumption that a conference is needed in the 20th century to define the Church of England's teaching on Confession and Absolution seems very absurd to those who bear in mind that it was settled so far back as the time of King Edward VI., and in the "Homily on Repentance" we have it very plainly and Scripturally recorded thus:—

"The priests are as much bound to confess themselves unto the lay-people, as the lay-people are bound to confess themselves to them, and if to pray is to absolve, then the laity by this place (James v. 16) hath as great authority to absolve the priests as the priests have to absolve the laity."

"Auricular confession hath not his warrant of God's word."

"What need we then to tell forth our sin into the ear of the priest?" . . .

"We ought to acknowledge none other priest for deliverance from our sins but our Saviour Jesus Christ." . . .

This is the "godly and wholesome doctrine and necessary for these times," which the clergy of the Established Church, by their solemn assent and consent (Article 35), are bound to teach.—Yours very truly, CHARLES S. KING, Bart.

Our Duty to the World.

BY REV. FREDK. W. REYNOLDS.

IF one were asked to state what is the true work of the Church, the answer would be (1) to edify its own members, and (2) to evangelize the world. There have been periods in the Church's history when these two purposes have been separated, the former having been attended to while the latter was neglected. But to-day it is recognised that, while the Church should plan its labours so as to build up the saints, it should also see that, in every part of the world, the Gospel is proclaimed. And it is this sounding out of the Gospel—this evangelizing of the world—that we now consider.

DIVINELY ORDAINED.

I. It should be clear that the evangelizing of the world is a work Ordained of God. Nothing could be clearer than the words, "Go ye... and make disciples of all nations" (Matt. xxviii. 18; Mark xvi. 15). It is God Himself, in the Person of the Son, who has laid it upon the Church to organize and sustain aggressive enterprise. The Church's duty is laid down, and the privilege is set before her; and, in the strength of her Divine Master, she is to send out into all the world, and, on his authority, to preach the Gospel.

And it was in this light that the early Church viewed the matter. In the time of stress and trouble, when it might have been expected that efforts would be relaxed, we find the members greatly increased their endeavours; so that, when organized and united work ceased, every individual member became an evangelist: "There was a great persecution," and they "went everywhere preaching the Word" (Acts viii. 1, 4)—not only for their love of God, but because they realized the declaration of the Gospel was God-ordained.

And a certain order also, to be observed in evangelizing, is evidently intended: "Repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem" (Luke xxiv. 47; Acts i. 8). Home as well as foreign missions are included in God's scheme, for the two can never really be separated. If either one be neglected, the other will suffer. And so the command stands: Evangelize—beginning at home.

DIVINELY DIRECTED.

II. The Evangelizing of the World is Superintended by God. The record of this Divine superintendence in the first century is fascinating in the extreme. God Himself, by the Spirit, chooses and selects the workers—who, having been thus chosen of God, are sent forth by Him. And, being sent forth, He endues them with power for the work: "The Holy Ghost said, Separate Me Barnabas and Saul for the work." "So they, being sent forth of the Holy Ghost, departed;" "filled with the Holy Ghost" (Acts xiii. 2, 4, 9). And when, later, there is perplexity as to doctrine and sphere of labour, counsel and direction are directly afforded: "It seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us to lay no greater burden upon you than these necessary things;" and "when they had gone throughout Phrygia and the region of Galatia, and were forbidden of the Holy Ghost to preach the Word in Asia . . . . they assayed to go into Bithynia, but the Spirit suffered them not . . . . and a vision appeared . . . . a man . . . . saying, Come over into Macedonia" (Acts xv. 28; xvi. 6-10).

And still God superintends. Of this there can be no doubt. Note how clearly it is stated: "God hath put all things under his feet; and gave Him to be Head over all things unto the Church" (Eph. i. 22), the teaching being that not only does God, in the Person of the Son, govern and rule; but that this governance and ruling is with a view to the well-being of the Church. So that the believer engaged in witnessing for Christ can rest on the fact that he is engaged in a work which is both God-ordained and God-superintended.

DIVINELY ASSURED.

III.—It can be confidently affirmed that the Evangelizing of the World can never be in vain. This may be proved by two methods—the appeal to God's Word, and the appeal to history. To the Christian it is enough that God has promised; but the evidence from history may well be borne in mind.

In the Scriptures, the witnessing believer will find abundant assurance as to the final result of his work for God: e.g., the heathen are the gift of the Father to the Son, and to the uttermost parts of the earth the reign of Jesus is to extend (Psa. ii. 8; Hab. ii. 14). And Jesus Himself affirmed that all given to Him would surely come (John vi. 27); while John, in vision, saw all this fulfilled (Rev. vii. 9; xi. 15). "Jesus shall see of the travail of his soul."

And the testimony of history gives point to the promises. The case of Darwin's Patagonian savage is well known; and the "irreclaimably brutalized" have been changed by the Gospel. Also the story of the martyrs of Uganda, singing their hymns of praise while the flames closed about them, is fresh in memory; while the work among the Telugus, when 7,000 were added to the Church in two years, stands out clear. And such evidence could be easily multiplied: the preaching is in demonstration of the Spirit and of power. This God-ordained and God-superintended work of evangelizing the world can never be in vain.

URGENCY OF THE WORK.

IV.—And, last of all, we should seek a lively realization of the fact that the Evangelizing of the World can brook no delay. Very suggestive is the word, "The king's business required haste" (1 Sam. xxi. 8); and the business of our King requires haste. We need to see the urgency of the work; for, while we tarry, men are dying.

When John Williams, who became the martyr of Erromanga, told one of the chiefs that he thought of returning to his own country to urge the need of more missionaries being sent, the chief replied: "Go with all speed, get all the missionaries you can, and come back as soon as you can; but many of us will be dead before you return!" Verily the whole pathos of missions is in that word. There should be no delay. The command stands: "Go, and preach." And so this work of evangelizing the world—God-ordained, God-superintended, and which can never be in vain—is one also that can brook no delay.

Now, are we doing our part in this Evangelizing of the World? Have we felt the burden of the work? And are we willing to place ourselves in the hand of God that, as He may choose, we will bear witness either at home or abroad? We are not free to decide this for ourselves—we belong to God. Redeemed unto Himself by precious blood, the attitude of the believing heart is, "What wilt Thou have me to do?" And blessed is that heart which, in response to its query, can hear the Master say, "Go . . . and lo, I am with you all the days, even to the end of the age."

The Folded Will.

"One may be quiescent, yet not ac-quiescent. There must be the folded will, as well as the folded hands."

O FLUTTERING heart, that, like a bird imprisoned,
Beateth itself against life's circling bars,
Lift thou a song to Him who sees, clear-visioned,
Thy home beyond the stars.
Trust thou in God, to whom the night and day
Shine as one light that never fades away.

Fold thou thy wings, and wait the time appointed,
When, to thy joy, from earthly bonds set free,
Thine eyes behold, with heavenly powers anointed,
Green fields of liberty.
O prisoner of hope, in patience wait
Till God's hour strike, and opened is the gate.

Thus shalt thou know, e'en now, the satisfaction
Of hearts that trust the "Faithful and the True,"
The freedom of the soul, of faith in action
Soaring beyond the blue;
Thou need'st not wait for liberty until
The day shall break, if thou but fold thy will.

O blessed peace, the peace of simply taking
The yoke of Christ to learn his promised rest;
The peace of lying still, thy choice forsaking
To lean upon his breast;
The rest of folded hands from work self-wove,
The peace of folded will in his great love.

Samuel and Saul.

Forsaken? Never!

(1 Sam. xii. 22.)

By Rev. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

WHILST the whole land was ringing with the news of Saul's exploit in the the deliverance of Jabesh-Gilead, it appeared to Samuel to be an auspicious moment for confirming the kingdom in the hand of Saul: and therefore he summoned a great convocation of the nation at Gilgal.

There Israel had encamped for the first night after crossing the Jordan, and the twelve great stones commemorating that event were still visible. There the act of circumcision had been performed, cleansing the people of the neglect of the wilderness; and there, too, the first Passover in the Land of Promise had been celebrated. Amid these great memorials and memories of the past, the people gathered from far and near to crown Saul king. After this great ceremony, Saul and his people rejoiced together with peace-offerings and thank-offerings to God. This was the moment that Samuel chose to lay down his office as judge—the last of the judges, and the first of the prophets.

I.—Samuel's Resignation.

An end must come to the longest and most successful ministry; and happy are they who, before they lay their heads down to the last sleep, and their spirits enter to receive their final award, are able to extend their hands and bare their hearts before those who have known them best, and say, "These at least are clean."

This is what Samuel by the grace of God was able to do. Standing bare-headed before the vast audience of the men of Israel, and pointing to his white locks, he said, "I am old and grey-headed, and I have walked before you (as in Eastern lands a shepherd precedes his flock) from my boyhood up." His had been an unblemished career, and for his own sake and for the sake of God for whom he stood, he was anxious to obtain from the people a vindication of the blamelessness of his career. He therefore protested: "I have not defrauded you, nor oppressed you. Whose ox have I taken? Whose ass? Can any man confront me as having taken from his hand even a sandal as a bribe that I may turn away mine eyes from his misdoing?" And all the people, with one unanimous consent, cried: "Thou hast not defrauded, nor oppressed, nor taken anything from our hand."

But the old man was not content; he wanted to bind the people by a solemn oath, as in the very sight of God and the king; and, therefore, he said, lifting his hand to heaven, "I call God to witness against you this day and his anointed king, that what you have said is true." And again, from the lips of all the people, with one unanimous shout, there came the response, "God is witness." The old man was comforted, and added: "Yes, God is witness, the very God who brought our people out of Egypt, and appointed Moses and Aaron."

Oh that all our public men to-day were as clean-handed and pure-hearted as Samuel was! that when the records of their actions are rehearsed before the judgment-seat of God it may be discovered that those who have been high in office have not prostituted their high position for their own emolument, or acted for private gain, but that they are clean-handed and pure-hearted.

II.—He Designated his People's Sin.

It was a great opportunity to show them where they had done wrong, and a man whose own hands are clean is permitted to be the sincere critic of others' misdoing. See to it that your own eye is single, and that the beam is extracted from it, before you essay to remove the mote from your brother's eye.

First, he set himself to show the difference between their former and their latter method of procedure. He carried their thoughts back to Egypt, and, in effect, said: When your fathers were in bondage to the Egyptians, and under the oppression of Pharaoh, you cried unto Jehovah, and in gracious answer He raised up deliverance. And when in the days of the Judges you were oppressed first by Sisera, then by the Philistines, and then by the people of Moab, you cried to God for deliverance, and it came; but now, when the threatened invasion of Nahash, the King of the Ammonites, was filling the horizon with thunder-clouds, instead of holding a great invocation for prayer, you insisted upon my appointing a king. Why have you deteriorated? Why was prayer your natural resort 300 years ago, and now it is neglected? Is it not because you are prayerless that you have drifted from your ancient moorings? In this is a great sin.

Must not we always take care that, instead of saying impulsively and impetuously, "We will do this or that," we should constantly wait before God that He would appoint a deliverer?

Secondly, in his dealing with the people, he put a new reading upon past history. On their side, they pointed out the successive catastrophes which had befallen their country; how the Ammonites, the Philistines, the Moabites, and Sisera, and other surrounding nations, had oppressed them, brought them under their power, and, as a way of deliverance from such troubles, they had argued the necessity of having a king. Samuel, of course, admitted the successive afflictions which had befallen his people, but he did not put the same reading upon them. He said: "You demand a king, who shall make such catastrophes no longer possible, but I tell you on the other hand, that, whether you have a king or not, if you forget God, as you have forgotten Him, and if you turn to Baalim and Ashtaroth as you have turned to them, neither your king, nor any alternative mode of government you can invent, will deliver you from the consequences. In other words, he made it clear that it was not the presence or absence of a monarchy, but the want of singleness of purpose, and devotion to Jehovah, which had been the cause and root of all their troubles.

Again, there is a lesson for ourselves. After all, it is not this man or that, who is necessary to a church, so long as the church itself is living before God in incorruption, and sincerity of truth, and is following the lead of the beacon fire by night, and the cloudy pillar by day. When a church is right with God, God stands for the church.

Thirdly, he indicated to the people that God had never failed to send them a man when a man was wanted. He said: "Look back upon your past history. Even apart from an hereditary line of kings, with the prestige of Royal descent, God has always raised up a man to help you in an emergency. Consider—did not He raise up Moses and Aaron? Did not He raise up Jephthah and Barak (see R.V. marg.), Gideon and myself? See how perpetually, in the dark hour, in answer to prayer, God has sent you the man that was needed. Could you not have trusted Him; and instead of being so urgent for a king, could you not have waited for Him to do for you, as he had done aforetime?"

Lastly, he said: "My countrymen, you have greatly deteriorated, you have failed in your faith, you have demanded a visible king, but have forgotten the invisible Lord; you have magnified the arm of flesh, but have forgotten the mighty power of the Eternal. You have been sheltering under the idea of a new royalty, whereas God was your King, your true Head, the Leader, and Patron of the nation. You should have rested only on Him."

Are we not all liable to the same lapse of faith? We look to the visible and forget the invisible. The air is filled with anxiety, clamour, and controversy, whilst in the shadow, behind the thin veil of sense, stands the eternal crowned Christ, waiting ever to trim the lamps of the golden candlesticks and to hold the stars in his right hand. It was a brave thing, a noble thing, a right thing, for Samuel to show to his people how they had drifted from the old true standing ground of faith into practical atheism and unbelief.

III.—Samuel's Assurance.

Having dealt with their failure and deterioration, he went on to say with inimitable sweetness, "The Lord will not forsake his people, for his great name's sake." How perpetually this argument was used by the holy men of the old time. See the instructive parallel instances recorded in Exodus xxxii. 12; Joshua vii. 9; Isa. xlviii. 9, 11; Ezek. xx.

The old prophet went on to say: "It hath pleased the Lord to make you his people." God hides his reasons. He loves because He will. The flame of his love requires no fuel. We may put with these, those words of the great Apostle: "He gave Himself for us, that He might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto Himself a people for his own possession." This assurance applies to men:—

(1) As individuals. God will not forsake you. He did not choose you because of your goodness or beauty, and He will not forsake you because you have failed of your best. He has made you his child by adoption and grace, not that there was anything in you to specially attract Him, but because He would. Some day He may explain to you his reason, but just now there is no reason that any of us can guess at, why we have been chosen from the rest of men to be his. It has pleased Him to make us his sons and daughters. We may have sinned against Him and grieved his Holy Spirit, we may have mixed ourselves with the seed of the people amongst whom we dwell, but God will not forsake his people. If He did, there would be a charge against his love that it was not infinite, that it ceased after sin had reached to a certain height of outrage, that it could not abound over sin. His power also would be impugned, for the lost spirits in hell would boast that He had attempted more than he was able to perform—that He had not counted the cost.

There would also be an imputation upon his immutability. It would be spread through the universe, that He took up a sinful soul, cleansed and clothed it, loved and blessed it, and then He changed. At the news that God could be fickle, the palace of eternity would rock, the throne of Heaven shake, and the mighty vault of space would reel to destruction. God dare not surrender the work which He has begun in the heart of man. That is why we may count on being saved. We have no positive claim on God; there is no native beauty nor attractiveness to Him who sees the inner life; there is nothing necessary in our service; but He has set his love upon us, and He must go through with it, and stand to his bargain before all worlds. O soul of man, God will not forsake thee.

(2) As a Church, why could not God forsake Israel? Because the chosen people was the type of what He desired every nation to become; and therefore He must needs go on building up Israel, that his type might not be broken; and He had to work through Israel to bring other nations to its level. If God had abandoned Israel, how could He have hoped to regenerate the world?

What was true of Israel may be true of a Church. There may be many failures and inconsistencies in her that ought to be altered But God cannot cast her away in spite of all her sinful imperfection. He will refine and purify her till she realise his ideal and become his perfect Bride.

(3) As a Nation.—England cannot go drifting on into materialism and irreligion, as she is doing. God cannot afford to let her become immoral and debased; cannot permit her to follow in the way of Rome and Greece; cannot forsake the people whom He has blessed and used since the days of Alfred, who have been the pioneers of missionary and Christian civilization through the entire world. For his Name's sake He cannot do it. No, it is certain that sooner or later a great revival of religion will bring us back to our first love.

Other Lands.

A Visit to Pandita Ramabai.

BREAKFAST.

"A FEW years ago you would not have enjoyed the privilege of sitting with me in the same row, much less eating with me," said Babu Gadre, Pandita Ramabai's chief helper, laughingly, to the late Rev. Dennis Osborne, as he sat down by his side on a square board on the floor. He was of the twice-born Brahmans, but, having been really born again about four years ago, he does not dread any more the shadow of a European falling upon his food.

We had come up from Poona with Rev. W. W. Bruère and Rev. Dennis and Mrs. Osborne, and now were treated in Oriental fashion to a breakfast of rice and pulse, delicious chipati (unleavened bread), buffalo butter, and bunches of bananas, on which occasion we made honest but clumsy attempts to imitate the nimble grace of our hosts in using their natural forks.

Save on our arrival and at dinner, we saw little of the Pandita. From early morn till nightfall she is at her post, the soul and the brain of the whole establishment, praying, teaching, managing, directing, writing, &c., until her head and body ache with weariness, and nature demands its due in the way of rest.

THE WIDOWS' HOME.

Owing to the plague at Poona the inmates of the High School at that town were temporarily removed to Mukti, so that at the time of our visit there were over 2,000 women in the place. The word "Mukti" means Salvation, Freedom, and has been adopted by Pandita Ramabai as the title of her Widows' Home.

Mukti is not a place of play. Recreation takes its due turn; but not a minute is wasted. Everything is done with the regularity of a clock, and with a method that precludes confusion. Strict attention is paid to personal order and cleanliness. Every girl must take a bath once a day, and wash her own clothing, if strong enough. For the little ones and the invalids, the washing is done in turns by the strong and healthy.

CHURCH AND SCHOOL.

The new church, which is not quite finished, holds 2,500 people, and is used as a school during the week. The different classes group round their teachers on the floor, and infants are taught on the kindergarten system. Every day begins with an early prayer meeting for the believers, and later in the morning with an hour's service for all, at which Pandita Ramabai generally expounds the Word of God.

The Hindu is more independent of comfort than we are. He sits on the floor and sleeps on the floor, unless tainted with European ideas. In the dormitories at Mukti, nothing is to be seen save a great number of bags along the wall containing the property of inmates, and a still larger number of warm coverlets, tidily folded up, hanging above the place of each sleeper. No doubt this represents to the girls the same amount of comfort as a snug little room would to English young ladies.

CHILDREN'S GARDENS.

In going around the compounds, built in squares, and, on noticing some green plots in one of the yards, we were told that this was Pandita's coming Christmas present. Some of the famine girls had brought with them the habit of picking raw grains and leaves wherever they could find them, and so making themselves ill. Pandita Ramabai proposed to them one day to plant the grains instead of eating them, and to watch what God would make of them. She also expressed a desire for the plants and flowers to be given to her on Christmas Day. The girls were delighted with the idea, and many hands soon became busily engaged in digging the ground and planting seeds in every available corner, in watching and watering it. The result was—more than a cartload of green leaves, blades, and bushes.

Activity reigns everywhere. In one building the women would be preparing the food; in another they would be cleaning the floor, by smearing a mixture over it of cow-dung and clay, which an American friend called a peculiar but an effective varnish, and for the purpose it is. Farther up, a number of them are stamping pebbles, sand, &c., into the ground, to prepare it for the flooring of a new shed.

THE BAPTISTERY.

A pool attracts our attention, and we are told that a little time ago an old Rajput was baptized in it, on confession of his faith in Jesus Christ as the only Saviour from sin. We are taken to the sheds of the mothers, where some of the old, infirm, helpless women live, who sought for help at Mukti, and could not be taken in with the others. As we understand, this work is supported from the church funds—that is, by the tithes of the little earnings of those who have become members of the church, and of whom many give up their Sunday dinner in order to help others.

No girl is allowed to be baptized unless she is assured of her own conversion and salvation. When baptized, she is taught to take an interest in the spread of the Word of God, and to give cheerfully toward it according to her ability. In June last, 166 girls were baptized on confession of their faith, and at their own request. They were all grown up, and legally allowed to choose their own religion. One exception was made with a little girl aged four-and-a-half years, who was taken to the home when only ten weeks old and adopted by one of Pandita's chief helpers. For several weeks she kept asking for baptism, saying that Christ had loved and saved her. To the question, "Now, my darling, tell me how Christ saved you, and what He did for you," she replied after a moment of thoughtful reflection, "Jesus loved me and took my punishment for me." She was baptized, on the plea of our Lord Himself, "Suffer little children to come unto Me and forbid them not."

CHILDREN'S PRAYERS.

The girls are encouraged to pray aloud before retiring to bed. Many queer expressions pass the lips of the little ones. One would say, "I am very naughty; I give much trouble to my matron; I thank Thee for this;" or "Dear Father, give Bhai (Pandita) much work to do;" or "Make Dada (Mr. Gadre) a good girl." There are none but girls at Mukti, so they ask to make everyone a good girl. The difference of sex, as Pandita says, is of little consequence before God. He knows what they mean and overlooks their mistakes. He is also sure to answer the request of the little one, who cries to Him: "O God, nobody loves me; make them love me."

In the afternoon, Mr. Osborne and my husband addressed the inmates who assembled in the church. It was a beautiful sight, never to be forgotten.

A WIFE'S STORY.

From Pandita Ramabai's most interesting report of 1901, I reproduce one story as the girl herself tells it:—

"I do not remember when I was married, and I do not know much about my parents. But I know that I was living in my husband's house, and was not getting enough to eat. Whenever I asked for food, he used to scourge me with a thick rope, and kick me. Oh! I shudder when I remember all that I suffered. One day my husband tied my hands and legs, and beat me so severely that I was nearly dying, and there was no one near to give me a cup of cold water to drink. The next morning he said that if I remained any longer in his house, he would cut off my nose. This frightened me very much, so I left the house and became a beggar. I thank the God who brought me to this happy home. I shall never go to my husband again, for he would kill me."

What is to become of all these women who have sought shelter from cruelty? Those showing special aptitude may be admitted to the High School for Native Women at Poona, of which Ramabai's daughter, a graceful young lady, is the directress. Others are taught some industry, for the Pandita believes in industrial education, and has been trying to find the best method by which Hindu women can earn their living honestly without the necessity of leaving their homes. The fact that one-fourth of the widows saved from the last famine are in the rescue home, is a proof of the danger to which unprotected women are exposed, even in so-called respectable or gentlemen's families. Of the 300 inmates of the rescue home, some are mere children, but all are of the higher caste, having lost their character in search of bread.

THE INDUSTRIES. THE LAND.

The industries taught at Mukti are plain needlework, embroidery, oil-making, dairy work, gardening and field work, weaving, spinning, rope-making, making brooms, &c.

About 700 women between fifteen and twenty-five years of age are learning some such industry for three hours daily, while four hours are devoted to school work in the Marathi language.

The land adjoining the premises (about 140 acres) yields enough to supply the demands of the institution for two parts of the year. Four immense wells serve to irrigate it, and to supply all the water necessary. The land, or part of it, was bought just before the outbreak of the famine in 1897, with a view to supplying the High School with its necessaries. What, four years ago, was a jungle is now a flourishing estate.

A WISE WOMAN.

God who has given the Pandita a rare wisdom, has also tuned her heart to praising Him continually. Some friends thought that, as her mission was a work of faith, she ought not to send out yearly reports, but keep quiet and pray to God to send money. She very justly replies, from the Word of God: "'Let not your good be evil spoken of.' If I do not keep proper accounts of the money spent and received, I am open to the suspicion of pocketing it myself. Besides, my friends have a right to know how the work is being done, and how it prospers, that they may pray intelligently about it. While I am grateful to the kind givers, I give praise to the Lord alone" (Psa. cvii. 8, 9).

Evangelizing Anglo-Indians.

SOME Christian officials who, loving God and man, were deeply impressed by the need among our own countrymen in India, formed the Anglo-Indian Evangelization Society upwards of thirty years ago. The general secretary (Rev. P. R. Mackay, D.D.), went to India three years ago to inquire carefully into the condition of our countrymen scattered over the great peninsula, the provision made for their spiritual wants, and the exact field calling to the Anglo-Indian Evangelization Society for occupation. He travelled through Ceylon, over India, from Tuticorin to Peshawar and Quetta, and visited almost every tea district in India. Men living in isolated districts are the Society's special care.

Mr. Reginald Studd, who has been doing excellent work in India during the past year as an honorary evangelist, has just returned home, and the Society hopes soon to be able to publish a further account of his work. Within the past two years the number of the Society's agents giving their full time to work in India has increased from two to twelve; a number of other workers give part of their time. The need for agents in other parts of India is clamant, and the directors are anxious to send them. In order to maintain these already sent, an increase of nearly £500 to the annual income is required. If it be not forthcoming, the operations must be curtailed instead of increased.

His Excellency the Viceroy writes:—"The organization which you represent, and which is the sole means of bringing the ministrations of religion to many Englishmen and Scotchmen living in out-of-the-way parts, far away from chaplain or church, deserves the fullest support of churchmen and philanthropists at home." Communications may be addressed to Mr. W. Stewart Thompson, treasurer, Ivybank, Wardie Road, Edinburgh.

The Outlook in China.

By Dr. GRIFFITH JOHN.

AS I look back on the year 1901, the deepest feeling of my heart is one of thankfulness to God for the mercies and lovingkindness which crowned its months, days, and hours. The causes for thankfulness are many. Your space will allow me to mention only a few :—

(1) The restoration of peace, and the return of the Court to Peking. The Peace Protocol was signed by the plenipotentiaries of the Powers and China on September 7, and on the 7th Jan., just four months later, the Court, which includes the Emperor and the Empress Dowager, returned to its capital. There were not many among us this time last year who expected to see peace and order restored to the empire within so short a period. Some of us ventured to take a hopeful view of the situation; but we were looked upon as visionary and over-sanguine. We all rejoice to-day in the fact that the optimists have proved themselves to be the true seers, and that their forecasts of coming events has not been falsified.

THREE DECREES.

(2) The Imperial Decrees issued on Reform in Education. Three very important decrees were issued last year. The first of these was issued on August 29, commanding the abolition of Wenshang, the Chinese essay, in examinations for literary degrees, in favour of essays and articles on modern subjects, and Western laws and institutions. The abolition of Wenshang will have a most important bearing on the educational system of China, and the mental development of the Chinese. The second decree was issued September 13, commanding all existing colleges in the empire to be turned into schools and colleges of Western learning. According to this decree, every county is to have a primary school, every prefecture (of five to ten counties) is to have a secondary school, and every provincial capital is to have an advanced school or college—all for the study of Western as well as Chinese subjects. The third decree was issued about September 17, commanding the viceroys and governors to send young men of ability and promise abroad to study any branch of Western science or art best suited to their abilities and tastes, so that they may return in time to China, and place the fruit of their knowledge at the service of the Empire.

WHAT THESE MEAN.

These are remarkable decrees, and there can be no doubt of their having been issued in good faith. The Wenshang, remarkable only for its artificial and jejune style of composition, is gone, and a beginning has actually been made in the establishment of schools on the new plan. In time, schools and colleges conducted on Western methods, will cover the face of the land. In all this I see two good signs. First, it is a sign that China is no longer satisfied with her own condition. One of the greatest obstacles to all progress in the past has been China's deadly satisfaction with her own condition. Educationally, politically, socially, and religiously, it has been so.

Let me give an example of what I mean. When Viceroy Yeh, on his way from Canton to Calcutta, was asked why he took so little interest in learning the news from various parts of the world, he replied, "Why should a man who has the thirteen classics in his stomach care to learn what is going on in the world? He has already in his possession all the knowledge that is worth knowing." There you have the China of the past. Viceroy Yeh's answer is the answer that almost every official and every scholar in the empire would have given to that question fifty years ago. Such is not the China of the present. The China of the present is beginning to get dissatisfied with her condition, and in this I see a most hopeful sign.

The second sign is that China is now making an effort to bring herself into correspondence with her new environment. Hitherto China has been kicking against her environment, and she has been doing so to her own hurt. She has discovered at length that it is hard for her to kick against the pricks, and is trying, with more or less earnestness, to adapt herself to the times.

CONDITIONS OF PROSPERITY.

The life of an organism depends on correspondence with its environment; and so does the life of a nation. If China succeeds in her efforts thus to adapt herself, she may live; if not, she must die; the country will be sliced up among the Powers, and the Empire as an Empire will perish. It is my earnest prayer that she will succeed, and thus preserve her integrity, and attain to a great and influential position among the Empires of the world.

It is for us as missionaries to welcome this great educational movement, and do what we can to turn it to good account. We must also be up and doing ourselves. Let the missions see to it that their schools and colleges are up to the mark. The moral and spiritual basis of the Government schools will be Confucian; let ours be distinctly and emphatically Christian. On this point there should be no compromise.

THE MOST ANTI-FOREIGN PROVINCE.

(3) The development of the work in Central China. In the Hupeh province, the London Missionary Society is working in thirteen counties, in all of which there has been real progress during the past year. In some of them the progress has been very marked. The development of the work in Hunan has been remarkable in every way. The change in that province, once famous as the most anti-foreign and anti-Christian province in China, is simply marvellous.

In May last I was able to state, for the first time, that Hunan was actually open. I have just paid another visit to Hunan, and am able to make the same statement with additional emphasis. It is open to all Christian workers—open to the preacher and colporteur, to the evangelist and physician, to men and to women. Between twenty and thirty foreign missionaries are now living and working in Hunan. There are ladies residing in Yochou, Siangtan, Changteh, and even Changsha. Daily preaching is being carried on in these and other cities.

(To be concluded.)

Morbhanj State Mission.

MORBHANJ is a native state in Orissa (India) ruled by a Rajah. Its people number about 650,000, and belong to the Bengali, Orijas, and Aboriginal races. The Aboriginals (Santals) are a fine, sturdy race, the women being a most striking contrast to the Bengali Zenana women. They have no well-defined religion, but are adopting that of the people surrounding them. Into this state, and to this people, a Queensland lady—Miss Allanby—went some years ago, and has done excellent pioneer work—taking long tours during the winter, and often penetrating alone into the most remote parts of the state, through mountain passes, jungles (infested by wild animals), crossing shallow river beds, to give the Word of Life to these sitting in darkness. The methods have been—preaching the Word, illustrating it by lantern, distributing Gospels, and writing on the rocks some message of love.

Two years ago Councils were formed in Brisbane and Morbhanj. The Mission is interdenominational, and is carried on on faith lines. Miss Allanby has been joined in the field by Miss Dawson, and Mr. A. E. Grimes has followed recently, and is at a mission station learning the languages. Now that a gentleman has arrived on the field, a second house is needed, and for this £70 is required.

Our Soldiers' Friends.—The South Africa General Mission publishes an exceedingly interesting penny booklet, entitled "Taking the Gospel from Blockhouse to Blockhouse," which describes the labours of the Mission agents in ministering to the needs of our brave fellows in their danger and loneliness. The booklet may be obtained from the secretary, Mr. Arthur Mercer, 17, Homefield Road, Wimbledon.

"Caterpillar to Butterfly."

THE above is the simile which an Italian, Professor Tosi, of Venice, uses to express the change he has experienced in his conversion. He can find no other so brief and truthful and expressive. He says he has passed from being a carnal man to being a spiritual man, from being a man in darkness to being a man in the light, from being in a state of sin to being in a state of grace, from a condition of death to a condition of life.

Before he heard the Gospel, he only lived, he says, for bread and for pleasure, having no other aim than to obtain wealth and honour, adoring only the world and praying only to fortune. Yet he was in name a Christian—a Roman Catholic Christian. Indeed, he was accustomed, as all Italians are, to apply the name "Christian" only to Roman Catholics, and to think of all others, Evangelical Protestants, as Protestants, but not as Christians.

I do not say that there may not be converted people inside the pale, but conversion is no essential of the Roman Catholic faith. It is a sort of assurance office, guaranteeing salvation to its members in their natural state for services, generally paid for at a money rate, so that conversion is no more required for the holding of shares in this society than they are for holding shares in a railway or electric lighting company. Therefore the former state of Professor Tosi, described by himself as one of darkness, of carnal-mindedness, of sin, and of death, is quite consistent with Roman Catholic Christianity. Roman Catholicism is a creed that can accommodate itself to any condition of mind and life.

A STORY OF CONVERSION.

Professor Tosi thus records his conversion :—"Entering by chance one night into the Italian Evangelical church in Venice, I heard an elder, called Signor Fassetta, and the minister, Palermo, speak of the Lord Jesus Christ as our Divine Saviour in such a way that anyone who cared to listen could not fail to know Christ." How the words came home to him he cannot tell.

He felt the Holy Spirit's power in his heart, and that night, in his own home, on his knees, he felt himself a sinner as he had never known himself to be before; but ere he arose, the peace of Christ entered into his heart, and he had received in his breast an unquenchable hope that can only be lost in fruition in the presence of his Saviour above. Professor Tosi is a learned man, holding a literary degree, and having held a chair of literature in an Italian Lyceum. Yet God chose the words of one, the old man Fassetta, who is unlearned, who is a babe in the wisdom of the world, to bring him to know the Wisdom that cometh from above.

Converted himself, Professor Tosi is consumed with a desire to evangelise others. He is in a lawyer's office at present, working long hours, generally till midnight, for a small pay (a labouring man's in England), yet he preaches generally twice a week. And his preaching is "with demonstration of the Spirit and with power." He is gifted with great readiness of speech and with true eloquence, and, as he used to organize meetings in connection with the Peace Society, he has much power in managing an audience. What makes him preach is, as I heard him say the other evening, that which made the woman of Samaria leave her waterpots and run up the hill to her village with her message. He has found Christ.

It is a rare thing in Italy to hear a layman publicly speak at Evangelical meetings at all. It is almost a unique thing to find one so doing possessing the culture and learning (he reads his Greek Testament as easily as he reads his Italian one), the readiness of utterance and eloquence (he never uses a note), of Professor Tosi. He will never enter the ministry of any Italian Church, but he would be invaluable as an evangelist going about from place to place. As his wife is a trained singer, the Gospel could be by them both sung and preached.

Memories of a Great Artist.

THE LATE MR. T. SIDNEY COOPER, R.A.

AS we pointed out in our obituary notice, the death of Mr. T. Sidney Cooper, R.A., on January 31 last, brought to a close a life fragrant of the very presence of the Saviour, and marked by a faith which was sublime in its simplicity. His autobiography, entitled "My Life," contains much that is encouraging in the highest degree to young beginners in any and every lawful calling, difficulties and discouragements notwithstanding, amply confirming the inspired proverb, "The hand of the diligent maketh rich."

Though from his very boyhood it would appear he was not without the fear of God, it was not till he was in his eighty-sixth year that he tasted the sweetness of Divine love. To this glad hour probably belongs the following verse, which was found by his wife among his papers in his own handwriting :—

My soul in anxious fear was lost,
By faith I fell at Calvary's Cross,
My heart contrite, my soul laid bare,
Then, oh, what joy, I found peace there.

"And peace with God," adds Mrs. Cooper, "was his, uninterruptedly, till the last, through abounding grace."

Perhaps, too, it is to the same time that he was referring when he wrote, "God has brought me to a sense of how unmindful I have been of the long chain of his mercies, not one link of which has broken from childhood to old age. He has brought me to seek mercy at the foot of the Cross, where I found peace and grace which will support me for the rest of my life, in full and abiding faith in the precious blood of Him who was made sin for us and suffered in our stead. In this faith I shall continue, stayed on Him till the time comes for my departure; then I shall leave this life in the blessed assurance of a glorious immortality, when I shall see Christ as He is."

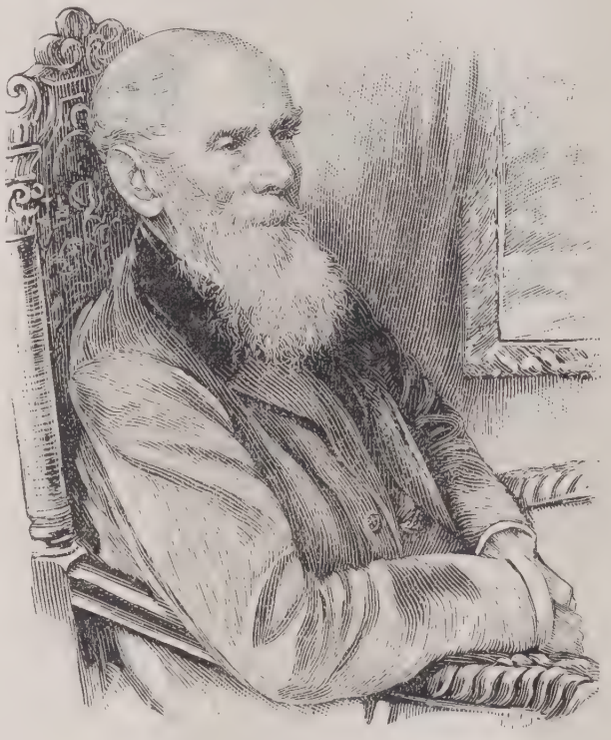
Again, "The blood of Atonement shed on Calvary is the sole means by which every black sinner, despiser, murderer, may be cleansed, and made 'whiter than snow.' The invitation now is, 'Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest,' the rest of holiness and eternal salvation. I wish that others could know what I did when the Holy Spirit first worked in my soul, showing me the need of the precious blood, the darkness of my heart, my ignorance, and sin, and nothingness. Grace passed over my heart, and repentance unto life eternal was mine. Now that I know the love of God, I have no fear, no anxiety; all is clear and open which was once hidden. The vail is rent, and God can make Himself known to all who by faith are rescued from eternal death. The joy of holiness annihilates all sorrow, and fills one with hope, and with the peace which the world can neither give nor take away. It renders the heart calm, with no fear of death.

"Nothing disturbs, not even the thought of what we once called happiness. Relying entirely upon God for every day's mercies, we have the full interest of his love, and of the sacrifice of Christ. He keeps us by Him, strengthens our faith, and has our souls in his holy keeping. Christ alone is 'the Way, the Truth, and the Life'; there is no other way to God."

"One day," writes Mrs. Cooper, "I was reading to him Heb. x., and stopping at verse 14, 'For by one offering He hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified,' I asked him what were his thoughts upon it. He replied, 'Such is the perfection of the sacrifice of Christ to God that He sees us in it, from the moment of faith in the soul, for ever. I have been thinking of the infinite distance between a holy God and a guilty sinner, but what intense delight to know that the death of Jesus has bridged the distance, and made a highway into the presence of God."

On another occasion, when very ill in bed, he said :—

As I lie here, I think of God as all-powerful and all-patient. He does not hurry any of his purposes, He "worketh all things after the counsel of his own will," and therefore it is useless to think the power of man can supersede the purposes of God. I do believe that if God blesses not the remedy offered, it is of no avail. All the little man can do, is as an atom compared with the infiniteness of God. The Great Physician Jesus Christ has the remedy for every malady. Life for the dead—hearing for the deaf—sight for the blind—above all—the power of curing the soul. He says, "Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy-laden and I will give you rest." It is only to hear the Gospel—a living faith in his atonement. It is the breath that has come from Christ. If you do not believe in Him, you frustrate the very purpose for which He shed his blood. "The peace of God," how do you know it? It has no shape—no substance; it comes over the heart without effort, and brings with it perfect light. I can only compare it to the early dew of a summer morning; there is no fear—it is all glorious. I can give it no other name than "the love of God"—there is the sweet sense that all the sins are gone—nothing but tranquility and rest.



THE LATE MR. SIDNEY COOPER, R.A.

From Photograph by Mr. E. D. Percival, 5, High Street, Ilfracombe.

Mr. Cooper was an ardent lover of the Word of God, and made the sacred Book his constant companion and delight. In a letter published in the Bible Society Monthly Reporter for May, 1899, he writes to the editor :—

You ask me what I think of the Bible. It brought me to see I was lost in sin, and had no power to save myself. It showed how I must get God's forgiveness for all my iniquity. It told me the door of mercy was open, and salvation was to be freely had. It showed me the wonderful sacrifice of Jesus Christ, and through his precious blood all my sins are washed away. "For He hath made Him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him" (2 Cor v. 21). I am thankful to say I read the Bible daily at 9, at 1, and at 10 p.m., and would recommend your readers to do the same.

Writing to a friend, he said :—

Yes, the Bible is my recreation. And when one really knows the glorious happiness to be found in the living Word, it is the sweetest recreation for those in declining years that the soul could possibly desire. The Bible and its truths form my life day by day. Here am I an old man, aged and decrepit if you like, but for years and years I can look back and say, "The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want."

Making the written Word his constant companion, it is not surprising to find that Mr. Cooper was a man of much prayer. "He often prayed," writes his wife, "for a blessing on the Gospel of God's grace preached to sinners." The following was one day transcribed as it fell from his lips. "Bless the proclamation of thy Holy Word; may it have free course to the hearts of those that hear it. May it be balm to thousands, to cure them from the malady of sin, removing all their fears by the blessed Gospel of Jesus Christ, and to the full glory of his Name, so that He may see of the travail of his soul in his great love and sacrifice for a lost world."

During a severe illness in February, 1900, he was heard praying: "O God, in thy mercy comfort me with thy love. Shed it o'er me that I may feel it sustaining me, for it is thy greatest attribute. The Scriptures say, 'God is love'; if I have thy love what can destroy me? Nothing. It is the sure foundation of eternal happiness." Speaking of prayer, "a few hours before leaving us," writes Mrs. Cooper, "he said: 'I never have allowed, and never will, my infirmities to interfere with my communion with God.'"

Referring to his last hours on earth, Mrs. Cooper writes :—

The Lord Jesus has received my beloved husband's spirit. He is "absent from the body," "present with the Lord." I am overjoyed in his joy, his every desire more than fulfilled. Who can tell the rapture that is his, or the rich compensation for every sorrow and suffering here, "to depart and be with Christ, which is far better?" A few days ago he said to me, with tears of joy and a clear triumphant voice, "Christ is cheering me. It is all clear. He is ready, and I am ready. I shall fall asleep in Him." I wondered to hear such words, for he was not seriously ill; but with delight I find they were put into his lips to comfort me. I said the two lines to him :

"Jesus, Lover of my soul,
Let me to thy bosom fly."

With tender earnestness, he said, "I am always there." When I returned to his room, after a short absence, I said, "What have you been thinking about?" He answered, "Of God and Jesus Christ, and his sacrifices, and full faith, and holiness, and righteousness, and purity." He said, "Read to me." I read 2 Cor. v. 1. I then said, "I must read the glorious resurrection chapter," little thinking it would be the last Scripture he would hear. A few more hours passed without suffering, and the victory over death was won for him "through our Lord Jesus Christ." Thus his prayer, uttered two years ago, was answered, "May I have an easy issue into thy presence above!"

These brief notes of some of the experiences and utterances of this aged believer, recall very powerfully to my own mind the confession of the great Apostle to the Gentiles (given in 1 Timothy) as he neared the finish of his blessed course: "The grace of our Lord was exceedingly abundant with faith and love, which is in Christ Jesus." "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief. Howbeit, for this cause I obtained mercy that in me first (or foremost) Jesus Christ might shew forth all (His) long-suffering, for a pattern to them which should hereafter believe in Him to life everlasting."

In graciously entrusting me with the above, Mrs. Cooper says :—

I have put down a few words uttered, or written, by my beloved husband in thankful remembrance of the grace of God given to him, and in the sure and certain hope of his being in the glory of God; for it is written, "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life."

Frank H. White.

A Seeker of Souls.

THE LATE MR. JAMES N. CARR.

THE last week of 1901 was a very sorrowful one in Carlisle; and on New Year's Day, when the funeral cortège of Mr. James N. Carr passed through streets lined by thousands of the inhabitants, a whole city mourned.

For many years past, Mr. Carr had borne unflinching testimony by word and deed to the truth of the Gospel. His influence and energies had been laid at the feet of the Lord; and he lived in the power of the words which were continually repeated by him in the delirium of the last days of his life, "Christ is all—and in all." A short time before he was so unexpectedly called away, Mr. Carr wrote in a friend's Text Book—

> This is my story, this is my song,
> Praising my Saviour all the day long.

Now he has joined the company above, and the Hallelujah note he loved to sound here is heard in full chorus there! The words which he wrote in his friend's book unfold the secret source that produced a peculiarly happy Christian life, for truly "the joy of the Lord was his strength."

His spiritual life began when a student in Edinburgh, under the ministry of Rev. Dr. Guthrie, whose powerful preaching awakened him to a sense of his sin and need. On his return from Edinburgh, he established, and continued for several years, a night school for factory girls, calling around him a staff of willing helpers.

The preaching of Gordon Forlong was the means of bringing him into full light and liberty, especially an address on "The Epistle of James," distinguishing between faith and works. After this he worked with renewed zeal, not only seeking the well-being of the girls, but earnestly striving to win their souls for the Lord Jesus.

Mr. Carr enjoyed the privilege of attending, for eight years, the ministry and teaching of the late Rev. William Reid, author of "The Blood of Jesus." He also profited greatly from Bible readings conducted by the late Mr. T. H. Hodgson, then Clerk of the Peace for Carlisle, whose hospitable home near the city was the rendezvous for seekers after truth. One chief lesson taught by Mr. Hodgson was how to handle "the sword of the Spirit," how to find an answer to questions and difficulties by comparing passage with passage.

A visit from Messrs. Moody and Sankey gave great spiritual impetus in these early days. Thus was Mr. Carr prepared for more extended usefulness, and though actively engaged in business, he did not allow this to be any hindrance to "holding forth the Word of Life" to others. This he did for many years in the North of England and Scotland, ever ready to "endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ;" and he was not ashamed to display the banner of the Cross of Christ on the racecourse and at open-air meetings.

Home Missions in neglected places had a peculiar attraction for Mr. Carr, and with tent and evangelist he conducted series of hearty services, which resulted in much blessing. In West Cumberland, especially, at Maryport and Workington, he was a welcome preacher, joining with others in meetings which crowds attended, and at which, we reverently believe, many were converted to God. His friend, Mr. D. J. Findlay, of Glasgow, writes that "It was at an open-air meeting when first I met him, on the evening of May 28, 1876, at the foot of Glen Cloy, in Arran. I was attracted to him at first sight, as he stood in the middle of the quiet road, with a crowd of simple people listening, as he told out, in his own inimitable way, the story of the Cross of Christ. He was preaching his famous sermon on 'the Blood,' and I can never forget the impression that was made on me that night. The almost twenty-six years which have passed since, have only served to deepen that impression, and increased the love which went out to him then. We have had some glorious times together in the service of the King, under many roofs and in the open air. How few have maintained, through such a series of years, a like passion for soul-winning! How terribly in earnest he was, and with what solemn awe we have sometimes seen the multitude impressed, as he reasoned with them regarding "the awful realities of eternity!"

Another friend writes:—"I shall never forget the impression which he made upon me: a man, living for one thing, full of faith and joy, bringing everything to the test of the Scriptures. His whole life was nourished and made strong by the Word of God, and he was interested in the work of God as the business of life, although devoting every day to his ordinary business."

THE LATE MR. JAMES N. CARR.

From Photograph by Mr. W. M. Harrison, Falmouth, Truro, Helston, and Redruth.

A third says:—"I was at Dunure village to-day (seven miles from Ayr), at the annual New Year's conference. I made some reference to the 'passing' of Mr. Carr, and a stalwart young fisherman stood up to testify that he was converted when Mr. Carr preached there some years ago. He and others would ever bless the day of Mr. Carr's visit."

Many such words might be quoted from similar letters.

Invited by the late Mr. John Colville, M.P., to preach from time to time at Motherwell and neighbourhood, a friendship was formed, based upon the fact that, though not set apart specially for the ministry of God's Word, yet they were nevertheless responsible, if called of Him, to make known the blessed Gospel of his grace. In this, their loved employ, the sudden call from earth to heaven found them separated by a few months only.

On Sunday evening, December 15, Mr. Carr preached in a neighbouring mission-room for the last time. The following day he could not leave his house, for acute erysipelas had begun, and in less than a fortnight, on December 28, 1901, he fell asleep in Jesus. The last text he was heard to quote before his death was "Christ is all, and in all."

Mr. Carr was twice married; in each case he and his wife were "heirs together of the grace of life," one in heart and one in purpose; in his home-life Christ was all, and in all. Soon after his conversion he set apart one room in his house as a depôt for Gospel books and papers, which he distributed in great quantities, of late years supplying parcels of this kind of literature to all applicants who made known their wants through The Christian.

Mr. Moody's Bible.

IN an article contributed a few weeks ago to the New York Observer, Mrs. George C. Stebbins recalls many interesting incidents regarding the Bibles used and annotated by Mr. Moody, from which we quote the following:—

"How could one man in a lifetime fill twenty Bibles with such rich thoughts, may well be asked? First of all, from his own reading and observation. For in spite of Mr. Moody's unceasing energy and capacity for work, greater than any person we ever met, he was a student of books; not that he read copiously, but carefully, and if he found a book that met his longing, craving spirit, for more light upon God's Word, such as John MacNeil's 'Spirit-Filled Life,' he would read and re-read, 'sitting up late at night,' as he said he did, to study and transfer portions of it to the margin of his Bible. Every choice bit from religious or daily papers was cut out, or put upon the back of an old envelope or piece of paper for future copying. The writer has often, when with him in evangelistic work, culled from papers and magazines telling anecdotes, scraps of poetry, and gems of prose, and given them to him for his use.

"Mr. Moody gleaned from all gardens, and 'never laid claim to originality,' but was eager to give wings to any fresh truth, whatever its source. He made free use in his sermons of quotations from others, giving proper credit when he knew the authors; but these pithy sayings were, after a few repetitions, accredited to him, for many of his audience never even heard the author's name, so absorbed were they with the force of the illustration."

Our Homes for Jesus.

2 Sam. vi. 11.

It fell to Obed-edom
To shield the Ark of God,
And favours vast descended,
Upon his blest abode.
Man's failure bore it thither,
Just there to rest awhile,
And Obed-edom's household,
Enjoyed Jehovah's smile.
And why should not our households,
A covert make for God?
'Tis with the lowly, contrite,
He chooses his abode.
Around the humble dwelling,
Where his blest will hath sway,
The light of glory shineth,
With pure and heavenly ray.
Come, then, Jehovah-Jesus,
Come, make our homes thine own,
Thy peace upon us breathing,
To be for Thee alone.
Pervade our family circles,
With ove divine and free,
From them to flow a savor,
That e'er shall tell of Thee.

"Our Daily Bread."

SUNDAY, April 6. Exodus xxi.

THE Government of Israel was a pure theocracy, and in these chapters the Divine King and Judge lays down the principles on which He desired the people to be governed. It is interesting to see that God did not ask his people to step up to the level of the Sermon on the Mount. In this chapter He admits the existence of customs which are foreign to a Christian people—the plurality of wives (v. 10), the permission of slavery, the permission of the retaliation of injury, all of which have been swept away before Christian civilization.

What a beautiful illustration is given in the opening verses, of that deeper experience of God's Household, which we get as the years pass. At first we come to Him urged by the great famine which has arisen, causing us to be in want, and driving us to safety; but as we know Him better, we abandon that relation for another. We stay because we love Him for Himself, and desire to be nailed to the cross with Jesus, never to go forth free again.

Note how careful God is of human life. There was to be no sanctuary for the murderer (14). The honour of the parent and the sanctity of home were to be carefully safeguarded (15, 17). A tender care was thrown about the person of the servant or slave (16, 20, 26, 27). Men were taught that they were guilty, not only when they did positive harm, but when they were criminally careless (33, 34). Would not this principle keep us from leaving money or drink about, which might become a temptation?

MONDAY, April 7. Exodus xxii.

We must be careful not to avenge ourselves; even if we catch a thief in the act, we have no right to take his life, except in self-defence. We ought to be tender of the lives even of men (3). Let us take heed of beginning strife by the sparks of hot temper. We never know how much fuel a little fire may kindle. We are accountable, not only for the wrong we try to do, but for that which is the result of our carelessness (6). We ought to be as careful of that which belongs to another as if it were our own (10, 11). We should always desire to lose ourselves, than that another should lose by us. It was a proper spirit that made the young prophet cry out, "Alas, master, for it was borrowed!"—the fact of it being borrowed made him the more grieved that the axe-head was lost (14, 15). This applies to borrowed books!

Young women should consult their parents before becoming engaged to be married, and if parents are wise, they will put no arbitrary hindrance in their daughter's way. So long as a man's character is good, the less said about his money-status, so long as there is a sufficiency, the better (16, 17). The stranger, the widow and fatherless, the lonely and defenceless, were not to be oppressed. Their weakness constituted a claim for loving care, else their oppressor would have to reckon with God Himself (23, 24).

There must be no extortion. I do not for a moment suppose that this law forbids the acceptance of a moderate amount of interest on capital invested in legitimate business undertakings, but it does forbid our taking advantage of those who are hard pressed by misfortune, and extorting from their necessities an extravagant percentage (26, 27).

Oh, to remember always those two sentences: "When he crieth, I will hear, for I am gracious;" and "Ye shall be holy men unto Me." They are a noble couplet!

TUESDAY, April 8. Exodus xxiii.

Christian people need to be warned against raising false reports. Slandering, backbiting, and imputing evil motives, are a species of false witness, only the testimony is given before the bar of public opinion rather than in a law-court. The margin reads, thou shalt not receive a false report. The receiver is as bad as the thief. If we would not listen, many a tale would never be set on foot. Slanders are often made to order. The judge must not be swayed by popular feeling, nor seek to gain popularity by favouring unrighteously even the poor. Equally careful must he be not to pander to the rich. Let us stand carefully aloof from all association with evil (7) and show the love of God to all who are sad and lonely (9).

As the sixth day manna served also for the seventh day, so the sixth year's produce was to serve for two years of subsistence; and thus a curb was put on the insatiate greed of getting; and the nation was taught that time for rest, recreation, family reunion, and religion should enter into every man's life (10-12). It were well if those who are accustomed to swear by the names of heathen deities would remember the caution of verse 13. Let us remember that we are to carry the spirit of the feast with its joyousness into our religious life (14, &c.).

Israel was to bring the first fruits into the House of God; and the juxtaposition of this command with the prohibition against seething the kid in its mother's milk reminds us that this is the true way of securing the blessing of God on all our work, because after treating a kid thus, the heathen used to sprinkle their gardens with the milk with the hope of making them fruitful—a custom which was abhorrent to the holy God.

The Angel of vv. 20-23 was surely Christ. He goes before us still. Only let us give heed to vv. 21-24. To the people of God as an angel (20), to his foes as a swarm of hornets (28).

WEDNESDAY, April 9. Exodus xxiv.

The solemn ratification of the covenant between God and his people was effected by the sprinkling of blood on the people and the book which contained its provisions. They were very confident as to their ability to obey. Oh, that there had been such a heart in them! So the Lord Jesus, the Mediator of the New Covenant, having offered Himself to God, sprinkled his blood before God, and sprinkled it also upon his people; hence it is called the blood of sprinkling that speaketh better things than that of Abel (see also Heb. ix. 12).

There are different degrees of nearness to God; that occupied by the people at the foot of the mount; that occupied by the elders, who did not see any corporeal manifestation, but a most rich and splendid pavement, made, so to speak, of sapphires, like the blue of heaven; that occupied by Joshua; and the highest place by Moses, who went up into the mount, where God was. The elders were glad to eat and drink, but Moses fasted forty days and forty nights (see v. 11, and chap. xxxiv. 28).

For six days Moses stood waiting on the mountain for a call into the Divine Presence-chamber (16); but how could he, without some such interval of preparation, have been able to enter the presence of the Holy God, before whom angels veil their faces? It would be well if, in our daily prayers, and our entrance on public worship, we could set apart a certain time of preparation for fellowship with the Most High.

THURSDAY, April 10. Exodus xxv.

The materials for the Tabernacle were to be given willingly from the heart. Other nations contributed the taxes which their kings imposed for the keeping-up of their royal state, but Israel was to give to its King as their hearts prompted. God's dealings with us are not of law, but of love, and we must serve Him because we are constrained by love.

The possibility of the people making such contributions as are enumerated here, shows that they had attained to considerable wealth and luxury in Egypt. Much, too, had been given on the night of the exodus. Many rich jewels must have been stripped from the bodies of the Egyptians that were cast up on the shores of the Red Sea. The skins and spices could have been purchased from the caravans which travelled between Arabia and Egypt. God asks for nothing which we do not possess; but He has an intimate knowledge of our belongings, and requires his share in it—love's share.

The pattern which was shown on the Mount must have been "the heavenly things themselves" (Heb. viii. 5), and included a knowledge of the Person and Work of Christ, who gives body and substance to all the metaphorical teaching of the ancient ritual (Col. ii. 17). May we not think that, as a vision of the tabernacle stood before the eyes of the Lawgiver, God led him from one point to another, explaining the significance of each impalpable but beautiful emblem? He will do the like for us, giving us the pattern of our lives, and asking us to repeat it in the lower levels of the plain.

The Ark, with its golden border, or cornice, and cherubim, its golden rings, and its golden mercy-seat, or propitiatory, stands for the covenant ratified by the blood of Jesus, or, better still, for fellowship with God through Him (Rom. iii. 25; Gal. iii. 10, 13). The Shew-bread is a symbol of what we should be to God, that his Spirit may feed on our obedience and devotion in Christ, and be satisfied. The Lamp tells of the clustered influence of our godly testimony. We are light in the Lord, shining amid a sinful generation.

FRIDAY, April 11. Exodus xxvi.

The Tabernacle, as its name implies, was a great movable tent. When the camp moved, the royal tent moved with it. Indeed, the direction of the march was indicated by the movement of the Shekinah cloud, which hung over it, as the drapery of a banner over a modern palace.

It was needful that the coverings should be beautiful and weatherproof. The inner curtain was a splendid piece of tapestry, embroidered with cherubic figures in various colours of blue, purple, and scarlet wool (Heb. ix. 19), upon a white ground. Tho cunning work was that of a damask weaver. The ten curtains were coupled together and thrown across the upright boards of the Tabernacle.

Over these were curtains of goat's hair, which, being more in number, extended lower on every side, concealing the richer curtains and protecting them from the weather. Over these again were curtains of badger skins. It is thought that these animals were seals, from the neighbouring shores of the Red Sea. In any case, the curtains would have the quality and serve the purpose of tarpaulin. The sides of the Tabernacle were boards of acacia wood, covered with gold, standing on silver sockets. The ark was to the west, while the door faced the east, that the worshippers might be compelled to turn their backs on the sun, the worship of which was the snare of all the nations. If God took so much care of the construction of his Tabernacle, are we not taught that there is nothing, however trivial, in our worship or life, which is not noticed by Him, and may not be done to Him?

SATURDAY, April 12. Exodus xxvii.

We have now reached the outer court. The great brazen altar, 3yds square and 1½yds in height, probably contained closely packed sand to give it consistency. It represented the supreme act of Calvary; and the claim which God has on us all, to present ourselves a living sacrifice to Himself.

The height of the enclosing court was half the height of the Tabernacle, and was composed of curtains of woven network, so that the people could see through. The curtains were supported on sixty brazen pillars, which stood on pedestals of the same metal, but the capitals and hooks were of silver. In this court of 175ft in length and 87ft in breadth, great congregations assembled for prayer and praise. The "tabernacle of the congregation" is rendered in the R.V. "the tent of meeting," because the people there met with God.

The burning of the lamps in the Tabernacle was a matter of very specific direction, because they set forth the never-failing testimony which we are called on to present to a benighted world. See xxx. 7, 8, where the dressing in the morning is distinguished from the lighting of the evening. Let us see to it, that we are ever supplied with new grace in our hearts, so that our testimony may be bright and clear (John xv. 4).

Converts from Romanism.

By Rev. JAMES WELLS, D.D.

I HAVE had the pleasure of welcoming to the Lord's table several very interesting people who had been born and bred in the Church of Rome. My experiences with them have persuaded me that many Roman Catholics in our country are in great perplexity about the teachings of their Church, and that they might be won to the apostolic faith. I shall give

TWO ILLUSTRATIVE CASES.

Not very long ago, a girl came to me for spiritual guidance. She had been educated and boarded in a Roman Catholic school. "All we got from the Bible," she said, "was a chapter which Sister Mary read to us every Saturday night. It had something to do with the Sunday services. I wondered that there was nothing in it about the Pope, the Virgin, the priests, the saints, or penance. I noticed that the things the priest explained to us were not mentioned in the Bible. I always expected that Sister Mary would come to them, but she never did. I then began to think that there were two religions in our school—one for Saturday night, and one for Sunday. I also began to think that there was a great difference between these two religions. These thoughts filled me with terror. I believed that they were temptations of the devil. I prayed to the Virgin to put them away, and I vowed to her that if she did so I would try to convert some one." She began with a young woman who knew her New Testament well, and the would-be proselytizer soon became an intelligent convert. She now rejoices in the simplicity and liberty of the Gospel.

THE CHARM OF PRAYER.

Another of my Roman Catholic friends came from the west of Ireland, and was employed on a farm near Edinburgh. He was then incredibly ignorant and prejudiced. His master must have belonged to the salt of the earth. At least, Mick soon came to the conclusion that the holy father, the Pope, was not a better Christian than his master. The farmer's daughter—"an illigant lady," he called her—taught him to read, got him a Douay Bible, and encouraged him to study it. He wondered why no priest had ever done that. It was a new thing for him to receive such consideration. By-and-bye he began to attend family worship, and was charmed with the farmer's prayers. He had never heard anything like them. At last he came to Glasgow, and found a Christian employer, who at his request introduced him to me.

Mick confessed his faith to me in some such words as these: "I'm after thinking that if the Lord Jesus takes us in hand for the soul's salvation, He won't need the priest, and the Virgin, and the rest of them, and all their manœuvrings, to help Him out with the work. I am thinking that He is well able to do the whole business Himself. The Lord Jesus Christ is priest enough for me."

He was in the infirmary for some time. His Romanist ward-fellows discovered that he was a convert, and taunted him with being a Judas and a turn-coat. He replied, as the chaplain told me, "Sure, but it is the best turn my coat ever got yet: it was wrong side out before, and it's right side out now."

ONLY KEPT BY FEAR.

Two other converted Romanists—both men—came with Mick to the Lord's Table. One of them told me that since his boyhood he had been haunted with doubts about the teachings of Rome; that he had smothered and resisted his doubts in vain; that many Romanists were in the same state as himself; and that they were tied to their Church by a single thread, which was often only the fear of one another.

On all the roads from Rome we may expect to find two finger-posts—the Bible, and the consistent lives of earnest Protestants.—Missionary Record of the United Free Church of Scotland.

A Light in a Dark Place.

THE past year has been rich in material extension, in increasing numbers, in wider public service at the Robert Browning Settlement, Walworth, S.E. The long-desired club-house and coffee-tavern have been built, and the Michael Faraday Home has been inaugurated. Almost every branch of the many-sided religious and philanthropic agencies shows an increased membership; "but," says the recently issued annual report, "none of these things, gratefully though they be recorded, can compare with the riches of the fellowship which has glorified the year. It has been a fellowship alike of service and affection, running out along many channels of human helpfulness, but, above all and within all, a fellowship of the Spirit."

FOR THE AGED POOR.

One of the most interesting of the philanthropic undertakings of the Settlement is the "Home for Old Folks." At first the premises were designed and employed as an occasional home of rest and change. Happy Saturday afternoons were spent in the summer time by the Brigade boys and the cripples, while several weeks of sunny relaxation were enjoyed by older visitors. It was decided by the Council, with the full approval of the donor (Miss Faraday), that the house would be put to more complete and continuous use as a Home for the Aged Poor. "But at least one of the rooms shall be available as a place of call for parties of boys and others visiting the neighbouring parks from Walworth;" and another room is set apart for use by Settlement workers, or for cases of emergency. Occupants must have a weekly income of not less than 4s., and not more than 7s.; in case of couples, a joint income for the two of not less than 6s., and not more than 11s. Each occupant has a room rent free, with free medical attendance when required, and coal.

Both the P.S.A. for men, and the Pleasant Tuesday afternoon for women, have steadily grown in popularity, while a notable feature of the Men's Adult School was a series of talks on "Old Testament Prophecy." Prizes were given by Mr. Arnold Pye Smith for the best essays on the subject.

Of the Medical Mission Dr. Richards writes:—"The work grows as the Mission becomes more widely known; but the statistics show an apparent falling off, owing to the necessity of limiting the number of patients while the Settlement premises were in the hands of the drainage contractors. There were seen altogether 1,611 individual patients; attendances at the dispensary totalled 4,417; home visits, 1,879.

"A deaconess, Miss Alexander, from the Christian Instruction Society, has been welcomed by the patients, and has been blessed of God in their visitation. She also took charge of the Wednesday evening service during the long vacation; so that this service has been continued through the year."

THE PEOPLE'S EVENING.

There are "fluctuations in the numbers present at the Sunday evening service, but not so great as formerly. The body of regular attendants is growing, who do not come for the adventitious attractions that may be announced. The religious interest has palpably deepened." The Cripples' Parlour continues to grow; "at the weekly meeting an hour and a half is spent in work, in play, and in Christian teaching." The Settlement Band has done good service in the open-air evangelism, and for the "children's happy hour" on Sunday evenings, the Clayton Hall, accommodating some 250 young folks, is crowded.

Under the earnest direction of the Warden, Rev. F. Herbert Stead, and his devoted wife and helpers, the Settlement (York Street, Walworth), although somewhat "broad" in some respects, undoubtedly exercises a refining Christian influence, and accomplishes a vast amount of good in "the most densely-crowded Parliamentary Division, having a population of 230 to the acre."

Soldiers and Sailors at Home.

THE twenty-fifth annual report of the "Welcome" Soldiers' and Seamen's Homes and Institutes is a striking testimony to the need which exists at our ports for aggressive Christian work as well as philanthropic effort. At each of the shipping centres—Chatham, Sheerness, and Gravesend—the "Welcomes" have more than justified their inauguration. The object ever to the front in the conduct of the Homes has been the promotion of the highest welfare of soldiers, marines, and seamen, without distinction of sect. The fact that to the Wesleyan Church has fallen the privilege of providing the funds and management of the institution is never allowed to appear.

The reports of the chaplain and of the Scripture reader, as well as the evident appreciation of the men, leave no doubt in the minds of the committee that the religious influence of the Chatham Home tells for good, and is in every way helpful to the men. Meetings for praise and prayer, for study of God's Word and Divine service, are held with regularity, though of course the attendance fluctuates owing to the exigencies of service. The usual routine efforts of a social and philanthropic order have been carried on faithfully and successfully. The mothers' meeting, the savings' bank, the Christmas club, the library, the pleasant evening, the lantern lectures, have, each and all, been well and rightly used.

The ordinary business of the refreshment bar, the letting of beds and baths, the care for parcels and bags, has reached the high-water mark. That this should have been so says much for the value given for the money, for the cleanliness, comfort, and civility accorded to all. The wear and tear of premises and furniture is very heavy, the strain upon the staff severe. Probably 250,000 men use the home for one purpose or another during the twelve months. One needful, yet oftentimes thankless task, that falls to the lot of the manager, is the taking charge of cash or valuables for men. During the months of November and December over £1,000 was thus taken in for the night, and returned without charge in the morning. This has grown to such an extent that arrangements have been made for organizing it more carefully.

At Sheerness and Gravesend there has been a considerable falling off in the income, although this has been, to a large extent, met by reduction in the expenditure. Arrangements have now been made which promise to secure the desired results at both centres.

Copies of the report may be had from the general secretary, Rev. James Fletcher, "The Welcome," Chatham.

North London Homes for the Blind.

IT is now twenty-one years since Rev. H. and Mrs. Bright opened the North London Homes for Aged Christian Blind Men and Women. At the present time there are 101 in the Institution. The majority of those received had outlived all their relatives, were friendless, and in all probability would have ended their days in the workhouse. The Homes have maintained a distinctly Evangelical and undenominational character, and no destitute and deserving applicant has sought shelter in vain whenever there has been a vacancy.

A branch for younger blind women, whose painful and exceptional circumstances disqualify them for admission into other institutions, serves a useful purpose, inasmuch as it bridges over the space between the ages of twenty-five and fifty years, at which time they become eligible for the parent home. Thanks to the kindness of friends, a large number of inmates—men and women—are sent down each year to Southend, much to the advantage of their health. It is gratifying to know that the work is commending itself to the sympathy of so wide a circle of friends, who are realizing the privilege of ministering to the comforts of this afflicted class. The address of the superintendents is Mansion House, Hanley Road, N.

About "Knowing Too Much."

LAST week I noticed on a large placard at a railway station this curious question: "Should Parents obey their Children?" Perhaps some of you will think, "Yes, I wish they would!" and you imagine all sorts of ways in which it would be very nice if your parents would obey you, and do everything you want them to do.

But, if they did, you would find it would not make you happy for very long, because you would be sure to ask for some foolish things, and the doctor would have to be sent for within a week! You may be sure your parents know best what is good for you, and it is often kinder for them to say "No" than "Yes" to your requests.

There is a proverb which says, "A little knowledge is a dangerous thing," which you will understand from the following little story. Once upon a time, a family of squirrels lived in a tree near an old farmhouse. The farmer and his wife had a dear little girl, about six years old, who was very fond of a big Newfoundland dog, with which she used to romp and play. The young squirrels watched them from their leafy home, and would often talk to their old father and mother about them.

One day they came skipping along a bough in great excitement, saying, "Oh, mother, we have seen such a dreadful thing. The farmer who seemed such a nice, kind man is a horrid, cruel old wretch! His little girl came running up to him in the farmyard, as if she was going to kiss him, and he pulled out his knife and cut a piece of flesh out of her arm! and oh, the blood was dreadful, and the sight of it made us shiver all over. Her mother carried her indoors, and then the cruel man picked up a great heavy stick, and killed the beautiful dog. What a bad, dreadful man he is!"

But the mother squirrel had also seen what had taken place, and after quieting their excitement, she said, "Ah, my dears, you think you know a great deal, but you do not know all, and presently I am sure you will alter your opinion about the farmer. That beautiful dog had gone mad, and bit the poor little girl, and the poison from that bite would spread all through her body until she died raving mad. But by cutting out that piece of flesh, he hoped to prevent the poison spreading any further, and thus to save her life. And as the dog was mad, it would have bitten other people too; so, to prevent that, he killed it. So you see that what you thought was so cruel, was really the best and kindest thing he could have done."

You may be sure the little squirrels felt very foolish when they found that their "little knowledge" had led them to make such a great mistake; and if they could have spoken in human language, I expect they would have run over to the farm every morning to ask how the little invalid was.

Therefore do not try to be too "knowing," but make up your mind that older people know more than you, and that it is wiser for you to learn from your parents, than to think you ought to teach them.

And if among my older "young people" who read this column, there are some who think that God does not always treat his children kindly, let them withhold their judgment until they know more. Perhaps some of you are crippled or ill, or have friends whose life seems hard. Some day God will explain it all.

Not now, but in the coming years,
It may be in the better land,
We'll know the meaning of our tears,
And there, sometime, we'll understand.

If you stand a penholder in a glass of water, so that part of it is in the water and part is not, it will look bent and crooked. But if you could put it all in the water, you would see it is as straight as when it is in the air.

God's purposes are devised in heaven and carried out on earth, and sometimes they seem crooked to us. But when we see them in the light of heaven by-and-by, they will then appear perfectly straight, and we shall understand what Jesus meant when He said to Peter, "What I do, thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter."

Blind unbelief is sure to err,
And scan his work in vain;
God is his own Interpreter,
And He will make it plain.

Uncle Tom.

The Little Maid.

The stately Syrian courts she trod,
A lowly captive maid;
And witnessed for her father's God,
Serene and unafraid.
She watched her warrior master go,
By leprosy defiled,
And pity, such as angels know,
Inspired the lowly child.

She softly said, "Would God my lord
Would on the prophet call,
For he would heal him." And the word
Swept through the palace hall;
It startled monarchs fierce and proud—
No power to save had they—
Till Naaman's haughty will was bowed,
The prophet to obey.

Seven times he bathed in Jordan's wave,
His flesh came clean and whole,
With blessings on the humble slave
His chariots homeward roll.
We know not if he set her free
With gifts of lordly grace,
Or took her home again to see
Her parents, face to face.

But we believe, through joy or woe,
God led her fearless feet,
And taught her faithful heart to show
Forgiveness full and sweet.
And, some day, in his courts above,
Where love is all repaid,
It may be we shall know and love
The little captive maid!

An Interesting Story of a good work among the children and girl-widows of India will be found on page 14. Parents will, I am sure, be glad to read it to their young people, with a little explanation as to the conditions of child-widowhood in that far-off land.

Dublin Medical Mission.—Mrs. E. E. Figgis desires us to explain that although, as stated in our last issue, she has resigned her position as honorary secretary, she remains associated with the mission, and is "still on the committee, and in the thick of the fight," in which her interest is unabated.

Theatrical Employees at Tea.—Through the renewed kindness of Sir George and Lady Williams, the twenty-second annual gathering took place in the Shoreditch Town Hall on Good Friday afternoon. In the absence of Sir George, the meeting was presided over by Mr. J. H. Lydall. About 800 persons were present. Among those who took part in the proceedings were:—Rev. J. Watts-Ditchfield, vicar of St. James the Less, Victoria Park; Rev. T. C. Udall, Miss J. W. Berry, Messrs. T. C. Chadwick, E. Vandepeer, and H. Ehrlich, for forty years manager of the Pavilion services, Whitechapel. The addresses were of a soundly evangelistic character. The Religious Tract Society again gratuitously provided a volume for each person attending, and the Flower Mission a bouquet. The meeting was arranged by the Special Religious Services Committee, 3, Bridewell Place, E.C.

Growing in Grace (2 Peter iii. 1-11).

IT is remarkable that St. Peter places the Apostles on a level with the holy Prophets. It is an evident proof that the Old and New Testaments are bound in one volume by no arbitrary caprice, but in pursuance of the thought of the Divine heart. He who aforetimes spoke by the holy Prophets, in the latter days has spoken through the Apostles, and they that give heed to one should attentively study the other.

The Apostle's desire in writing these Epistles was that his converts might grow in the grace and knowledge of our Lord and Saviour (v. 18). This is in a line with the thought of chap. i. 5. There are some Christians who resemble those distorted bodies which we sometimes meet with, which never advance beyond the appearance of infancy, though years may have passed since they were born. They read the same books, utter the same confessions, pray in almost identical phrasecology as they were wont to do when you knew them in the first stage of the Christian life. They have not grown. There is no greater likeness to Christ, no widening sphere of Christian service, no deeper knowledge of the Bible. The stunted growth of the body is due sometimes to a sudden fall and shock; at other times to the use of narcotics, to the constant breathing of foul air, to insufficient food; and these conditions produce similar results in the spiritual world.

If you desire to grow, be careful as to the food you assimilate. "Desire the sincere milk of the Word, that ye may grow thereby" (1 Pet. ii. 2). See that you breathe plenty of God's heavenly atmosphere, full of oxygen and ozone; in other words, let there be much prayer, for in prayer we breathe the life of God Himself. Above all, keep ever before you the necessity of abiding union with the Lord Jesus, through the Holy Spirit. Speaking the truth in love, grow up unto all things, in Him who is the Head, even Christ. Each member of the body is fitly framed and knit together through that which every joint supplieth, and it is through the joints of our union with our fellow-Christians that the Son of God is able to pour that nutrition, that supply of his own life, which shall increase within us as the sap of the root increases and swells in the bud.

If you want to grow, do not think about growth. That little child is healthiest which feeds and sleeps and takes exercise, without constantly looking in upon itself or measuring its weekly stature. Do not compare yourself with yourself by morbid introspection, but look out to Jesus, reaching towards Him; exercise yourself in all that is good; stretch out towards the things that are before. If God puts an extra strain upon you, spring up to bear it. If He sets a higher climb, thank Him for the opportunity, and at all costs press upward. Let your heart be at peace. Just as the young people of the upper classes of the present day are growing into such fine proportions because the lawn tennis, the bicycle, the new faith in fresh air, and good brown bread, are having so large an effect, so the children of the Kingdom will grow in proportion as they obey the conditions of spiritual health.

The chapter which ends with the Apostle's injunction to grow, begins with the reiteration of the belief of the early Church in the immediate coming of our Lord; scoffers in those days, as in these, alleging the ordinary course of natural law as a reason against the advent; and the Apostle reminds all such that already there has been an interference in the ordinary course of nature, that the Flood once destroyed the world, and therefore it is not unreasonable to suppose that fire might destroy it again. The Apostle also combats the idea that the Lord is slack. He says that the time is young yet. Since "a thousand years are as one day," it was only the morning of yesterday that saw our Lord's incarnation, death, and resurrection. It may seem long to us, but to measure by the standard of eternity, it is short. If there is delay, it is to give longer time for repentance.

The hope of the second advent has always greatly quickened the life of the Church, and one of the conditions of growth is to look for and hasten it.

C.E. NOTES.

The seventh annual convention of the London Council of Christian Endeavour was held at the Metropolitan Tabernacle on Good Friday. Juniors to the number of 3,000 gathered in the morning for a service, entitled "The Garden of Life," illustrating the growth and development of a child's character. Rev. A. C. Chambers conducted, and about sixty juniors, from seven London Unions, took part. Great quantities of spring flowers were brought, and afterwards distributed to the children's wards in London hospitals.

For the later meetings the immense building was again filled to its utmost capacity. In the afternoon, Rev. H. J. Tresidder presided, and addresses were given by Mr. H. Harmsworth on "The Prayer Meeting;" Miss M. Jennie Street, on "Sunshine Work;" Rev. Albert Swift, on "Look-out Work;" and Rev. D. H. Moore, on "Temperance." Rev. W. Justin Evans presided in the evening, taking as his subject, "The Utmost for the Highest." Other addresses were given by Rev. Richard Richard, on "Discipleship;" Rev. James Mursell, on "Obedience;" and Rev. J. W. Ewing, M.A., B.D., on "Enthusiasm."

News has been received of eight C.E. Societies, with a membership of 700, amongst the prisoners at Diytalans, Ceylon. They meet every Wednesday afternoon, and tell of many helpful times. Once a month a collection is made, the proceeds being devoted to supplying the aged and penniless members with stationery and postage.

International S.S. Lesson.

Sunday, April 13, 1902.

Subject—"Peter, Æneas, Dorcas" (Acts ix. 32-43).
Golden Text—Act ix. 34.

"THEN had the churches rest." Calm after storm. They had not "stretched out their hands unto God" in vain; "the mighty One" had stilled the raging of the sea. How?

(1) By turning the heart of Saul the ringleader to Himself, letting him witness at Jerusalem, then sending him "home" to Tarsus for a while.

(2) By casting trouble into the midst of the oppressors. History tells us "that the Jews had their attention drawn from the Christians (A.D. 40) by an attempt made by the Emperor Caligula to place a statue of himself in the Temple at Jerusalem, a purpose which was strenuously and successfully opposed by them." This "rest" gave the Apostles an opportunity for mission tours among the scattered infant churches. A tour of this kind by Peter is the subject of our present lesson, and has a special importance as leading up to Peter's reception of the first Gentiles into the Christian Church. "Peter had got half-way to Cornelius and the Gentiles when he lodged with a tanner" (a trade abominated by the Jews).

Peter. Was content to hide himself in the shadow of his Lord (v. 34). No word of self (Acts iii. 12; iv. 9, 10). Always ready for his Master's work (v. 39).

Æneas. Sin in the soul, paralysis toward God. Jesus Christ alone can cure the soul (1 John i. 7). "Jesus of Nazareth passeth by" (Luke xviii. 37). Free. "Now is the accepted time"; only time we are sure of.

Dorcas (1) (beautiful), and she beautified other lives by her comfort and help.

(2) "A lovely character," for her heart was full of love to God and her neighbour (Luke x. 27). Works which God calls good can come only through love to Him. Compare "dead works" (Heb. ix. 14).

(3) There was no palsy about Dorcas, spiritual or physical. Habits of industry, gained when she was a little girl, doubtless; and a spirit so full of love that there was no room for self. "A heart at leisure from itself to soothe and sympathise"; and "a work of lowly love to do for the Lord on whom I wait."

(4) Dorcas, by her loving heart and faithful service, according to her powers, filled as important a place in the Church as Peter with his forceful will, or Paul with his powerful intellect. Like Job, she made the widow's heart to sing (Job xxix. 13). A tiny stone in the building of the Temple was as much needed and as useful as the largest block there (1 Kings vi. 7).

"WHAT IS THAT IN THY HAND?"

Only a needle! But Dorcas gained immortal fame by that commonplace thing, and she was only a woman, a humble follower of the Lord, perhaps only a sewing-woman; not brilliant, or accomplished, but she could sew. Heart, hands, and needle were consecrated to her Saviour, and used for Him. "She hath done what she could" (Mark xiv. 8). "Now then, do it" (2 Sam. iii. 18); "do it, for there is no respect of persons with God" (2 Chron. xix. 7).

(5) Dorcas died. We, too—when? (Rom. ix. 27); then (Eccles. xii. 7); therefore (Eccles. ix. 10).

(6) Her memory was blessed. She was missed. Heart sorrow at her death; no paid wailers there. Her name has been handed down these nineteen hundred years—"Dorcas Societies" (Eccles. vii. 1).

(7) Dorcas rose again. We, too, shall "rise again," awakened by "the trump of God" (1 Thess. iv. 14-17). Who will rejoice when you and I rise from the dead?

"Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord . . . their works do follow them" (Rev. xiv. 13). Work while it is called to-day, "the night cometh when no man can work" (John ix. 4).

"Only one life, 'twill soon be past;
Only what's done for Jesus will last."

Our "Christian Endeavour" Cable.

By Rev. A. W. Bean, Glasgow.

LET us suppose we are visiting an electrical factory where ocean cables are made; say, the famous "Siemens" factory, named after Dr. Werner von Siemens, electrical inventor and head of the cable factory at Woolwich. We are standing in the central street of the great factory just before the entrance to one of the workshops. You observe those large coils of copper wire; they are to be the conductors in the cable.

1. Copper is the best available material for conducting the electric current, but it must be good copper. Only in proportion to its purity is it favourable to the passage of the current. Each hank of copper wire, which lies ready to trip you up, is carefully tested for resistance before it is set aside to go into the cable; and a piece which shows less than 98 per cent. of the required standard is rejected.

PURITY OF MEMBERSHIP.

In our C.E. cable, the first essential is purity of membership. Anything short of this, any admixture, means failure. Our members are and must ever be Christian young men and women. God works through pure channels. If we are to be conductors of spiritual power we must be clean in heart and hand and tongue; if we are to influence in the highest sense the religious, political, educational, commercial and social life of our day and generation, we must be converted men and women; our righteousness must exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees; it must be the "righteousness which is of God by faith." Only genuine spiritual life will endure God's test. The world's standard will not do. God requires a pure conducting medium. "Ye must be born again."

II. But although the wire shows the required conductivity, it is not ready to go at once under seas. A single wire would be snapped. To make it stronger, therefore, it is spun into a rope; say, twelve hanks are by means of a spinning machine twisted into one rope of copper wire. This is called the "core." If by chance one strand is broken, the usefulness of the whole is not impaired. Indeed, ten of them may be broken at one place, and all of them at different places without conductivity being destroyed.

WELDING TOGETHER.

So when Jesus wanted to communicate to the world the power of the glorious Gospel, He chose a company of twelve men who, welded together in the unity of the Spirit, carried far and wide the saving and sanctifying influences of the cross. Where there was a break in Peter it was covered by Paul; where there was a break in Paul it was covered by James; where there was a break in James it was covered by John. The defects in one are covered by the excellences in another, and so the conductivity does not suffer.

And is not the Christian Endeavour Society bound together for the strength and sympathy that lie in unity? Our interests, are they not mutual? Our hearts, are they not inspired by one motive? It is true that most of us, like the strands of copper wire, have a break somewhere, and divided we should certainly fail, but united we shall cover one another's weak places, and thus present a continuity of holy influences which time will not impair nor death destroy.

III. Admirable, however, as is the conducting copper rope, it would be utterly useless under water; for, although electricity will travel fast enough in copper, it will not stay there if it can find a way out. "Electricity a good workman!" exclaimed an irritated telegraph manager in London, "Why, it takes a battery of seventy cells to work the land-line between Land's End and London, just because the current is always watching for a chance to waltz down the pole and skip home again." And in water matters are much worse. Accordingly, to keep the electricity in the copper rope, it is the business of the maker to insulate it; that is, he packs round it a substance which offers great resistance to the passage of electricity. Thick sheets of gutta-percha are packed round the copper rope so firmly and so smoothly that not an air-bubble can remain between the conductor and the insulator. This must be done with special care at the joining of the strands in the cable. Strips of gutta-percha are wound round the core and worked and moulded by fingers that are both delicately sensitive and scrupulously clean. Should a grain of dust, or an air-bubble, or a speck of moisture remain within the insulator, it would give trouble later. The least imperfection in jointing may cause future expense of thousands of pounds and untold inconvenience to business, besides loss of credit to the makers.

INSULARITY NECESSARY.

If the "Endeavour" Society is to be a conductor of the Divine electricity there must be insulation. Purity of membership is not enough; unity is not enough. The power of God committed to us is intended to be transmitted through us; but this result will not be attained except the power be concentrated by insulation. We must be narrow in order to be efficient. The Active Members' Pledge tightly bound about our hearts forms an excellent insulating band, conserving the power in its proper channel, and protecting it from promiscuous diffusion. Some Christians do not like rules and restrictions. What is the result? Their experiences are indefinite, their energies are squandered. Where there is no healthy discipline such as the pledge enforces, there will be dissipation of energy. Worldliness and frivolity, an evil temper or a degrading habit, neglect of Bible study and prayer, are common leaks by which power escapes and influence is lost. An electrician knows exactly how much electricity he pours in, and he expects it to do so much work. By means of the galvanometer he can detect whether there is any leak or flaw in the cable by which electricity is escaping. And God justly expects that the grace which He infuses into us will not be "bestowed in vain," but that in concentrated essence it will flow through us to convert, transform, renew, and inspire.

IV. The "core" is now finished, but as it stands it is in no wise fitted to meet the shocks that await it at the bottom of the sea. It must be protected against the chafing of sand and rocks and possible wrenching of anchors. This protection lies in a sheathing of steel wires separated from the soft gutta-percha by a packing of jute, and spun round and round the conducting core. In some seas the cable has enemies in the shape of molluscs, which sometimes wriggle their way in between the steel wires of the most tightly-wrapped core and eat away jute and gutta-percha until only a wire-skeleton is left.

DANGER FROM WITHOUT.

The C.E. cable is preserved from every corresponding danger by the consistency of our profession and the stedfastness of our integrity. Many are the foes ready to prey upon the core of our "Endeavour" life, and to mar our usefulness, but we are encased in the sheath of truth and righteousness, and the love of God beyond the reach of malice and destruction. By abiding in Christ we are preserved intact from every worming inroad of temptation and corroding care and other element which wars against the soul. By keeping ourselves in the love of God we defy the "miserable little molluscs" which would otherwise consume the vitals of our spiritual power.

Now your cable is prepared for its plunge beneath the ocean. No more is needed; only connection with the batteries; only the electricity to fly along the wire. With a splendid organization and well-appointed committees, what more is required? Only that the Divine electricity should flow through each member, only the essential connection with the unseen batteries, the life hid with Christ in God. The loud workers are not necessarily achieving most. The movement of the Spirit-filled life may be as noiseless and unobtrusive as the subtle transmission of the electric fluid. God reads the galvanometer. "The righteous and their works are in the hand of God."

From Mr. Henry Varley.

SINCE I wrote last I have found time greatly absorbed in work; at Boston, New York, Brooklyn, Providence, Hartford, Trenton, Atlanta, and Worcester, not to speak of Mount Hermon, and Northfield. My journeyings represent already at least 5,000 miles. Snowstorms, blizzards, and keen frosts have abounded, while more recently, floods of rain, rapid thaws, swollen rivers, with many bridges and houses carried away, tell that spring hastens from the sunny south.

Among much that is interesting, the Conference at Atlanta, Ga., has prominence. Our esteemed brother, Rev. Len Broughton, whom many of your readers will remember at Keswick in July last, convened the meetings. He invited specially Revs. Campbell Morgan, A. C. Dixon, Geo. Needham (now in glory), W. J. Erdman, and myself. We have had a time of blessing indeed. Scores of ministers were present, and three sessions daily saw anywhere from 4,000 to 6,000 present. Atlanta is about 1,100 miles south, and the people are more responsive than in Mass. or New England. The week passed all too quickly. Our friend Campbell Morgan gave a valuable series of addresses on Prayer. Indeed, it may be said that the Word of God from all the brethren was with power and evident acceptance and blessing.

It was a great contrast to come away from the southern genial weather, and the thousands of warm hearts in Atlanta, to find Hartford, Conn., deep with snow and pouring rain, so that a mere handful of people came to the morning service at one of the Baptist churches. The afternoon, however, saw cessation of rain, and we had a fine meeting of men at the Opera House in connection with the Y.M.C.A. A large number told of blessing received, whilst some confessed Christ.

At night the Fourth Congregational Church was crowded to the doors to listen to selections from Gounod's sacred music. The pastor, however, at the close, introduced the English visitor, and as the strains of the large and cultured choir ceased with "Behold the Lamb of God," I took up the divine parable, and sought to exalt Him whom John the Baptist heralded to the thousands on the banks of the Jordan. On the Monday night I lectured on "God's Settling Days: or the Briton and Boer in South Africa weighed in the Balances."

The next morning, Tuesday, I was present, and took the service, brief and cheery, at the Hartford High School. This is a magnificent building and one of the finest in the U.S. Well nigh 1,000 of the students and scholars were present. From this service we hastened to the Hartford Theological and Missionary College. Here also I had the joy of addressing the students (all of whom are preparing for work in the foreign missionary field) upon some of the personal qualifications essential to real success in ministerial and missionary fields.

As I write, I proceed to Worcester, Mass., for a ten-days' mission. Many friends in all parts of the world express anxiety to hear of us, and I thus avail myself of your highly-valued journal to make known to them that we are well, and still permitted the great honour of our Lord's exalted service. My throat and chest are now strong and well. Winter in Northfield and the States suits us well.

East Northfield, Mass. HENRY VARLEY.

Discarded Wearing Apparel.

AN earnest appeal is addressed to our lady readers on behalf of the many foreign governesses, and others, who daily apply for employment to the Continental office of the Young Women's Christian Association.

A number of these, from illness and other causes, have exhausted all their slender resources; and, not having suitable clothing, are compelled to refuse good situations, for which they are well qualified. It would be a very great relief if some kind friends would send a supply of discarded wearing apparel for such sad cases. There is nothing belonging to a lady's wardrobe which could not be utilised, and the secretary will gratefully acknowledge any parcels which may be entrusted to her for distribution, at the Continental Office, Y.W.C.A., 26, George Street, Hanover Square, W.

Mildmay Conference—1902.

MAY 27, 28, 29.

INVITATION.

THE trustees of the Conference Hall, in the invitation just issued to meetings for the consideration of "Things touching the King," say:—

You will notice an alteration in the date of the meetings, which have usually been held in the last week of June. The choice of that time for the ceremonies connected with the Coronation of King Edward VII.—upon whom may God's best blessings rest abundantly—has led us to convene our Conference a month earlier than formerly—viz., in the closing week of the month of May. Peace in South Africa, for which much earnest prayer has ascended since our last annual gathering, is still denied us; but before we assemble in Conference may we not hope that that great boon will be granted, and that the contending peoples may have rest from war?

The chosen subject is a large one and many sided, and should bring us face to face with Him who is mightier by far than the kings of the earth; it should take us back to the Covenants of God which are immoveable as the great mountains, and forward to the sure accomplishment of promises which become all the more precious as the fear of God and the love of Christ appear to be diminishing in our land?

The hope of his Appearing and his Kingdom is full of consolation. Let not that hope grow dim. And in proportion as the restraints upon evil doing are loosened, and the attraction to worldliness is intensified, let believers remember their place of refuge before one common mercy seat, and close their ranks for conflict with the great enemy of God and man, assured of ultimate victory.

DIVISIONS OF THE SUBJECT.

THE KING.

"The kings of the earth set themselves . . . Yet have I set My King . . ." (Psa. ii. 2, 6).

Tuesday, May 27.

THE KING—PREDICTED.

"As I have thought, so shall it come to pass; and as I have purposed, so shall it stand" (Isa. xiv. 24).

The Son of Man. Heir of dominion in the earth.
The Son of Abraham. Heir of the land.
The Son of David. Heir of the throne.
The Son of God. Heir of all things.

"We see not yet all things put under Him" (Heb. ii. 8).

Wednesday, May 28.

THE KING—REJECTED.

"Shalt Thou indeed reign over us? or shalt Thou indeed have dominion over us?" (Gen. xxxvii. 8).

"Who made Thee a prince and a judge over us?" (Ex. ii. 14).

"We will not have this man to reign over us" (Luke xix. 14).

The Son of Man. Despised and rejected.
The Son of Abraham. Rejected on that account.
The Son of David. Acknowledged and rejected as such.
The Son of God. Acknowledged and rejected as such.

"From henceforth expecting" (Heb. x. 13).

Thursday, May 29.

THE KING—CROWNED.

"Bow the knee" (Gen. xli. 43).

And Joseph's brethren came "and bowed themselved to him to the earth" (Gen. xliii. 26; xliv. 14; l. 18-20).

"This Moses whom they refused . . . . the same did God send to be a ruler and a deliverer" (Acts vii. 35; Ex. xviii. 8, 13, 16, 20).

"Unto me every knee shall bow" (Isa. xlv. 23).

The Son of Man. Dominion exercised.
The Son of Abraham. The land possessed.
The Son of David. The throne occupied.
The Son of God. All things inherited.

"The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ: and He shall reign for ever and ever" (Rev. xi. 15).

Physiological Effects of Alcohol.—Professor Carl Binz, the well-known pharmacologist of the University of Bonn, has recently summarized the physiological effects of alcohol. His conclusions are important:—"The conviction must be expressed that a healthy and well-nourished individual has not the slightest necessity for alcohol at any time or in any form, and that the practice of drinking strong alcoholic liquors cannot be too strongly condemned."

The Eleventh Hour.

By Rev. A. EVILL, Mayfield, Staffordshire.

And about the eleventh hour he (the householder) went out, and found others standing idle, and saith unto them, "Why stand ye here all the day idle?" They say unto him, "Because no man hath hired us." He saith unto them, "Go ye also into the vineyard" (Matt. xx. 6, 7).

"THERE is forgiveness at the eleventh hour," is a common saying. And in saying this, people mean that mercy may be received by the dying after a whole life spent in wilful neglect of God's service.

It is a foolish and fatal wresting of the Scripture.

What took place at the eleventh hour?

1. It was a call to labour: "Go ye into the vineyard." It was not a showing of mercy, a granting of forgiveness, but a requirement of service. How can such be made when death is near, when both mind and body are disabled by sickness or old age, and no work of any kind can possibly be done? In the case of any one dying, a call to go and work must be made in vain: the Lord would not require service when there is no time or thought or strength left to render it. But that is what He describes Himself as doing at the eleventh hour.

2. The eleventh hour is a long while before death. Divide a man's life into twelve parts, as a day into twelve hours. In the case of one dying when he is sixty years old, his eleventh hour would be when he is fifty-five. It would be six or seven years before his death, if he lived to be seventy-two or eighty-four. It is a great mistake to regard the eleventh hour as the end of a man's lifetime. Those who were then called afterwards laboured in the vineyard for a twelfth part of the day. That would represent work done for the Lord during several years before the close of life.

3. Those who were called at the eleventh hour had not been called before. This is expressly stated. They were "others" who were then called; and when that question was put to them, "Why stand ye here all the day idle?" their reply was, "Because no man hath hired us." They had a very good reason to give for not having gone to work earlier. They had had no offer, no opportunity. It was not their fault that they had been standing idle so long; they were not at all to blame. At no time had there been any refusal on their part, any disobedience, any delay. They obeyed the first call they received; immediately when they were called, they went and worked. Clearly their case does not at all represent that of persons living in a Christian land, who have been taught God's truth from their childhood, who have had the gospel of his grace made known to them, or the means of knowing it within their reach, all their life long, and yet given no heed to it to obey it. Such the Lord has been calling again and again, oftentimes, continually, and they have refused, turned away their ear, hardened their heart, would not be ruled by his word. How great is the sin of this! What guilt is incurred by this wilful repeated disobedience to the voice of God, this persistent refusal to obey it! The labourers in the parable called at the eleventh hour were not chargeable with this, not in the least. But this is the sin of all to whom Christ is preached, and who yet serve Him not. Have we any reason to think that men may go on doing this, and yet be saved at the last? None whatever, none. This parable gives not the slightest encouragement to hope for mercy after lifelong resistance of the word and Spirit of God.

Another Scripture commonly wrested in like manner so as to encourage a false hope, is the record of the thief dying on the cross, who then called upon the Lord and was saved.

1. In his case again it is only a likely thing that never before until he was dying had he had any opportunity of being saved. Probably then for the first time he was brought near to the Saviour, had the offer of his mercy and grace, and then he turned to Him. So far as we know, the Saviour's call to repentance had never been made to him before, and there had not been, at any time on his part, refusal, disobedience to the Lord's voice, wilful continuance in sin against his light and love. It may well be that he was not guilty of this, that he sought to be saved when first he could be, turned to the Lord immediately without any delay when first he met with Him, and saw and heard Him. It cannot be inferred from his case that mercy may be shown at the last to any who have had the salvation of Christ brought to them and neglected it, who have long known it and put it from them, who have been called by his gospel repeatedly and refused to obey.

2. Moreover, the saving of that penitent thief at the last is the one only instance known to us. It does not follow that any others should be saved in the same way. Many things have happened once which we do not expect will happen again, which would greatly surprise us if they did. It was a miracle of grace the Lord wrought on that man's behalf, an extraordinary exceptional putting forth of his power. He Himself was then being crucified through weakness, submitting to be delivered into the hands of the devil and wicked men, to have his heel bruised by the serpent; yet even then He showed Himself mighty to save that man dying by his side. But what the Lord can do it is not always his will and way to do. His saving of one man once in the hour of death is not reason enough for thinking He will save others in like manner. It is not a question of what the Lord is able to do, but of what He is pleased to do, the rule, the usual method, of his working. And certainly his will, as revealed to us in his word, his way commonly in dealing with men, is that they who seek Him early shall find Him, and that they who go on resisting his Spirit, and continue in the sin which his Spirit strives to turn them from, shall at last be given over to a reprobate mind.

Scottish Notes.

THE estimated cost of the Livingstonia Residence and Dispensary in connection with the Edinburgh Medical Missionary Society is £4,000, of which sum £3,000 is already in hand.

At the opening of the present winter session eighteen men and six women were enrolled as students under the auspices of the Edinburgh Medical Missionary Society, of whom England and Wales sent eight, Scotland six, Ireland three, while the remainder represent such widely separated countries as New Zealand, Canada, Germany, Switzerland, and Turkey.

Presiding recently at a meeting of the West Coast Mission, Rev. Dr. James Black emphasized the unsectarian nature of the work. The need is as great as ever, the agents ministering to the spiritual wants of people in remote localities, many of whom are so far from church that they can very seldom attend. The balance-sheet was favourable, a balance remaining of £568 12s. 1d. Addresses were given by Rev. Thomas Pryde and Treasurer Murray.

A recent and successful development of the work of reclamation at the Scottish Labour Colony is the emigration of suitable and selected colonists to the agricultural districts of Canada. This is a means of removing the men from their former surroundings, where they would only renew acquaintance with temptation. Last year the Colony was the means of sending out eight men, all of whom secured work on landing, and write grateful letters. Presently at least six men are anxiously waiting their chance of getting out. The cost per head (including a little in hand for any emergency) is £8. The superintendent is Mr. J. Albinson, Ruthwell, Dumfries-shire.

Personalia.

Mr. Charles Inglis has returned to England on the termination of his evangelistic tour in the United States.

Fanny J. Crosby.—Mr. Sankey writes on March 24: "We gave Fanny J. Crosby a party to-day, on her 82nd birthday. She is as bright and as well as ever."

Rev. Thomas Spurgeon is progressing favourably towards recovery, but will not be well enough to resume his pulpit next Sunday. Rev. John McNeill is to preach in his stead at 11.0 and 6.30.

Count Campello, a correspondent informs us, has had a second stroke of paralysis. His health was such that it was deemed advisable that he should have complete rest, as far as possible. He has, however, only retired from the more active part of the work, as his heart is too much in it for him to do otherwise.

The Christian Temperance Campaign.

ALLOA, TILLICOULTRY, AND ALVA.

THE meetings conducted in Alloa, by Dr. J. Q. A. Henry, which were referred to in our last week's issue, are described by a prominent worker as "the most remarkable gathering the town has known." No fewer than twenty-two adult pledges were taken in the three evening meetings.

On March 24, Dr. Henry gave an address to the working classes, in which he showed the beneficial effect of temperance legislation in America. At the closing meeting, on the following day, Dr. Henry gave a lecture on "The Future of the Anglo-Saxon Race." He spoke for nearly an hour and a half, and from first to last he riveted the attention of the large audience, his inspiring utterances carrying conviction at every point. He dealt forcibly with the evils arising from the drink traffic, and made a powerful plea for total abstinence.

Rev. R. Mackenzie followed with words of appreciation regarding the mission. "Those of us who have had the privilege of listening to Dr. Henry have never heard, I am sure, a more eloquent, more argumentative, and more powerful address on the subject of temperance." An esteemed correspondent writes:—"Great interest has been aroused, and aggressive work will certainly be undertaken. The local committee is meeting to decide on further steps."

Pursuing the campaign Dr. Henry proceeded to Tillicoultry, where, on March 26, he delivered a stirring address in the Popular Institute to a large audience, when the arguments and appeals of the speaker again proved fruitful in securing pledges. Dr. Henry held his audience spellbound for over an hour. At the close 164, chiefly adults, took the pledge. Had there been time to arrange a children's meeting the results in figures would have been more striking. As it was, no more remarkable Gospel Demonstration has been held in the town. All the local ministers and a choir cordially co-operated. Rev. William Galletly, who kindly forwards these particulars, adds: "There was no time for elaborate arrangements, and it was feared the attendances would be disappointing. Our fears, however, proved groundless. As the oldest minister in the town I had the honour of presiding. It was an occasion never to be forgotten. No one present had ever heard or even imagined such impassioned eloquence. The community has a considerable acquaintance with the usual temperance arguments; but it appeared as if all was new under the spell of Dr. Henry's vehement, vivid, and conclusive speech. I am persuaded that all the churches will know and show for many a day the influence of Dr. Henry's visit."

Next came Alva, where, in the Town Hall, Dr Henry spoke to a crowded gathering on Thursday last. Dr. Cunningham presided, and Dr. Henry gave an eloquent address, in which he contended that the churches must lead the way in temperance reform, and that until they take the question in hand the drink problem can never be solved. Pledge forms were subsequently signed by 128 adults, making, with forty-two pledges secured at a children's meeting held in the afternoon, a total of 170.

FUTURE MEETINGS.

April 3, Macclesfield; 4-6, Redhill, Surrey; 8, Helensburgh; 9-11, Rutherglen; 12-18, Dumbarton; 19-25, Airdrie; May 17, Manchester (Christian Endeavour Convention); 18-23, Dr. Barnardo's "Edinburgh Castle," Limehouse, E.; 28, Mildmay Conference Hall, 11 a.m.; 31-June 6, Belfast; 8, Sheffield; 10, Maryport.

Industrial Missions Aid Society.—The latest development in the operations of the Industrial Missions Aid Society is the opening of a depôt at Gipsy Hill, S.E. To this centre missionaries all over the world who have native work to sell are invited to send goods for exhibition and direct sale to the customer, the prices being so arranged as not to enter into unfair competition with the ordinary trade. The enterprise is a practical means of assisting missionaries to provide occupation for converts who have lost their employment on embracing Christianity.

The Famine in India.

"THE famine in Gujarat," writes Mr. R. S. McCann, from Ankleshwar, "will be more severe than it was two years ago. The rainfall was only a little over a half the usual amount, yet crops would have been fairly good, but for the rats. There is a terrible scourge of rats here; they are destroying everything—cotton, tul, castor beans, jowari, &c. This is especially true in reference to the Rai Pipla State."

A worker among the Santals writes: "Our rice crops go to feed our orphans, so that the failure of the crop consequent on the absence of rain, is a heavy loss. As for the ryots, thousands are simply ruined. Already there are severe famine prices in the bazaar. The beauties of the Santal hills are the oil seed crops, mustard, &c.; millions of flowers scent the air, and the hills, covered with the blossoms, present a lovely appearance, but this year the crops are wanting. It must be remembered that a ryot's income is his crop, and if it fails a year's income is lost, while the rent and expenses remain the same."

CATERPILLARS, LOCUSTS, AND RATS.

Mr. Alfred Taylor, of the Friends' Foreign Mission Association, who has recently returned from India on furlough, writes as follows:—"It is announced that there are now upwards of 300,000 people on the relief works in Western India, and that the numbers are daily increasing. There can be no doubt, therefore, that the districts that suffered so terribly in the recent famine are, most of them, face to face with further bitter trouble. A rainfall less than half the normal, in many parts amounting, indeed, to three or four inches only, has not been sufficient to insure a supply of water for the coming hot months, and some reservoirs are already dry. In many places the crops could not ripen; in others they sprung up, only to be devoured by caterpillars, which, in their turn, were followed by myriads of locusts that destroyed everything green in the fields. And now, for the last three months, hordes of rats have taken possession of the crops that have reached maturity and have carried the grain to their holes in the ground. I understand that many of the poor people are digging out the rat holes to obtain possession of the little hordes there stored. In spite of the fact that Government offers rewards for the destruction of the rats, it would seem that many fear to take their lives, not only on account of the prevailing antipathy to taking life in any form, but also because it is thought by many of the people that these rats contain the spirits of the victims of the recent famine.

FAMINE CONDITIONS.

"In the large towns, owing to railway connection with more highly favoured, if distant districts, the price of grain has not as yet risen very high; but in places off the line, as in parts of Kaltinawar and Rajputana, famine conditions have been officially declared. The poor house at Ahmedabad is rapidly filling up; the 200 inmates of a few months ago have become 800! It was my privilege to see over several poor-houses and relief works in these districts when famine was at its worst in 1900. One of the missions alone has 1,600 orphans in its charge, and in view of the condition of things all have to consider their responsibilities towards the famine-stricken people about them. In taking charge of the orphans or in opening free kitchens and in many other ways the missions may, if liberally supported from home, again assist the Government in the work of famine relief."

Secretaries' Prayer Union.—Rev. F. Horace Newton (secretary of the Baptist Building Fund) was at the March monthly meeting of this Union elected as its president for the ensuing year in succession to Mr. H. Bristow Wallen (National Refuges for Homeless Children). The meetings are held at Exeter Hall, and are designed to promote fellowship and spiritual aid to officers of missionary societies, charities, &c., whose centres of operations are in London. The secretary of the Prayer Union is Mr. G. Wilson McCree, of the Midnight Meeting Movement.

Sunday in an American Prison.

A LARGE amount of Christian work goes on amongst the convicts in American prisons. I deem it one of the greatest privileges in connection with my American work to be permitted to go into almost any prison between the Atlantic and Pacific Coast to preach the Gospel, and to be heartily welcomed by the devoted band of chaplains who work amongst these convicts.

A few Sunday mornings ago it was my privilege to visit two of these prisons, and to preach the Gospel to these men; and some of the touching scenes I witnessed will hardly be effaced from my memory. The clock was striking 8.30 when we passed through the great iron gate, and found ourselves, as it were, in another world. Tier after tier of prison cells were passed, nearly all of which were empty, for the men had already been marched off into the prison church. Reaching the place of meeting, we found probably some 800 convicts seated, many of whom recognized us from a former visit we had paid. Before us were all classes of men, some of them well educated, some once high up in the commercial world, while on others you could readily see the stamp of jail life.

One will hardly ever forget the hymns they sang and the heartiness with which they did it. The address of about forty-five minutes' duration was listened to with the greatest interest; seldom have I preached to a more attentive and appreciative audience. As we reminded them of Sunday School days, and of mothers who were praying for them, perhaps at that hour, many eyes were dimmed with tears, and one could see that the Spirit of God was moving upon the audience. At the close of the service a great desire was manifested that we might visit them again.

In the other prison we found a number of cells, known as Murderers' Row; nearly every cell was occupied. At the close of our meeting we invited any men who wished to be saved to come on to the gallery and speak with us. A goodly number came forward, and the band of Christians who accompanied me to the prison were engaged until the hour of closing in pointing these anxious ones to the Lord Jesus Christ, and we believe that quite a number really trusted Christ. One man said, "I have not yet got my sentence, but I fully expect that I may get fourteen years' imprisonment; but even if I do, I shall thank God that I was ever brought into this prison to hear about the Lord Jesus Christ."

I am sure all the readers of The Christian will unite in asking that the devoted band of Christian men and women in this country, who are visiting and preaching in these prisons from time to time, may be greatly used and encouraged in their work. Charles Inglis.

Welsh Notes.

THE Ministers' Union of the Welsh Baptists of the Rhondda Valley are endeavouring to secure greater efficiency in Sunday-School teachers. To that end they have arranged for the giving of model lessons.

The work of the Welsh Congregationalist Temperance Society is meeting with a large measure of encouragement. Temperance committees have been established in connection with the majority of the District Associations of the denomination.

The Bishop of St. David's, while approving of the basis of the Church of England Temperance Society, lately announced that he had become a total abstainer. This accession to the ranks of active and whole-hearted temperance workers will be a matter of rejoicing in the Principality.

The Executive Committee of the Young People's Christian Union of Wales have decided to hold an annual examination in "The History and Principles of Nonconformity." They have also arranged to hold the annual meetings of the Union at Llandrindod on August 12, 13 and 14 of this year.

A movement is on foot to establish a "Chair" in Brecon Theological College in memory of John Penry, the Welsh martyr. Besides serving as a memorial of one of the heroes of the faith, the addition to the staff of the college will meet the requirements of the Welsh University Board.

The interesting fact has been made public that in the Calvinistic Methodist Sunday School at Talybont, Cardiganshire, there is a class whose teacher is ninety-three years of age. Another member of the class is ninety-one, two others are aged eighty-four and eighty respectively, another is fifty-seven. The aggregate of their years is 407.

The report of the University College Settlement at Cardiff is, on the whole, a cheering one. The "University House" has been established in one of the most needy parts of the town. Boys' and girls' clubs have been formed, and are in a flourishing condition. Meetings of various kinds are also held for adults.

The Bishop of St. Asaph, speaking at a temperance meeting at Colwyn Bay, declared that, although opposed to disestablishment and disendowment, he would prefer these rather than that the Church of England should in any way support or be connected with "the Trade." His Lordship further said that he had come to believe in the good results of the Welsh Sunday Closing Act, and expressed his readiness to take charge in the House of Lords of Mr. Herbert Roberts' Bill amending that Act.

The other day a specially valuable address on the "Welsh Pulpit" was delivered at Cardiff by Rev. E. Rees (Dyfed). His remarks will possess greater interest for some, it may be, when they know that the speaker is the greatest of living Welsh poets. In Dyfed's opinion the three great powers of Wales are the Eisteddfod, the Sunday School, and the Pulpit. He also declared that the Welsh pulpit was in advance of that of any other country in the world. It was more loyal to truth, and possessed preachers of greater ability and power. He rejoiced also that it still holds fast the truth in all its aspects, and declared it unflinchingly. Never had there been men richer in talent and learning occupying the Welsh pulpit than now. Possibly there is less fire, but still the fact remains that the pulpit in Wales is the most potent of all influences in the country.

Local Option in Boston, U.S.A.—An effort is being made by the temperance people of Boston to extend the Local Option principle so that it shall include the right of each ward to decide whether or not saloons shall be placed within its precincts. This will enable a district in which the temperance sentiment predominates to refuse to permit of a licence being granted within its borders. Under the present system a ward in which a large majority vote in favour of "no licence" is cast is yet compelled to endure its quota of licensed saloons.

About Books.

An attractive little volume of evangelistic readings, profusely illustrated, is Religion for the Heart. (1s. Religious Tract Society.)

In The Church the Children Built (6d. Oliphant) Miss Isabella C. Blackwood introduces us to an interesting and lovable family of boys and girls.

The Oxford Hebrew and English Lexicon to the Old Testament, the latest part of which was noticed in a recent issue, is published by Mr. Henry Frowde. (2s. 6d. each part).

Mr. R. Culley has issued a handy little book entitled The Twentieth Century Book of Dialogues, humorous and otherwise, suitable for Sunday school and public meetings. (1s.)

Addressing "young men and upper form boys," Mr. H. G. Groser, in a booklet entitled, A Call to Arms (6d. Andrew Melrose), shows that the summons to the Christian warfare is urgent and clear.

For the benefit of the United Kingdom Beneficent Association, Miss Emily Underwood has brought together—in An Angelico Angel (1s. James Clarke & Co.)—three very touching and charmingly-told stories of the lot of "the poor lady."

Rev. John Pyper's striking Gospel Temperance sermon, Jesus Christ, a Total Abstainer, is now in its seventh edition. The discourse abounds in convincing arguments. (1d. Ideal Publishing Union.)

Consumption and Other Lung Diseases: Successful Treatment by George Thomas Congreve. An entirely new edition of this book, edited and rewritten by J. Alexander Brown, has just appeared. (6d. Elliot Stock.)

The lesson of the sub-title, to "trust and fear not," is clearly taught in The Rajah's Gift. (1s. A. H. Stockwell.) The story is an attractive and readable illustration of the truth that God is faithful to his promises.

The four girls who are introduced to us in Me First (1s. Marshall Brothers), by Florence A. Markham, have each an instructive lesson for their sisters, calculated to clear away difficulties regarding the claims of Christ.

The National Union of Women Workers (59, Berners Street, W.) send out their Annual Report (6d.), Tract No. 5—Girls' Clubs (2d.), and No. 9—Rural Housing (2d.), each of which is a storehouse of information affecting the movement.

Canon Christopher has written an eminently thoughtful and practical booklet—Unity Through Love. The writer's exposition of the theme is devout and vigorous, the work of a Spirit-taught mind and heart. (1d. each, 5s. per 100. C. J. Thynne).

The short papers gathered under the title Strange Voices, by C. H. Perry (2s. 6d. A. H. Stockwell), show, in an interesting fashion, how spiritual lessons may be drawn from the most familiar natural phenomena and the common objects of everyday life.

The dangers of a wrong attitude to, and use of, wealth are portrayed in striking colours by Mr. W. C. Metcalfe in Fetters of Gold. (2s. 6d. A. H. Stockwell.) The story is pleasantly written, with true evangelical tone, and will make friends for itself.

The real nature of the issue at stake is well brought out in Christian Science and the Word of God, by Rev. John A. Harris, Stretford, Manchester. (1s. 6d. doz. Of the Author.) The booklet gives in parallel columns the words of Scripture and teaching of Mrs. Eddy.

A thoughtful pamphlet on prophecy is A Brief Outline of Coming Events from the Present Period to the End of Time, as Set Forth in the Prophetic Scriptures. (3d. Carter, 13, Paternoster Row). The authorship is indicated simply by the letters "F. G. B."

Words of Counsel to Young Converts, by Julia Ashford, will be found to be a timely booklet for placing in the hands of young believers needing help and instruction in the cultivation of their spiritual life. (10d. per doz. The Author, 19, Marine Parade, Lowestoft.)

Miss Ada R. Habershon has added materially to the value of her Bible study, The Priests and Levites a Type of the Church, by inserting an appendix dealing with many aspects of the priesthood from the spiritual side. A helpful summary of the events of the forty years in the wilderness is given to elucidate that period. The old edition must have made many friends for the new. 1s. 6d. Holness.)

Mr. Edwin A. Pratt's latest work will appeal particularly to young men. Under the title, Notable Masters of Men, the writer has sketched the careers of leaders who figure prominently in the business world. Again and again he is able to show that circumstances and conditions do not ultimately affect individual progress, and that lowly birth is no barrier either to knowledge or to the leading of a successful and useful life. (3s. 6d. Melrose.)

Messrs. Jarrold have reprinted Henrietta S. Streatfeild's touching story, "Little Nell," in their shilling series, changing the title to For Nell's Sake. It tells in simple fashion how the grace of God manifested in an invalid child wrought wonderful change among friends and relatives.

Biblical Types, or the New Testament in the Old, by the late William H. Webb (of Purley, Surrey), is a useful little book. Rev. R. R. Rensker, vicar of Purley, writes an introduction. The pages well deserve the attention of Bible students. (9d. nett. Roffey Clark, Croydon.)

In the opening issue of The Word and the Work (Germantown, Phila., Pa.), Rev. Dr. L. W. Munhall has brought together much of the most recent intelligence regarding the present position of Biblical criticism. Dr. Erdman's Introduction to Bible Study promises to be most useful to teachers of Bible-classes.

By the use of colloquial framework and style, in Country Walks and Temperance Talks (1s. Ideal Publishing Union), Rev. Dr. Dawson Burns has given freshness and interest to some topics which have to be kept continually before our minds, while at the same time supplying fresh food for thought and reasons for action.

The Story of Joseph, by J. R. Miller, D.D. (2s. 6d. Hodder & Stoughton.) The author's desire has been "to find and interpret some of the lessons in life which the narrative has for its earnest readers." This desire is admirably realized. The ornamented page and chaste binding indicate the book as specially suited for presentation.

There has been a small library of books about the Saxon king whose millenary was celebrated last year; but for the large body of general readers it would be difficult to find a more interesting narrative than The Story of Alfred and His Times, by M. Douglas. (1s. 6d. Nelson.) There are illustrations, and also a map of Old England.

Freshness and vigorous thought are eminently the characteristics of Rev. Joseph Pearce's small volume of sermons—The Alabaster Box. The author writes with true spiritual insight, and a familiarity with human life in all its phases. Significant truths are handled in a befitting manner, and Scriptural difficulties are ably expounded. (2s. 6d. Stockwell.)

Mr. William Hall has shown himself to be a verse writer of considerable merit. His new volume, Renunciation, is marked by spiritual perception and devotional feeling. There are inequalities, but much of the work attains a high level of thought and expression. Mr. Hall's poems are sound expositions of Scripture truth. (2s. 6d. net. Swan Sonnenschein & Co.)

Though written in the interests of international peace, Life versus Life (6s. Stock), by Albert Wardham, has no special reference to the conflict in South Africa, having been planned and commenced long before. The story is, however, an interesting presentation of the evils of war from some points of view, contrasted with the claims of the King of kings.

Art Thou Weary? Sacred Song by W. H. Jude. Considerable interest has been aroused by the singing of this piece by the Fisk Jubilee Singers. The setting is admirably adapted for expressive singing by trained voices, and is suited alike for church services and the home circle. Mr. Jude has also issued some "anniversary" settings to well-known hymns, alike popular and attractive. (Reid Bros., 17, Castle Street, Berners Street, W.)

Addressing Christian workers generally, George J. Kelly shows in The Divine Idea of Preaching (2s. A. H. Stockwell) that the perfect pattern in this as in every department of life is to be found in Christ Himself. He specially pleads for the note of wooing and entreaty in Gospel work, that preachers may be true advocates of Christ. The earnest seeker of souls will find here much to encourage and stimulate him in Christian service.

In a prefatory note, Dr. Elder Cumming describes Rev. G. B. Watt's Life and Liberty (1s. Christian Literature Co., Edinburgh) as showing that the writer perfectly understands what he is teaching. Those who are already familiar with Mr. Watt's platform utterances will welcome some of his thoughts in permanent form; and to a wider circle we commend the book as expressing spiritual truth in simple and helpful fashion.

A Village Apostle: and Other Poems. (By Rev. J. Temperley Grey. H. R. Allenson. 2s. 6d.). Friends of Mr. Grey will find in these poems abundant evidence of that kindly sympathetic spirit which characterizes the author, and which makes his name stand for what is brightest and best in many a country manse. We like, most of all, those hymns—new and old—in which the full heart of the writer speaks in stanzas of strong trust in God. There is considerable variety, and a few pieces may be, we fear, open to misconception. But the true meaning of the message is well expressed, thus:—

> O blissful rest from boding fears—
> He reigns; I ask no more;
> His love illumines all the years,
> And shines on every shore.

The sixth volume of The City Temple Pulpit (3s. 6d. Hodder & Stoughton) well maintains the reputation as a preacher of Dr. Joseph Parker. The reader who is familiar with Dr. Parker's voice and manner will be able to interpret passages otherwise obscure; but to all there will be manifest the power of the great preacher. Like the Message he expounds, he addresses no narrow circle, but every class of the community—because "all have sinned and come short of the glory of God."

A translation from the original French of "Moral Study," dedicated by O. Kellermann to the members of the Hague Convention, has been published by Chase Roys, under the title, War and Peace (1s. Headley Bros.), and will fill the most despondent advocate of the peace movement with a new hope, and expectation of the attainment of his hopes. It is a careful study of the Scriptural attitude to war, and deserves the careful attention of every Christian who has not made the examination for himself.

The Church of England Zenana Missionary Society has issued two interesting books illustrative of the conditions under which their work is carried on (1s. each. 27, Chancery Lane, W.C.)—Nevertheless Afterward, by Ross Allison; and The Land of the Conch Shell, by Augusta M. Blandford. The former is an interesting story; while the latter gives a short history of Travancore, with an account of the establishment and progress of Gospel work there. Both books deserve to be widely circulated.

Studies of the Man Paul, by Robert E. Speer, secretary of the (American) Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions. (1s. 6d. net. Partridge.) A compact little volume, in the preparation of which the author has laid under tribute many of the most valuable books of recent days. The pages display a warm sympathy with their great subject, and from beginning to end the purpose is practical. We cordially commend the book, which will prove of special service to those who cannot obtain large and expensive volumes.

The secrets of power in the Christian life are traced to the true source in From Strength to Strength, by Rev. J. G. Hamilton. (2s. 6d. net. A. H. Stockwell.) The book is in three divisions, dealing respectively with "the great contests of Jesus, the battlefields of life, and the strength of the Church." The subject is temptation—its real nature, how Christ has fought the battle for his people, and the bringing of these together; and the volume supplies such help and guidance as are required in many a young life.

The Messages of the Prophetic and Priestly Historians is a new volume of the "Messages of the Bible" series, and is edited by John Edgar McFadyen, M.A., Professor of Old Testament Literature and Exegesis in Knox College, Toronto. (3s. 6d. J. Clarke & Co.) According to the sub-title, the book presents "the writings of the historians of the Old Testament, arranged so as to distinguish their principal sources, and freely rendered in paraphrase." This is a line of work that may well prove suggestive to students; and beyond question a large amount of thought has been expended upon this attempt. The analyses are very useful; but Mr. McFadyen is too fully surrendered to the modern critical position to make the safest and most serviceable use of the material at his disposal. For example, the life of Elijah is presented to little purpose when the great incidents of his career and testimony are grouped under the heading, "Tales of Elijah."

Having been ordered, in 1899, by the doctors to spend a month in Sikkim, Mr. William Carey seized the opportunity to cross the Jelep La into Tibet, and visited Miss Annie R. Taylor at Yatung. He experienced so much difficulty in obtaining the information he desired about the country—it is explained that he had not then seen Miss Marston's "The Great Closed Land," but that volume is cast in a different mould—that he has supplied for others the need he felt himself by embodying the results of his research and experience in Travel and Adventure in Tibet. (6s. Hodder & Stoughton.) The volume is rich in vivid description, and its word-pictures will make real to the inquirer much that has hitherto been obscure. To many the most interesting part will be Miss Taylor's diary of her journey through Tibet, extending from September, 1892, to April, 1893. It supplies yet another monumental instance of the faithfulness of God in delivering his trusting ones out of all their troubles. A long series of excellent illustrations is supplied, largely from photographs taken by Miss Taylor, and from other well-known missionary sources.

"The Jesuits: What are They? Who are They? What Have They Done? and What are They Doing?" A fifth edition of this timely pamphlet has been issued. Rev. F. A. C. Lillingston writes an introduction. (One penny. Banks.)

What Roman Catholics have said against the Jesuits is a searching tract by Walter Walsh, the author of "The Secret History of the Oxford Movement." 5s. per 100. Imperial Protestant Federation, 3, Palmer Street, Queen Anne's Gate, S.W.)

The Story of the Passion, written and effectively set to music by Rev. J. W. Matthews, breathes a deeply devotional spirit. The author has added a long list of Scripture references for each of his verses. (3d. Houghton & Co., 39, Great Marlborough Street, W.)

Missions to Young People.

SITTINGBOURNE.

AT the Baptist Tabernacle at Sittingbourne Rev. JESSE MAYO conducted a children's mission, March 9-14. A number of the children confessed Christ, and are being gathered into a "Christian Band." A lecture given by Mr. Mayo on March 12 drew a crowded audience, and held their attention throughout. The pastor, Rev. E. Doubleday, assisted by Mr. P. Noble, of the Pastors' College, carried on the mission until March 17.

WATFORD.

A stimulating mission to Sunday scholars and young people has been conducted by Mr. PHILIP R. HURDITCH at Watford. The attendances have been large, and the power of God's Spirit was manifestly present at many of the meetings. Over sixty of the scholars signed the "decision" cards, and the hearts of teachers have been made glad by the ingathering. The influence of the meetings has resulted in a deeper earnestness on the part of the workers. We believe the mission will have an abiding influence; assuredly the services of Mr. Hurditch will be long remembered by all who came in contact with him. The mission was concluded with a praise service on Monday, when thanks were returned to God for the abundant blessing vouchsafed. H. D.

EGREMONT, CHESHIRE.

A mission to young people was held in this district from March 16 to 23, in connection with the Wallasey Sunday School Union, the missioners being Mr. and Mrs. STEPHEN J. ALEXANDER and Mr. ROBINSON. All the meetings were well attended, and, so far as I could judge without precise information as to figures, I should think about a hundred young people came forward and expressed their desire to follow the Lord Jesus Christ. Speaking more directly in regard to my own class, I cannot but feel thankful for the results achieved. My boys turned up splendidly each evening, with the result that eleven out of eighteen decided to enlist under the banner of the cross, and I confidently expect that the remaining seven will ere long follow the good example. R. H.

United Mission at Saffron Walden.

Conducted by Rev. J. F. T. HALLOWES, an eight days' united mission which was held at the Friends' Meeting House at Saffron Walden, March 16-24, proved a source of spiritual stimulus. Night after night the attendances were good and the addresses characterized by earnestness and deep Christian thought. Three meetings for children were held, when the attendances were particularly encouraging. A meeting for men only on the second Sunday afternoon was a solemn and helpful time.

Tent Work in Essex Villages.

Fruitful missions were held toward the close of last summer at Mountnessing and Ingatestone by Mr. G. J. COMBER. Numbers came nightly to listen to the story of redeeming love, and blessing was given in the salvation of souls, while many Christians were much refreshed. It is purposed to extend the work during the coming summer to other villages where the Gospel is so much needed, making Brentwood the centre. The prayers of God's children are earnestly asked for, and any fellowship in supplying the need will be highly valued. Inquiries may be addressed Mr. A. H. Oxley, King's Road, Brentwood.

The Railway Mission.

A Conference was held at Boston, Lincs., on March 15 and 16, presided over by Mr. JOHN HAWKINS. About twenty delegates from various branches attended. This was followed by a nine days' special mission, Brother Hawkins preaching the Gospel faithfully to crowded audiences. The power of God was manifest, and we rejoice to know that several decided to serve Christ, and believers have been much blessed. On Tuesday, March 25, Mr. Hawkins told the story of his life, to which about 500 persons listened attentively. It moved some who listened to determine to follow the same wonderful Saviour. E. L. T.

Mr. Ira D. Sankey, at Grand Rapids, Mich.

A two days' visit has been paid by Mr. IRA D. SANKEY to Grand Rapids, Mich. A local paper, describing the second night's meeting, says: "Mr. Sankey sang and talked to over 2,000 people last night a tthe Fountain Street Baptist Church. Beginning his address at the point where he ended his lecture the preceding evening, he vividly described his journeyings from the banks of the River Jordan through Bethany and Jericho to Jerusalem and the Mount of Olives. He then talked upon 'Memories of Moody,' relating experiences with the great evangelist, giving incidents of his meetings with Mr. Moody in Scotland and at Northfield, Mass. He also recited the story of the origin of that famous song, 'The Ninety and Nine,' which he had originally named, 'The Lost Sheep,' but which was given its present title by Mr. Moody."

Dr. Harry Guinness in New Zealand.

The following extracts from one of Dr. Guinness' recent letters to friends in Australia show that blessing is accompanying his work in New Zealand:—

"You will be glad to hear that the Lord has greatly prospered the Word in Dunedin. The first Sunday afternoon the large Agricultural Hall was crowded by an audience of about 2,000 men, and the Word was in demonstration of the Spirit and of power. At the close of the address over 100 men went boldly forward into the inquiry room, and many of these professed to find the Saviour and are now rejoicing in Him.

"Each night subsequently we have had inquirers, and large numbers of Christians seeking the fulness of the Spirit. I am hoping that one of the results of these days of work in New Zealand may prove to be the outgathering of those who shall yet serve the Lord in the foreign field. It is arranged that I shall hold missions at Christchurch, Wellington, and Auckland, terminating by April 4, when I sail for America. Please continue to remember me in your prayers."

Miss Glover at Kelso.

Under the auspices of the United Christian Endeavour Society, Miss Glover, of Edinburgh, has conducted a three weeks' mission at Kelso (February 23 to March 14). During the first fortnight the week-night meetings were held in the East U.F. Church, with special services in the North U.F. Church on Sunday nights, and in the Temperance Hall during the last week. While large audiences assembled on the Sunday nights, and deepened interest swelled the meetings towards the close of the mission, the attendances generally have been somewhat disappointing.

Although the work has been "stiff," there is, however, good cause for thankfulness. The whole counsel of God has been faithfully and powerfully declared, and the clear, direct, and pointed messages delivered will doubtless bear fruit in many lives. A few have accepted Christ, while many professing Christians, in yielding to the earnest appeals for unreserved consecration, have entered into fuller light and liberty. A united children's service was held in the Parish Church, when an appropriate and memorable address was given. The Bible readings have been stimulating and helpful. A half-night of prayer proved a searching and refining time, and resulted in the opening of dumb lips. On the closing night very many testified to blessing received during the mission, and in order to consolidate the work and foster the deepening of spiritual life a weekly meeting for prayer, testimony, and the study of God's word has been started. Norfolk Village Mission.

The Norfolk Village Mission is a union of Evangelical Christians of various denominations, who realize the need of simple Gospel teaching in many parts of the county. The object of the society is not to supplant existing agencies, but rather to work with them as far as possible, and the committee rejoice where Christians unite for the purposes of a mission.

Miss K. E. BROWNE, the missioner, gives, in the annual report, a bright and attractive account of her work. Describing a typical mission, she writes:—I have not only to take the meetings during the time, but in nearly every case to prepare the ground. To give an idea what this means, the following programme will show. In the first place, the Christians of the neighbourhood—an area, say, of five or six miles—must be visited and their hearts warmed and stirred. Then prayer meetings in two or three villages, either in cottages, chapels, or schoolrooms, arranged for, at which I am present. House-to-house visitation occupies all the day for at least a week before the mission, during which time some 500 bills and personal invitations are given in half a dozen villages. To catch the eye of the passer-by 50 large bills are printed, and I am the bill-poster, and become quite expert in choosing a good site for the bill, and in posting it. Although the population of the village is under 200 persons, yet, during the ten meetings held in the barn the estimated attendance came up to 1,000 persons. Better still than numbers was the power manifested during these services, for on the Sunday opening services we saw signs following, and were cheered."

Miss Maud Pearse (daughter of Rev. Mark Guy Pearse) writes:—"Owing to my breakdown in health, I was obliged to leave the West London Mission for a time, and it was a great pleasure for me to see and to give a little help to Miss Browne. A most encouraging work is being done in the villages and hamlets of Norfolk, where such an effort is greatly needed. From my own personal experience I can most heartily commend this village work. I may add that Miss Browne is very anxious to procure a small tent for Gospel services, capable of seating 250 persons." The secretary of the Mission is Mrs. D. Jarrold, Thorpe St. Andrew, Norwich.

The Weaver Brothers' Mission at Calton, Glasgow.

In the Calton district of Glasgow the agencies of the Church find concentrated in one area all the problems that are hardest of solution. All the more, one may urge, is there need, that once and again, in one or other part of the field, there should be a rally of effort, so that those who are indifferent and heedless of the ordinary services may be led to wonder and enquire as to some special effort.

It was with this object in view that Messrs. BEWLEY and FRANK WEAVER arranged to conduct a twelve days' mission in Young Street Church (Rev. John McCracken, minister), and all of those who were organized as workers for these services are now looking back with gratitude to the efforts of these days, and with much expectation that the results will remain with us.

From the first the gatherings increased in interest, and from the first service it was evident that prayer for the manifestation of the power and presence of the Spirit was to be answered. Over seventy souls spontaneously, many under deep conviction, passed into the inquiry room, almost all of whom gave indications that for them the future was to be with new resolves and new power under the banner of Jesus Christ.

As the messengers of God, with the guidance of the Holy Spirit, the results are to be attributed to the strong, faithful, yet attractive presentation of the truths of our Gospel by Mr. Bewley Weaver, and the no less effective evangel as sung by Mr. Frank Weaver. These brethren have left behind them a savour sweet of what Christianity is in its power and in its beauty. Not of least importance was the stimulus afforded to Christians which will carry forward the influence of the mission long after we have said good-bye to our brethren.

There was an evident and cheering movement among the young people of the congregation that will appear as fruit in the inauguration of a society of Christian Endeavour, the nucleus for which has been won from this mission.

Since the Evangelistic Campaign in our city, there has been no movement in this part of such a cheering and encouraging nature. We attempted; we expected; we were not disappointed. To God be the glory! J. McC.

In the Ebenezer Hall, Oak Bank Road, Woolston, near Southampton, Mr. JOHN H. COOKE, of the Evangelization Society, has held a fifteen days' mission. Interest in the services grew until, at the closing meeting, the hall was packed. The occasion was a solemn one; God's presence was realized, and blessing was received. The people listened with rapt attention. There were many interesting cases of decision, including a backslider who cried aloud in the hall for mercy and forgiveness, and a young lady who said she "would never sing for Satan again, but for Jesus." This she did in subsequent meetings. We are deeply thankful for the mission.

JOB WILLIAMS.

Two fruitful temperance missions under the auspices of the Free Church Council were conducted recently in Holywell and Connah's Quay by Mr. Tennyson Smith. Crowded audiences were secured, and both towns thoroughly stirred. The pledge tables were crowded, and on one evening alone 160 persons signed the pledge, including some prominent leaders in the churches.

Mr. JAMES WHARTON has just concluded a most encouraging three weeks' mission in the Gospel Hall at Penrith, his native town. It has been a time of much blessing. Many during the meetings have professed to realize the joy of sins forgiven, and the Christians in the town who united in the work have been refreshed and stimulated to more diligent service for the Lord.

Mr. WILLIAM COLLARD has concluded a sixteen days' mission at the New Mission, Bramley, resulting in much blessing. Considerable interest was aroused by his original manner of presenting the truth, as well as the distinct kind of witness that is his to bear to the wonder-working power of Christ. "None," writes a correspondent, "could hear his life-story without confessing a notable miracle to have been wrought in him."

An encouraging fourteen days' mission was concluded on Friday at Wellington Street Baptist Chapel, Stockton-on-Tees, for which the pastor (Rev. N. Hardingham Patrick) and the church had been preparing for the last three months. About fifty preliminary prayer meetings had been held in the houses of members throughout the town. Mrs. Patrick had also trained a choir. The meetings were conducted by Rev. S. A. McCracken. A constant succession of inquirers professed their desire to lead a new life; 203 passed through the inquiry rooms.

Mr. Thomas Payne has conducted a ten-days' mission at Christ Church, Blythe Road, West Kensington Park, W. His visit was much too short, but it was found to be a time of refreshing, and likewise deepening of the spiritual life of many believers; also many came out and decided for Jesus Christ. I was much pleased to find some who came to the services who were brought to a knowledge of the truth over twenty years since, when our good brother had a mission near our church.

Edmund Brown, Pastor.

Mr. Albert Richings, of Oxford, has conducted a series of services at the Wesleyan Chapel, Hazlemere, near High Wycombe. The power of the Holy Spirit has been manifested. Both young and old have been impressed, and in three instances husband, wife, and family sought the Saviour together. We have had a great lift onward in our work in this little cause, which has been struggling on for years with but few members, sometimes but two or three meeting together, yet always realizing the presence of the Master.

C. Nicholls, Society Class Leader.

Cartmel, near Grange-over-Sands, has been visited by a number of young men, from the Ulverston Y.M.C.A., who preached and sang the Gospel in the quaint old Market Place and the small Wesleyan Chapel. A good work is done in Cartmel and the villages round by the Misses Cowherd, of Stoneydale, who "hold the fort" for Christ in the midst of that atmosphere of stolid indifference which makes Gospel work in our villages so hard. A mission, lately conducted at the little village of Allithwaite, by Mr. Akester, of the Manchester City Mission, has been a means of much blessing. G. R. Kirlew.

A mission has been concluded at St. James's Church, Bath, conducted by Rev, J. Stuart Holden. On the last Sunday evening the spacious church (seating 1,100) was filled ten minutes before the time of commencement; and although every available space was filled with forms and chairs, many were unable to get inside the church, while others remained standing in the doorways and lobbies. On the Monday evening over 200 applied for memorial cards in token of blessings received. The vicar (Rev. G. L. James), with a large body of workers, held open-air meetings every evening, and gathered into the church many who do not usually attend any place of worship.

Church of England.

The Bishop of Kensington spent Good Friday in Wormwood Scrubbs Prison and Kensington Workhouse, preaching twice in the chapel of the former institution, and once in that of the latter.

A new Anglican Church was consecrated at Aix-la-Chapelle on March 26, by Dr. Wilkinson, Bishop for Northern and Central Europe, in the presence of a large number of British subjects and Americans.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, who is at present residing at the Old Palace, Canterbury, is steadily regaining his powers of walking. The Bishop of Dover has so arranged the confirmation services as to release Dr. Temple altogether from duty in that connection.

Five life-sentence men, who have been released on licence as a result of petitions, have been dealt with recently by the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society attached to the Church Army. In all such cases the gratuity which the man has earned in prison is handed to the Society by the Government, to be spent on his behalf or dealt out as the case may require.

Twenty years ago St. James', Hatcham, was one of the most notorious of Ritualistic churches. Since then it has been the centre of an Evangelical ministry. The vicar, Rev. G. A. Sowter, in a recent address gave an instructive comparison of the work accomplished there under Ritualistic and Evangelical conditions respectively. Mr. Sowter noted that in 1873 the total sum raised for all purposes was £309; last year it was £1,590. In 1873 there was one Sunday school in the parish with less than 100 scholars, and now they have six Sunday schools with 2,000 scholars. The Easter communicants in 1873 numbered 108, while last year there were 934.

Congregational.

On Coronation Day, June 26, a United Free Church Coronation service is to be held at the City Temple. A sub-committee, consisting of Revs. Dr. Townsend, Thomas Law, Dr. Monro Gibson, and Mr. Robert Whyte, has been appointed to prepare a form of service.

The London Congregational Union has decided upon starting in Pentonville a mission centre on the lines of a University Settlement. The centre of the mission for the present will be Claremont Chapel. The originator of the scheme is Mr. W. H. Brown, of Woodford, who has contributed half the total cost of £8,000.

The members of Union Chapel, London (of which Rev. Dr. Henry Allon was long minister), have given the sum of £575 towards the deficiency in the funds of the London Missionary Society, in recognition of the honour done to their present minister, Rev. W. Hardy Harwood, by his election to the chairmanship of the Board of Directors.

The annual social gathering of the congregation of Carr's Lane Chapel, Birmingham, was held last week in the Town Hall. Rev. J. H. and Mrs. Jowett received over a thousand guests. Mr. Jowett, in a characteristic address, said his last year's ministry had been the happiest and most profitable he had spent at Carr's Lane. He announced a scheme to enlarge Moseley Street Hall, which he hoped would meet with generous support. During the evening Mr. R. Cameron, M.P., gave an address on "Puritanism."

At the spring assembly of the Notts Union, which took place at Nottingham on Tuesday week, there was a long discussion on Dr. Parker's proposal for the federation of Congregationalism throughout the country. A resolution was passed acknowledging the services of Dr. Parker in "focussing attention upon the vitally important questions of the advisability and practicability of drawing the churches into closer federation," and recommending the Executive Committee of the Congregational Union to summon a committee of delegates from county unions "to consider what immediate steps should be taken towards realizing this closer federation as speedily as possible."

Baptist.

Rev. W. Y. Fullerton, of Leicester, has been confined to his house by injuries to the shoulder, resulting from a cycling accident.

Pastor William Brown has resigned the pastorate of the church at Wells, Somerset, and proposes closing his ministry there the last Sunday in April.

Westgate Road Church, Newcastle-on-Tyne, which continues the historic traditions of Tuthills Stairs Chapel, celebrated its 250th anniversary on Sunday week.

On March 22-24, a number of the boys of the Stockwell Orphanage, under Rev. V. J. Charlesworth, paid a visit to Vernon Chapel, King's Cross, and on each of the three days, at various meetings, took part by singing, &c. Mr. Charlesworth explained the needs of the Orphanage.

On April 29 the incoming president of the Baptist Union, Rev. J. R. Wood, will lay the memorial-stone of the new Kingsgate Street Chapel, Holborn, part of the site of the old building being absorbed by the Baptist Church House in course of erection hard by. After this ceremony the London Baptist Association will receive the ministers and delegates at Holborn Town Hall.

The twenty-third anniversary of the cause in West Bournemouth was celebrated in West Cliff Tabernacle, on March 23 and 25. The pastor, Rev. G. D. Hooper, preached on the 23rd, and Rev. G. Turner, of Sutton, on the 25th. A tea and public meeting followed, presided over by Sir Matthew Dodsworth. Encouraging reports of all branches of work were given, and in the course of the evening an encouraging message was received from Rev. G. Wainwright, the former pastor, who has just landed in England. The C.E. Societies now number 100 members, and the Church, 285. Over £700 has been promised towards the liquidation of the debt of £1,065 this year.

Methodist.

A new Primitive Methodist church has been opened at Pye Nest, a growing suburb of Halifax, the first to be erected under the Connexion's recently-established extension fund.

Rev. George Whelpton, M.A., of Paris, who has laboured for twenty-two years in the Wesleyan Methodist Mission work in France, has broken down in health, and requires a long rest.

The new Springfield Hall, of the Wesleyan Mission, at Wandsworth Road, S.W., is proving a remarkable success. There are crowded audiences, and the evangelistic and temperance meetings are bearing much fruit.

Presbyterian.

For the important extensions at Marylebone Church, Rev. Dr. Hanson has obtained promises for £9,000 of the £11,000 that is required.

The Yorkshire Presbytery has approved a proposal for the amalgamation of the congregations of St. Columba and Cavendish Road, Leeds.

At the annual meeting of the congregation of Lambeth Church, S.E., the minister, Rev. P. A. Milne, reported that new agencies to meet the altered needs of the district have been started, and all departments of the church's work are well sustained, and are being carried on with a measure of success. A good work is maintained amongst the poor, and many cases have received temporary relief.

The congregation at Westbourne Grove, W., met for the first time in the renovated church on Sunday week. The alterations which have been made during the last two months have been so radical as to completely alter the internal appearance of the building, and the unanimous opinion is that the changes are all beneficial, giving much more light and greater spaciousness. It was expected that Rev. G. A. Johnston Ross would preach in the morning, but he was suffering from a severe cold, and Rev. Dr. McGaw took his place in the morning, Rev. C. Silvester Horne, of Kensington Chapel, preaching in the evening.

Salvation Army.

The Army's prison visitation officers have just interviewed numerous convicts in Dartmoor and Broadmoor Asylum with a view to affording them assistance upon their release.

The Salvation Army's lifeboat, Catherine Booth, which is entirely manned by Norwegian Salvationists, has rescued the crews of fifty-two fishing boats during the past two years.

The Government of Natal has contributed the sum of £300 towards the cost of establishing a Home for Discharged Prisoners at Pietermaritzburg in connection with the Salvation Army.

The Army's efforts among South African native populations are to be further extended, by the addition of an institution for training native officers and school teachers.

In connection with the Protestant Reformation Society reply lectures to Roman Catholic priests have been given recently in various parts of the country by Rev. Dr. Wright and Mr. Walter A. Limbrick. Speaking at Paddington, W., Mr. Limbrick gave a powerful answer to a lecture by Canon Moyes on "The Ancient Church of this Country." Mr. Limbrick adopted for his lecture the same title as the Romanist, and his words were received with earnest attention.

In connection with Union Chapel, Gosport, an unsectarian place of worship, steps are being taken to inaugurate an aggressive movement in the spring and summer by holding open-air mission services, tract distribution, and numerous other forms of service among children and young people. The secretary, Lieutenant G. Lee, writes:—"We need a lady or gentleman of independent means to live here and work for our Master. We have a mission-room that they could use as desired. There is a large field for work, offering abundant opportunity for reaping a large harvest of souls. For our work among the young we need a musical instrument. A small organ would be the most useful, as it could be carried about for our open-air services." Lieutenant Lee's address is Ambleside House, King's Road, Gosport.

In the thirty-fifth annual Report of the Servants' Mission and Homes for Men and Women Servants (109 and 111, Eaton Terrace, S.W.), Mr. and Mrs. Goodchild describe the varied operations maintained in connection with the mission. Twice a week during the summer months open-air services were held in Hyde Park, and there were several hopeful cases of spiritual awakening. Many among the hearers were servants, and most of the speakers and singers were of that class. The Sunday afternoon and Thursday evening meetings in the mission room have not been large, but many have been helped by them. The four quarterly gatherings for the Christian servants have again been times of refreshing; reports of work and requests for praise and prayer coming in from foreign fields as well as many parts of our own land. During the year there were received into the Homes 114 men and 135 women.

Fallen Asleep.

Clapham Road Presbyterian Church, S.W., and Trinity Hall Mission have lost a trusted friend and tried worker by the death of Mr. Robert Noble, who for the past seventeen years laboured in connection with the Mission.—The St. Austell Circuit of the Bible Christian Connexion has sustained a severe bereavement by the death of Mr. Joseph Turner, its oldest local preacher. He was a man of much saintliness of character, and had rendered important service to the Connexion.—Mr. J. D. Smith, J.P., until a few months since senior deacon of St. Mary's Baptist Church, Norwich.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Cripples' Homes, Enfield and Swanage (Miss Priest Peck)—G.L., 10s.; Friend, 5s.; the Misses M., 10s.

The Late Mrs. S. E. Borton.

THE death is announced of Mrs. Sarah Elizabeth (Lill) Borton, which took place at her residence "Glencairn," Hermon Hill, Leytonstone, on Monday last week. Mrs. Borton was the wife of Mr. H. Borton, who together with his sons, takes such a practical interest in evangelical work in the locality. It will be remembered that a few months ago, owing to their exertions, the Central Hall at Ferndale Road, Leytonstone, was erected for the purposes of conducting religious services there. Mrs. Borton was fifty-five years of age, and had been in failing health for nearly a year.

Sunday Closing of Public-Houses.—A campaign in advocacy of Sunday closing has been conducted at Tunbridge Wells, with encouraging results. Mr. William Copleston has addressed some fourteen meetings in most of the churches and chapels; the clergy and ministers have taken up the question vigorously; sermons and lectures have been delivered, and conferences and drawing-room meetings held.

BLINDNESS AND DEFORMITY.

The Rev. T. C. writes:—

During all the long period of my experience of forty years as parochial clergyman, I do not think that I have ever met with a sadder case than that of L.B. It is not only that she is totally blind, but painfully deformed. She has an abscess on the brain which affects the intellect. Life must indeed be bereft, in her case, of almost every pleasure and alleviation. It is a pitiful sight to witness such utter helplessness, and then feel how powerless one is to mitigate any of the many sad features of the case. The mother is a struggling widow, and her youngest child is consumptive.

Rev. J. PULLEIN-THOMPSON, Hon. Sec. The National Blind Relief Society, The Vicarage, 27, Tite Street, Chelsea, S.W., will thankfully receive subscriptions, or may be sent to the Office of THE CHRISTIAN.

St. Giles' Christian Mission.

THE MORAVIAN MISSIONS (Established 1732).

Oldest Protestant Missions to the Heathen — First to the Lepers.

About ONE in SIXTY members is a missionary. There are gathered under their care, from darkest heathenism, nearly 100,000; i.e., more than THREE TIMES AS MANY as the parent Church!

To help these devoted people whom God so blesses, and who, in the preponderating proportion of their missionaries, are so largely doing the work of other Churches,

THE LONDON ASSOCIATION IN AID

was formed in 1817.

The following are some of many PRESSING NEEDS for which EARNEST PRAYER AND SUPPORT ARE SOUGHT—

For GENERAL FUND—largely increased annual help of at least £4,000, if existing Missions are to be maintained and deficiency averted.

For THE LEPER HOME, Jerusalem, where the Inmates are doubled in number, funds are still wanted to complete the provision of a larger Water Reservoir.

For LABRADOR, hitherto self-supporting, but crippled for a time in its resources, £2,000 annually is required for a few years, until the Mission can be re-established. For this need, and to avert loss to the General Fund, an ADDITIONAL Fund is being raised.

Contributions will be thankfully received and information given, by the Rev. W. WETTON COX, at the offices of the London Association, 7, New Court, Lincoln's Inn, London, W.C., who will also gladly arrange for Meetings, Sermons, Lectures, &c.

LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY

14, BLOMFIELD STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Now in its second century of work. Distinguished for its Catholic basis, its famous Missionaries (Williams, Moffat, Livingstone, Morrison, Ellis, Gilmour, &c.) its Pioneering successes, its enterprising Native Agents, its self-supporting Churches, its Bible Translation Work, its Contributions to Christian Literature, its Preaching to the Masses, its Women's Work for Women, its Schools and Orphanages, its Training Institutions, its Medical Missionaries, its Hospitals and Dispensaries, and its Leper Asylums.

Funds greatly needed. Special contributions for support of "Own Missionaries," or for Native Helpers, gladly received.

Home Secretary: REV. ARTHUR N. JOHNSON, M.A.

Notes & Comments

Sabbath Desecration. On Sunday last, in all the Wesleyan Churches, attention was called to the pressing subject of Sabbath desecration. This step was taken upon the initiative of the Connexional Lord's Day Observance Committee. It would be well if all the pulpits in the land would at once deal with the question, and deal with it thoroughly. We say thoroughly, because the special pleading offered by the enemies of the Lord's Day is so specious that it needs combating in no half-hearted manner. Much more is required than denunciation; we must show the physical, mental, moral, and Divine grounds upon which the Sabbath rests; and make it abundantly clear that the present indifference towards it, or open violation of it, constitutes a grave breach of order. It is significant that at the meeting of the National Union of Shop Assistants, held at Newcastle on Easter Monday, a resolution was carried demanding the compulsory closing of shops on Sunday. The discussion revealed the fact that many shop assistants are practically slaves, being compelled to work on Sundays as well as week days. Mammon and pleasure, between them, are driving tens of thousands of men and women into a house of bondage. We must strike for liberty—liberty for God as well as for man.

The "Soul's Day." Is the pulpit sufficiently faithful in its teachings respecting Sunday Observance? The halting and dubious way in which the subject is dealt with by many preachers is not helpful to the young people who sorely lack guidance on the question. The fear of being thought "narrow" is the silliest of fears, and is responsible for much confusion and contradictoriness of thought and habit in the pew. What are the laws of limits of liberty as to the way Sunday should be spent? There is no positive teaching in matters of detail in the New Testament; but the principle is as clear as day. The Lord's Day is the Day of the Soul, and all that tends to emancipate the soul from the thraldom of the world, the flesh, and the devil, and to give it an opportunity to realise itself and its eternal destiny, is properly the work of this great day to foster. Those who give it up to physical culture, or to merely social enjoyment, are thus as faithless to its highest purpose as those who work on it, or who (worse still) make others work for them on it. "I was in the spirit on the Lord's Day" is the ideal to which all should endeavour to conform.

"Sacred" Dramas. There is a fresh attempt on the part of stage managers to introduce sacred subjects and personages into theatrical plays. The apparent innocence of the thing has blinded the eyes of many to what is really behind the whole movement. It would seem, however, as if even a thoroughly worldly public had some conscience as to where the line should be drawn between sacred and profane. The newest performance of the kind was hissed upon its first representation last week, at least, in that part of it where our Lord's presence is dramatically suggested by a streak of limelight; and murmurs of "Awful blasphemy!" were heard on all sides. Even the world shrinks from a mixture of romance, ballet-dancing, and miracles of our Lord. The introduction of our adorable Redeemer into a modern playhouse, with all its light pantomimic associations, is an outrage of the worst kind; and it is to be hoped that the public conscience will insist upon the elimination of this element. We are glad to see that the daily Press almost universally condemns this particular scene; but the manager of the theatre intends to hold his ground; because, as he naïvely says, "the clerical bookings are enormous"!

Chilly Churches. A speaker at a recent church anniversary spoke some strong words on the frigid air of many of our churches, which he said were like ice-houses, and their members like icebergs, which state of things was one of the causes that repelled non-church-goers. There is too much truth in this charge. The architecture of many buildings helps to lower the temperature of worshippers, and formality in a service tends in the same direction; nor is the pulpit always guiltless. When this is so, the very genius of religion is outraged, and the Divine purpose of the Church is set at nought. The Gospel is the message of Divine love, and, when it has its way, is full of warmth and inspiration to brotherliness. The true Church is filled with a heavenly heat and earnestness for the salvation of men. Its atmosphere is tropic with affection as well as bright with praise. The world will never be converted by churches of the Laodicean order.

The Preacher's Training Ground. Dr. Parker, in advising young aspirants for the pulpit, strongly recommends them to begin with open-air preaching. "It lies within anyone's power to stand upon a stone and tell those who will listen to him what he knows of the Kingdom of God." It is a fine discipline for a speaker, because he has to attract as well as hold his audience; and it exercises him necessarily in the priceless art of extemporaneous speech. There is also plenty of scope for all who have a message to give to their fellow-men, and a religious experience to tell them. Those who have the desire to test themselves as possible preachers cannot do better than make this experiment. Most great preachers, including Dr. Parker, began in this way, and it was the favourite method of the Great Teacher himself, who waited for no set occasion but delivered His Gospel as opportunity arose, in the open air as well as in the synagogue.

Foundations in Dust. The Church Review, in a recent issue, urged, in regard to the proceedings at the recent Fulham Conference, that—

> Lord Halifax has added one more to the many obligations English Catholics owe to the layman who is, to all intents and purposes, their leader in the Fight for the Faith.

It appears, however, that this indebtedness is based upon his lordship's utterance:—

> Our Lord says in effect, "through the ministry of the Church, I forgive," and thus absolution is the means which God has appointed for the forgiveness of sins. The history of the Church shows that this authority and power have always been exercised. It has never been heard that anyone could absolve himself, any more than that he could baptize himself. It is through the intervention of man that God forgives.

How terribly far this Romish teaching is from the inspired declarations of the Word of God (1 Tim. ii. 5; and Acts ii. 21).

Freedom and Faith. Those who seek refuge in Romanism from the uncertainties of doubt, and the necessities of exercising the faculty of private judgment, would do well to consider a protest that comes from Austria against the stifling propensities of that church. Dr. Wahrmund, of Innsbrück, has in former times been known as a staunch supporter of Rome, but has been goaded into a protest against her tyranny over the minds of her adherents which has grown into a terrorism impossible to bear. Owing to this fact, Dr. Wahrmund says that the educated classes in Austria are living in indifference or open unbelief, and the Catholic faith is becoming a religion for rustics, "like the declining Paganism of the ancient world." Credulity on the one hand is met by hopeless scepticism on the other; and meanwhile the interests of true religion are going by the board. This is but another proof, which history has so copiously illustrated, of the fact that faith and freedom are indissolubly associated.

A House Divided Against Itself. It is asserted that there is much anxiety at the Vatican in regard to the discovery that certain influential French bishops assisted the Government in drawing up the Bill against the orders, and a competent authority in Rome states that these dignitaries have refused to comply with the Pope's invitation to the Vatican. A schism is feared which may be powerful in widening the gulf between France and Rome, and the ground for the alarm is widened to anyone who studies the development of the national and patriotic movement amongst the priests in France. In that country, as elsewhere, it has been found that the domination of the Vatican implies both spiritual and national slavery, and there is a growing desire to be rid of both.

The Catastrophe at Glasgow. The news of last Saturday's catastrophe at Glasgow may well leave behind much food for reflection. The path of the pleasure-seeker is beset with danger as well as that of obedience to the call of duty. Once and again the heart of the nation has almost stood still as it heard of disaster in theatre or other place of amusement. To their own Master those who are suddenly stricken down must give an account, but the thoughtful Christian can only regard death under such circumstances as fraught with many lessons of warning. That the game should in this case have been allowed to proceed, as a precaution against further panic, was probably a wise arrangement; but it is terrible to think of the dead and dying being carried out amid shouts of applause. Recreation in itself must not be discouraged, but there is unhealthy development when 80,000 people gather as they did on Saturday. The voice of God has spoken with no uncertain sound to that great company, as well as to the far wider circle who would have been there if they could. May they be so taught to number their days that they may apply their hearts unto wisdom.

Temperance Legislation. Though the measure does not dispose of the question of temperance reform, the fact that the Government Licensing Bill has passed the second reading in the House of Commons must be viewed with satisfaction. If it does not suffer too much in the committee stage, grocers' licences will at last be better under control; the assertion of the responsibility of publicans for drunkenness on their premises will afford a basis on which the police can take action, where they have hitherto been helpless; and at least a beginning has been made in dealing with drinking clubs. Temperance advocates are grateful for any restriction of the drink traffic whatever; and this measure in its present form would be a useful stepping-stone to further attainments. It would be useful if only for the recognition by the Government of certain principles not admitted before. But it is more: for it undoubtedly marks progress in the temperance campaign.

The Case of the Barmaid. We are not at all astonished at the outcry raised against the action of the Glasgow magistrates in proposing the abolition of barmaids, for by this time we are well able to gauge the philanthropy of drink-sellers when their craft is in danger. Calcutta led the way two years ago on account of the scandal in the eyes of the natives of women being engaged in the worst traffic known to the Hindu and the Moslem. It is a curious thing that Moslems, who are never given to over-estimating the virtue and position of woman, should protest against women being employed in the drink trade; whilst Englishmen, surrounded with the moral influence of the Gospel, seek out the prettiest and most attractive girls to serve drink to customers. What man, possessing a scrap of chivalry, can view with composure the spectacle of a modest girl being placed in such a sphere of temptation as that which a pothouse offers? It has been truly said that "a country has good reason to fear when the modesty of its women is assailed."

A Desirable Reform. In view of the probability of increased taxation on account of the War expenditure, numerous suggestions have been made to the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to means whereby he might relieve the citizen of a part of the burden. The most reasonable of these, doubtless, is the proposal that a graduated licence of brewers should be legalized. Unhappily, in 1880 the sliding scale system was abolished, and a licence duty of £1 per annum substituted; and, therefore, to-day the large brewing corporations, with their huge output, pay no more than the village brewer who sends out only two or three barrels per week. The result of this has been, not only to put into the pockets of the shareholders money which formerly went to the Revenue, but to develop the iniquitous tied-house system, the number of such public-houses having, in some districts, increased by 60 per cent. The adoption of the suggested graduated scale would certainly do something towards lessening the growing tyranny of the wealthy brewer.

Transmitted Weakness. A little book recently published upon the subject of Insanity (Sonnenschein) contains an immense amount of information with which every social reformer ought to acquaint himself. The researches of modern scientists and pathologists are making it clear beyond all doubt that the dreadful diseases which scourge bodies and minds are due, not to any defect in the laws of God, but to man's defiance of them. In this respect, science is simply casting out the unclean spirit of secularism, which so impudently attributes the world's disorders to faults in Divine Providence. Dr. Mercier, to whose book we have referred, shows how terrible is the crime of those parents who, through their own excesses, inflict upon society weak and impoverished offspring. Strictly speaking, neither alcoholism nor insanity is hereditary; but the children of drunkards and weak-minded people inherit a constitution which possesses little power of resistance to hostile forces; hence the children easily go astray. Temperance workers, in particular, will find in Dr. Mercier's pages an arsenal of weapons new and old, which should tell heavily in the war with intemperance. Such expositions of the law of heredity as are here given should make our pleas more intense than ever—"for the children's sake."

The Bright Side of Heredity. Whilst we dare not, for a moment, minimize the truth which both the Bible and modern research force upon us, that men transmit their weakness to their offspring, we must not forget the other side. Indeed, it is part of the Gospel to do so. Many writers on heredity see only the seamy side of life, hence they are confirmed pessimists. It is true that the iniquities of the fathers are visited upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate God; but it is also true that the promise of the new life in Christ Jesus is to us and to our children. No one can read the New Testament without seeing what a large place is given to the bright side of heredity. We are afraid, however, that this has not seized the conscience of Christendom as it should have done. But, above all things, our dominant note must be, a new heredity through the grace which is in Christ Jesus. Nothing less than this new birth will avail.

Labour for Liquor! According to the Salisbury Herald (Rhodesia), a meeting of the Chamber of Commerce was recently held to discuss the problem of native labour. The members agreed that this solution was to be found only in "giving the natives liquor, under control." The chairman affirmed that without doubt, if the Kaffir could get liquor, they could get all the labour they wanted. This cold-blooded attitude was endorsed by the meeting. A Wesleyan minister ventured to protest in the name of other residents against so iniquitous a policy, and promised to it an uncompromising and relentless opposition. This condition of things shows the need for unremitting watchfulness of this question at home as well as in South Africa. Strong and united British opinion alone can safeguard the native from the demoralization that would immediately follow on the relaxation of the present law.

The Macedonian Tangle. Once more we are threatened with a renewal of the Macedonian trouble. The tension is so high that an outbreak seems to be inevitable, unless the European powers interfere, which they are not at all likely to do. It is again the Turk who takes advantage of the mutual suspicions between the European powers to work his own way. The situation is rendered the more difficult because of the lack of solidarity amongst the "Christian" population. It is to be feared that most of them are Christian in name only, since they permit vendetta, and cherish the murderous spirit. What religion they have is saturated with superstition of the most revolting type; with the result that the moral life remains not only untouched by the Spirit of Christ, but it receives a deep wound at the hands of priests. The whole question would be immensely simplified to-morrow, if a pure Christianity were known and practised by the nominal Christians. The Turk, meanwhile, exploits the situation for his own ends. Every day makes it clearer that Europe missed her grand opportunity in 1896 to strike the decisive blow at Turkish villainy.

Sympathy through Experience. It is impossible for any person really to sympathize with another unless he has passed through an experience similar to that which the other endures. The man on the hilltop cannot understand the feeling of gloom and darkness which seizes the wanderer in the dense valley. The man at an altitude is often disposed to be impatient and rude towards the men in the lowlands; he cannot understand them. This lack of experience accounts for many of the hard and unsympathetic things which have been recently uttered by certain men in high places concerning the position of others whose lot in life is hard and humble. A noble lord, who has never been called upon to endure hardship and to work during long hours for his daily bread, has no means of understanding the difficulties surrounding a shop-assistant's life. This makes it all the more necessary that only those who do know the real facts of other people's lives should have the final voice in determining whether their lot shall be alleviated or not. The tendency towards dividing society into distinct parts, each hermetically sealed against the other, is distinctly bad. It would be an excellent thing if the man of privilege could visit his brethren in affliction and learn a little at first hand of their lives. Experience gained in that way would result in a great wave of genuine and practical sympathy with the lowly.

The Byeways of Service. A careful study of the New Testament will reveal the fact that some of the greatest things said and done by our Lord and his Apostles belong to what may be called the byeways of their ministry. "And it came to pass that as He went, behold——," and then follows the story of an interruption which becomes the occasion for a new display of mercy. While Paul waited for his friends at Athens, his spirit was stirred, as he saw the city full of idols; and then came the memorable discourse on Mars Hill. These things were done on the way to something else. There is a fruitful field of suggestion here. Grand routes of service have to be cast up and bravely trodden, but much can be done in the byeways. The opportunities that come to us without being sought should always be seized; they may, in the final event, turn out to be among the most decisive things of life.

Practical Papers.*

On "SPRING-CLEANING."

"What hast thou in the house?" (2 Kings iv. 2).

THE air of spring is alive outdoors with the freshness of buds and blooms; and indoors it calls for industry to search out the dark places, and lay them bare to the refining influences of soap and broom.

How gladly would discomfited husbands welcome the discovery of some invention which should accomplish the great renovation without such dire upheaval of carpet and furniture, and the vagaries of the irresponsible tin-tack on the stair. Would that art could borrow from nature her blithe and silent method of replacing gloom with grateful colour, without the obtrusive qualities of paint!

Yet here shine forth the wit and resourcefulness of woman, whose industry and patience find exercise now, perhaps more than at any other season of the year, and whose hours of late and early toil go far to sweeten life for all the months that intervene till spring-time comes again.

Stock-taking in business for the husband, Spring-Cleaning at home for the wife, are indispensable elements in the economy of civilized existence; and in the spiritual sphere also it is well to give an occasional "overhaul." From these recurrences of homely duties some useful lessons may be culled.

1. Let us note at the outset that Spring-Cleaning can only be undertaken in a house already built and occupied. It deals with internal arrangements and decoration; the foundations are not concerned.

It is necessary to make this distinction, in view of much prevalent teaching that seems to urge the development of a quasi Christian character, before the necessary foundation has been laid of experimental and personal faith in the Son of God. This foundation must be established, and an evident structure of profession and confession erected upon it, before human efforts can rightly fulfil the purposes of God in the soul. This chapter, therefore, is addressed specially to those who already have a Christian character to cleanse and beautify.

2. Spring-Cleaning is essentially a work of detail. We cannot always live upon generalities. The tendency of the times is to skim the surface, to seek pleasing effects, to serve the immediate present rather than to secure that which will last. "What the eye doesn't see the heart doesn't grieve over!" is a dangerous maxim which will reveal its hidden folly by-and-by. "Faithful in that which is least!" is the Scriptural formula of a far nobler rule of life. It means that the corners of the cupboard must be cleansed, the obscure recesses of the heart examined, the dark places subjected to the light of day.

It is not enough to "be a Christian" in the broad acceptation of the term. We are to "walk worthy" of that glorious vocation, a step at a time, by inches, not by miles. All the grander qualities of character are required for this—care, patience, conscientiousness, perseverance, concentration, faith. Every great, outstanding career has been built up by attention to detail and the elimination of all that defiles; as also every broken fortune, every wrecked reputation, has been achieved by their neglect.

3. Spring-Cleaning, wisely planned, is done one room at a time. Oh, the fuss and muddle in some houses, compared with others! Not a place in which to walk, or stand, or sit! Confusion and discomfort reign supreme, while brows are furrowed and tempers soured. Yet, undertaken methodically, how different the result. The inevitable becomes tolerable, and inconveniences are turned into a source of fun.

Is it not so in all life's routine? Method and arrangement accomplish much. To plan out your day is to fill it with useful service. To begin a little of this, and a little of that, is to complete nothing but vexation of spirit and loss of time. All this we endorse in theory; in practice, it is apt to be ignored. The weak points in disposition and character need to be dealt with one by one. "Each victory will help you some other to win." Thus may we review each day with the satisfaction that > Something attempted, something done,

> Has earned a night's repose.

4. Each person has a specified duty. There is a defined task for man and woman, for mistress, parlourmaid, and cook. The housemaid does not whitewash the ceiling, nor the painter scrub the floor. So in all service. It is not enough to condemn dirt; we must clean it out. Nor does it suffice to admire cleanliness if we do not aim to secure it; in this each must do his appointed share—

> You in your small corner,
> And I in mine.

The work of one may produce more apparent result than that of another, yet all must blend in an harmonious whole. Some may have, like Paul, to address the crowd; others, like our Lord himself, may find blessed opportunities among the humble or the few. Let each ask, "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" Then, whether it be in district visitation, Sunday-school teaching, in the great congregation, or in cheery words from a sick-bed, your reward will be sure, if you fulfil your duty "heartily, as unto the Lord."

5. Spring-Cleaning is less needed in the country than in the town. The necessity is proportionate to the surroundings. The further we live in spirit from the defilements of world and flesh and devil, and the more closely we walk in the sunlight and joy of the Lord, the less remains to be done. In the country, Nature, left to herself, asks no more effective aids to growth than the sunshine and the shower; but the smoke and soot of the town may impede her progress. So, too, a worldly or sinful environment demands more frequent and watchful effort to maintain spiritual efficiency and holiness.

6. Spring-Cleaning further teaches us that there are compensations for all toil and trouble. "What cannot be cured must be endured!" The removal of dirt and superfluous rubbish sweetens the home for the rest of the year, and the annual inconveniences are cheerfully faced for the sake of the health and comfort that accrue.

Let us ever be on the look-out for the brighter side of life. We cannot pass through the world without contact with its undesirable accretions and trying circumstances; and all purifying of character must involve a certain amount of pain. But this, like affliction, is, comparatively, "but for a moment," and "worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." "No chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous; nevertheless, afterward, it yieldeth the peaceable fruits of righteousness to them that are exercised thereby."

7. Lastly, old things are replaced by new. Domestic articles wear out after a period of faithful service, as the husband's pocket knows to its cost! We, too, need to replenish our spiritual armoury. Circumstances and friends of former days pass from our ken, and no longer can be summoned to our aid; we exchange the school for college; the home for city life; or we may be called to leave our native land for foreign shores. Life is full of changes; we cannot live in the past.

Every new sphere produces new temptations. Habits form in maturer years which in childhood and youth we had not known. These call for fresh vigilance; else we grow "stale"—or, worse, backslide.

Let us, then, seek fresh supplies of grace day by day, year by year, that our hearts may be a fit "habitation of God, through the Spirit," and our lives become a "sweet savour" unto Jesus Christ, his Son, whose blood "cleanseth us from all sin." G.

Theological Lectures for India.

UNDER appointment as Haskell Lecturer for India and the Far East, Rev. Charles Cuthbert Hall, D.D., president of the Union Theological Seminary, New York City, is now in London, en route for India. It will be remembered that, shortly after the Parliament of Religions held at Chicago, a venerable Christian lady, desiring that the East and the West might be brought nearer together, endowed a lectureship, the incumbent to be chosen by the University of Chicago once in three years, from America or Europe, to proceed to India and lecture upon the leading ideas and truths of Christianity. The first incumbent of the Haskell Lectureship was Dr. John Henry Barrows, president of Oberlin College, Ohio. The second incumbent was Principal Fairbairn, of Mansfield College, Oxford, who returned from India three years ago. President Hall, who succeeds Principal Fairbairn, is at the head of one of the most important theological institutions of the United States.

President Hall is distinctly evangelical in his theological position, catholic in his sympathies, and full of the spirit of missions. Dr. Hall is accompanied by his wife and children, and, we understand, has taken a house in London for the month of April. He intends to spend May and June in Oxford, engaged in completing his Indian lectures. He goes to Scotland for July and August, and, in October, sails for Bombay, to begin work in November.

It is expected that Dr. Hall will deliver the full course of eight lectures in Bombay, Lahore, Allahabad, Calcutta, and Madras, besides making many addresses in various places. From Ceylon he proceeds to China, thence to Korea and Japan. In Japan he expects to repeat his lectures, returning to New York in spring, 1903, viâ Vancouver.

Dr. Hall regards his mission to be, not that of a controversialist, but of a witness to the influence of the leading ideas of the Christian religion upon the personal character of the individual. He has chosen for his subject, "Christian Belief Interpreted by Christian Experience," and from this point of view he will discuss such Christian conceptions as the Nature of God; the Person of Christ as the Manifested God; Christ as Saviour; Sin; Holiness; Immortality.

Dr. Cuthbert Hall was born in New York in 1852, and is a graduate of Williams College, Massachusetts. His divinity course was taken in part at Union Theological Seminary, and in part at London and Edinburgh. He was in the Presbyterian pastorate for twenty years before taking up his present work. He is not related to the late Dr. John Hall, but Rev. Dr. Thomas C. Hall, the son and biographer of Dr. John Hall, is professor of Christian Ethics in Union Seminary, and therefore a colleague of Dr. Cuthbert Hall.

Sunday Railway Traffic.—The April issue of Our Heritage contains, as usual, many items of current events concerning the furtherance of Universal Rest on the Lord's Day. Mr. J. Forbes Moncrieff contributes an interesting character sketch of Peter Jackson, the missionary cabman; and Mr. James Fox Wilson writes on "Sunday Goods Traffic on the Continent." (1d. Partridge.)

The Missionary Problem.

IT is 109 years since William Carey, "the Father and Founder of Modern Missions," landed in India, and as we compare the heathen world to-day with its condition then we exclaim with praise and thanksgiving, "What hath God wrought!" When we think of the long thin line of devoted men and women who have lived laborious lives in making known the Name which is above every name; the many whose days were cut short by disease or martyrdom; the thousands of new creatures in Christ Jesus gathered out of the heathen world; the opened doors which, far less than a century ago, seemed impenetrably closed—we cannot but thank God and take courage.

But, on the other hand, when we consider the infinite cost at which the salvation of the world has been made possible; the declared will of God that all men should be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth; the yearning with which Jesus looked upon the fields white unto harvest; the urgency with which, comparing the plenteous harvest with the fewness of the labourers, He bade us pray the Lord of the harvest that He would thrust forth labourers into his harvest; considering the twelve and the seventy and the single individuals whom He sent out to preach the Kingdom of God; and the last command before He ascended to the Father, to go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature; and, lastly, the promise and the fulfilment of the promise of the Spirit to give wisdom and power to his witnesses—does it not seem strange that the performance falls so far behind the need, and that the light in the heathen world is little more than enough to make the darkness visible?

The watchword of the Student Volunteer Movement, voiced by Mr. John R. Mott, in his book, "The Evangelization of the World in this Generation,"* was surely a message from God to all his churches. This call has now been followed by Rev. Andrew Murray in his "Key to the Missionary Problem"†—another loud appeal from Him that sitteth on the throne to carry into action the brave and noble words spoken at the Œcumenical Convention at New York two years ago.

1. Mr. Murray, in his first chapter, recalls the reiterated affirmation by speaker after speaker at that Convention, that to the pastor belong the privilege and responsibility of solving the missionary problem; on which Mr. Murray says:—"The responsibility all these speakers throw upon the ministry is something very serious, and raises questions of the deepest interest." But "it is one thing for a minister to be an advocate and supporter of missions: it is another and very different thing for him to understand that they are the chief end of the Church, and, therefore, the chief end for which his congregation exists."

This view, that the Church, led by her pastors, is responsible for the fulfilment of the Great Commission, was doubtless the original idea of Carey and his fellows. For, said Bishop Hendrix at the New York Convention:—

> Andrew Fuller, when alarmed at the spiritual lethargy of his Church, preached a sermon on the duty of the Church to give the Gospel to the world; and as he broadened their intellectual life, and quickened their zeal, and stirred their purpose, he followed it up the following Sabbath with a second sermon on the same subject. The third Sabbath the same theme was again presented from his desk; and then men began to inquire: "If the Gospel can save the world, can it not save our own children, our own community?" And from that missionary sermon there sprang one of the most memorable revivals in the history of any church.

But from whatever cause, the lethargy of the Church continued, and the relation between the churches and the societies came to be that the societies assumed the responsibility with the help of the churches, rather than occupying the position of their executive. So distinctly was this the case, that some years ago the L.M.S. returned a vote of thanks to the pastors and people of the London churches for the use of their pulpits on the Missionary Sermon Sunday in May! Not many years ago the chairman, at the annual meeting of one of the societies, referred to the missionaries as the servants of the society; correcting himself, however, he used the word agents instead. But neither does this word define with accuracy the relation between the society and the missionaries, who are "the messengers of the churches, and the glory of Christ."

2. Next to the influence of the pastor and the pulpit in arousing interest in missions, says Mr. Murray, the second place was given to the pen and the Press. The necessity of preparing and circulating, and securing the study of, mission literature, was forcibly put from various points of view.

> Information is the fuel without which the fire cannot burn. Fuel is not fire, and cannot of itself create fire; but where there is fire, fuel is indispensable to keep it burning, or to make it burn with greater intensity. An informed Church will be a transformed Church. Possibly one of the greatest factors in the development of missionary interest is the systematic study of missions. . . .

There follows this weighty paragraph:—

> The torch we hold up for others, illumines our own path. The Church is watching, and working, and praying for immortal souls. Our representatives are out in the thickest of the battle. It is a struggle between the forces of life and death. Are we so swathed in our environment that we care for no tidings of this contest with heathenism and the forces of darkness? If we are in earnest to plant the Church of Christ in the ends of the earth, let us hear the report of progress, and pass it on.
> Ignorance is the source of weakness in missionary effort. Know, and you will believe. Know, and you will pray. Know, and you will help in the front rank.

3. The third great means of awakening interest was that of personal influence exercised through organization. Much was well said of the importance of having children, girls, boys, young people, women, all separately gathered under the influence of leaders, who could guide aright their training for the love and service of the Kingdom; and much, too, of the power woman is already exercising, and must exercise still more largely, in receiving and passing on the wonderful love of Jesus Christ within the churches of the home lands, to train and prepare the future Church for giving itself to its work.

Straws on the surface show the direction of the current; and a passing remark may indicate the trend of opinion on a momentous subject. In the latest report of one of the foremost missionary societies, occurs this piece of intelligence: "Mr. S. came back from furlough with his energy unimpaired by contact with home people." Ought not this to make the ears of home people tingle? The same idea is often uttered in various forms. It ought not to be regarded as a mere pleasantry. The two obstructions to the progress of missions in India which are more frequently mentioned than any other, are the conduct and character of non-Christians in India, and the lack of interest in missions among Christians at home.

We believe that we have come to a time of crisis in the history of Missions. While we believe that the Holy Spirit (the outpouring of which was the promise of the Old Testament) is given to every one the moment he believes in the crucified and glorified Christ, we think it is evident that the power of the Spirit is specially given for testimony to Jesus. (See Acts i. 8, A.V. marg.)

We believe that there is no subject of more vital importance than the command and promise of Jesus to his witnesses, and that nothing more imperatively demands the best consideration of God's most devoted and wisest servants.

If, in the days of old, "they that feared the Lord spake often one to another," is it not desirable that while we seek to acquire and to impart information on the very raison d'être of the Church in the world, we should confer through the Press, as well as by conversation, on the many subjects connected with the missionary enterprise—the will of God, the command of Jesus, the power of the Holy Spirit, the responsibility of the Church; the relation between the Church, the missionaries, and the societies; the extent and character of the education and training to be given; ways of winning the young for Christ—and the many other questions which arise directly we sit down to think on this vital duty, the Church's Great Commission? From Rev. J. Hudson Taylor.

I WANT to write a line to thank you for the refreshment we have derived through the reading of your paper in the various lands in which we have sojourned. It has been very cheering, during my prolonged inability to take part in public service, to hear of the blessing God has given here and there through others of his servants in these perilous times.

And may I take this opportunity of thanking, through you, those who have not only refreshed me and helped on the work of the China Inland Mission by their kind contributions, acknowledged week by week in your columns, but have also gladdened the heart of our Master: He loves a cheerful giver, and it is no small privilege to gladden his heart. We have no way of acknowledging these gifts but that of thanksgiving and prayer, and for several years it has been almost weekly a joy to me to thank God for the gift of each donor under the initials you print, and to ask for them those spiritual, personal, and relative blessings He sees that they most need and desire.

May God bless your paper and increasingly use it! I have rejoiced in it for more than forty years. J. Hudson Taylor.

In the Sunshine.

Now earth has turned her face
Up to the southern sun;
Her wrinkles left by winter's snow,
Melt into smiles, where roses blow—
The spring-time has begun.

The air is full of joy;
The new born myriads sing;
Our hearts rebounding to the song,
Dance out amid the choral throng,
With thrills of life's first spring.

Earth has her many Mays,
But we have only one;
Our years are stages of decay;
Dying we die, and o'er our clay
The summer birds sing on.

Yet there's a spring for us,
A spring of fadeless bloom;
A love that never can grow cold,
A youth that never can grow old,
A triumph o'er the tomb.

In Christ the fulness dwells,
Where God and sinners meet;
Shine in our hearts, O God of love,
Let thine own glory from above,
Enfold us at thy feet!

Samuel and Saul.

Not Ceasing in Prayer.

(1 Sam. xii. 16-25.)

By Rev. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

IN all Samuel's career there is nothing finer than this closing scene of his public action as the judge and leader of the Hebrew nation. Had he died young, his place in the annals of his country, and indeed in history, would have been much lower; and our appreciation of his character much less. Naturally he found it difficult to step down from his premiership, and inaugurate a régime with which he had no sympathy, because it seemed to be a setting aside of Israel's greatest glory in having God for King. But he suppressed his strong personal antipathies, and did his very best to start the nation on the new path it had chosen, selecting a king with the utmost care, and, regardless of personal suffering, bridging over the gulf between the old order and the new.

We cannot turn from the record of this great convocation, assembled before the Lord at Gilgal, to ratify Saul's election, without noticing the repeated allusions to Samuel's power in prayer. He seems to have been the John Knox of his age, as mighty in prayer as in statesmanship. His whole career seems to have been bathed in the spirit of supplication.

As a boy, with hands meekly clasped, as Sir Joshua Reynolds has depicted him, he asked God to speak, whilst his ear was quick and attent to catch his lowest whispers. In the Book of the Psalms he is mentioned as chief among those that call on God's name, and as having been answered (xcix. 6). The Prophet Jeremiah alludes to the wonderful power which he exercised in intercessory prayer, when he pleaded for his people (xv. 1). All Israel knew the long, piercing cry of the prophet of the Lord. In their perils, his intercessions had been their deliverance, and in their battles his prayers had secured them victory (1 Sam. vii. 8, viii. 6). There was "an open road" between God and him, so that thoughts of God's thinking were able to come into his heart; and he reflected them back again with intense and burning desire.

I. Samuel's Prayer for Thunder and Rain.—The heart of man cries out for Divine authentication. In every age a crooked and perverse generation seeks a sign, and in seeking it proves how far it has wandered from the source of light, and become blinded in spiritual vision. If our nature realized its Divine ideal, it would discern God in the ordinary and common incidents of life. But the eyes of the soul are blinded, and men do not see the traces of the Divine footprints. "Lord, thy hand is lifted up, but they see not" (Isa. xxvi. 11).

In default of the faculty of detecting God's presence in the noiseless and ordinary providence of life, man asks for some startling phenomena to prove that God is speaking. Samuel knew this, and he perhaps longed for some Divine corroboration of his words. God's trusted servants are content to work through long years amid persistent resistance and apathy, if only they are assured that they are on the line of the Divine purpose. "And it came to pass at the time of the offering of the evening sacrifice that Elijah the prophet came near, and said, Lord God of Abraham, Isaac, and of Israel, let it be known this day that Thou art God in Israel, and that I am thy servant, and that I have done all these things at thy word." Thus, in a supreme moment, one of the noblest of his successors appealed to God, and his words expressed what was in Samuel's heart at this great hour. He had surrendered his prerogatives, and introduced his successor; had confronted his people with their sins, and announced the heavy penalties that must follow on disobedience; and he yearned that they should hear another voice, asseverating his words, and pressing them home on conscience and on heart.

It was under the influence of these thoughts that he concluded his address and appeal, with the announcement, "Now, therefore, stand still, and see this great thing, which the Lord will do before your eyes. Is it not wheat-harvest to-day? I will call unto the Lord, and He shall send thunder and rain, that ye may perceive and see that your wickedness is great which ye have done in the sight of the Lord, in asking you a king."

During the wheat-harvest, lasting from the middle of May to the middle of June, rain is almost unknown in Palestine, and the occurrence of a thunderstorm, coming as it did at the call of the aged prophet, was too startlingly unusual to be viewed as other than the Divine Authentication of His Claims.

It may be supposed that this incident is altogether without parallel, belonging to the realms of Old Testament story; but there are other methods of Divine authentication on which every true servant of God may rely. When Paul and Barnabas abode for a long time in Iconium, speaking boldly in the Lord, "He gave testimony unto the word of his grace"; and the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews generalizes the experience of the early heralds of the Gospel when he says that the message of God's great salvation was confirmed by them that heard the Lord, "God also bearing them witness, both with signs and wonders, and with divers miracles, and gifts of the Holy Ghost, according unto his own will" (Acts xiv. 3; Heb. ii. 3, 4). It was this that armed the primitive saints with irresistible power. "We are his witnesses," cried the Apostles, "and so is also the Holy Ghost, whom God hath given to them that obey Him." "Our Gospel," wrote the greatest Apostle of all, "came not unto you in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance" (1 Thess. i. 5).

A Personal Question.

May I ask if my fellow-servants realize this—that the Holy Spirit is in the Church to-day, that He is prepared to bear his witness to every true word which is spoken in the name of Jesus, and that He will convict of sin, righteousness, and judgment; so that the faith of our hearers should not stand in the wisdom of man, but in the power of God, God bearing them witness and giving them the Holy Ghost (1 Cor. ii. 1-4; Acts xv. 8).

This is the fatal lack of our preaching. We speak earnestly and faithfully, but we do not look for nor rely on the divine co-witness; we do not understand the communion or fellowship of the Comforter, and our hearers do not hear his voice thrilling their souls, as thunder in the natural world, with the conviction that the things which we speak are the truths of God. Only let the passionate longing of our heart be, "Father, glorify thy name," and voices will come as from heaven, saying, "I have both glorified it, and will glorify it again." Whilst some that stand by may say that "It thundered," others will say "An angel spake" (John xii. 28, 29).

II. Samuel's Unceasing Intercessions.—Terrified by the loud thunder-peals and the torrents of rain, the people were urgent to secure Samuel's intercession on their behalf. They feared for their lives and their property, and entreated him to pray for them. "Pray for thy servants unto the Lord thy God," they said, "that we die not"; and the emphasis they laid on the word thy seemed to indicate that they felt no longer worthy of their ancient prerogative, as the chosen people. Touched with their appeal, and confident that Jehovah only desired to corroborate his word, the aged seer calmed their fears, urged them never to turn aside to vain idols, which could neither profit nor deliver, assured them that the Lord would not forsake them, and ended with the striking words: "Moreover, as for me, God forbid that I should sin against the Lord in ceasing to pray for you."

Samuel realized that prayer was action in the spiritual plane. The energy which we exert in action in the physical sphere becomes prayer in the spiritual. It has often been said, Laborare est orare (to labour is to pray); but the converse is much truer, Orare est laborare (to pray is to labour). "The fervent prayer of a righteous man," says James, "availeth much in its working." Therefore it was, that when the good Epaphras could no longer help his brethren at Colosse by his words and deeds, he betook himself to prayer, and laboured fervently for them all in prayer (Col. iv. 12).

> Work shall be prayer, if all be wrought
> As Thou wouldst have it done:
> And prayer, by Thee inspired and taught,
> Itself with work be one.

What the telescope is to the eye, the bicycle to the foot, the telephone to the voice, and the steam-driven machine to the hand, in enlarging and increasing human power, that is prayer to the soul, because it links us with the mighty power of God, it touches springs that unloose spiritual forces which are eternal in their duration and universal in their scope. "Mighty is he who is mighty in prayer; he has learned how to labour with the energies of God." Samuel viewed

Prayer as a Divine Instinct.

For him to thwart the promptings towards prayer which arose within his soul would be nothing short of sin. "God forbid," he said, "that I should sin against Him in ceasing to pray. Logic or no logic, men pray, and they want to pray. The instinct to do so seems to be part of ourselves. Probably it is not constant, and it is only the saint who remains in the spirit of prayer; but some time or other, and always when the spiritual nature stirs within us, we begin to pray. Prayer is therefore more than petition, it is the movement of the spirit Godward. We recognise our own limitation, and attempt to reach beyond it into the infinite. Therefore, in every true prayer, there is much that cannot be put in words. "The spirit maketh intercession with groanings that cannot be uttered."

Samuel viewed prayer as a trusteeship. He could no longer act as judge, but he felt that the interests of the nation had been entrusted to his hands for the highest ends, and it would be treachery to fail in conserving and prosecuting them at least by his intercessions. Often would he have gone aside, as Moses on the Mount, and as our Lord on the hills that engirdled the blue waters of Galilee, to pour out his soul in strong cryings and tears for his brethren, his kinsmen according to the flesh, who were Israelites, to whom pertained the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises. Often, like the Apostle Paul, he had great heaviness and continual sorrow in his heart. Often, when the Philistines overran the land, and oppressed the people with their tyranny, it must have seemed as though his heart would break. The failure of Saul to realize his ideal only elicited the more strenuous appeals to God to save both king and people, and the victory which we must record in our next must have been due to his eager entreaties.

This is a model which we may all copy. The one question for the Church in the present day is whether she may reckon on a new manifestation of the power of the Holy Spirit, and this is entirely contingent on another question, "Is it possible to bring the whole Church to her knees?" If these words are of weight with any, let me ask them to join in one persevering and heaven-moving appeal to God that He would awake, as in the ancient days, in the generations of old, and do great things like those of which our fathers have told us.

Other Lands.

The Outlook in China.

(Concluded).

NATIVE LABOURERS.

THE development of our work in South Hunan is remarkable for its rapidity and extent. There we have a work going on in two prefectures, two subprefectures, and fifteen counties. Including branch stations, there are about thirty-five centres where believers meet for worship. Our work touches Kwantung on the south, Kwangsi on the west, and Kiang-si on the east. In South Hunan alone there are 300 baptized Christians in connection with the London Missionary Society, and not less than 5,000 adherents. And I would call attention to the fact that all this wonderful growth is to be ascribed to evangelistic labour, as carried on by the native preacher and colporteur.

Our missionaries at Yochou are about to move to Hengchou on account of the importance of the latter as compared with the former. When they go to Hengchou they will go, not to create a new work, but to guard, guide, and develop a work already created under God by our native brethren. Hitherto we, the foreign missionaries, have done little more in Hunan than direct the native workers, and strengthen their hands. I cannot think of the work in Hunan without exclaiming with wonder and gratitude, "What hath God wrought!"

(4) The total baptisms of the year. There were baptized in Central China last year, in connection with our Society's work, 1,250. That is by far the highest figure reached by us in one year. I remember when I thought an annual increase of a few tens very satisfactory, and when an increase of one hundred filled me with wonder. But should we rest satisfied with even the phenomenal increase of 1901? I am looking forward to the time when the annual accessions will be nearer the ten thousand than the thousand.

EDUCATIONAL WORK.

(5) This branch of our work has never been so complete, and in as flourishing condition as it is now. Our elementary day-schools, our High schools for both boys and girls, our normal school, our theological college, are all in a thoroughly healthy condition, and giving great satisfaction. I bless God for the theological college. It is going to help on the whole work in Central China. Even at this early stage it is beginning to tell on it for good in a very marked manner. Whilst enthusiastically attached to the evangelistic department of our work, I devoutly thank God for permitting me to see what I see to-day in connection with the educational department, and for the great privilege of being allowed to take any part, however humble, in bringing it about.

THE HOSPITAL.

(6) This work in connection with the London Missionary Society in Central China has never been so complete and encouraging as it is now. The hospitals, of which we have seven in all, were unusually full during the past year. The physical good done need not be dwelt upon. That must have been very great.

But the good done by our hospitals goes beyond the physical. The seed of Divine truth is sown in many a heart at our hospitals, and many a patient finds within their walls the soul-healing which comes from the knowledge of God in Christ. We are proud of our hospitals, and of our brothers and sisters who are in charge of them. We thank God for both.

TRACT CIRCULATION.

(7) Our circulation last year reached 964,421 tracts. The total pages issued were 7,862,000. That is remarkable, considering the terrible times through which we have just been passing. In 1900, the year of the riots, our circulation amounted to only 3,935,000 pages. The increased circulation of last year shows that the storm has passed away, and that confidence is being restored.

The demand this year will be still greater; but, unfortunately, our funds are exceptionally low, and, unless help comes from our home friends, the circulation must fall below the mark reached last year.

NATIVE FELLOW WORKERS.

(8) We have great joy in our native helpers. Many of them are undoubtedly true-hearted servants of Jesus Christ. What could we do without these noble-hearted men and women? Where would our work have been but for them? Where would our work in Hunan have been but for the evangelists and colporteurs who have been working so earnestly and faithfully in that great province? And they are at it from year's end to year's end. No vacation for them, no furloughs. We come and we go, but they remain for ever. Now and again we are disappointed in them; but this ought not to surprise us. The wonder is that the defections and disappointments are so few. From the depth of my heart do I thank God for the noble band of native workers that He has raised from among this people to be our fellow-labourers in every department of our glorious enterprise, and most earnestly do I pray that they may be multiplied a hundredfold. May I ask the readers of The Christian to join me in this prayer?

CHINA OPEN AS NEVER BEFORE.

We commence this new year with bright prospects—never brighter. China is open as never before. The officials are more friendly than ever; the people are more accessible than ever. We are in the midst of a wonderful movement towards Christianity. There are glorious possibilities before us; there are opportunities such as we have never known before. But the new times bring with them new problems, new difficulties, new dangers. Pray that God may give the missionaries in China all the wisdom and grace they need for these times. Very earnestly do I ask your readers to pray for China at this crisis in her history and for the Church in China. Pray for me.

Extension in Egypt.

THE fourth Annual Report of the Egypt Mission Band is full of testimony to the faithfulness of God, and of stimulus to his people whose hearts go out to the darkened nations. Many will receive with deep interest the following particulars of extension.

"The year witnessed an extension of our work, first of all to Zifta—a large town in the Gharbiyeh Province on the west of the Damietta branch of the river. The American Mission have a school both here and in Mit Ghamr, on the opposite bank, but no resident missionary, and they very cordially welcomed Mr. William Bradley's co-operation in the work. Then Mr. John G. Logan started work in Suez, which has not had any missionary, and in which he has been successful in opening a book depôt and reading-room. In Alexandria changes have also taken place. The Mission Headquarters station has been moved nearer the work in the Bâb Sidra quarter, and a girls' school has been opened by Mrs. J. M. Cleaver, with the assistance of her sister, Miss M. B. White, and Mrs. Liggins. There has been progress and extension all through the year. Our forces, too, have been strengthened by the addition of Mrs. T. E. Swan and Mr. W. W. Cash, whom we welcome as from the Lord. We have also added two new native assistants, one a lady teacher for the girls' school, and the other a colporteur at Suez. We would desire to record our gratitude to our Father, who has again met all our need."

Recent publications also include a booklet recounting the circumstances attending the origin of the effort with a description of the field; and another giving brief life stories of the labourers. The honorary secretary is Mr. W. J. W. Roome, Kingscourt, Belfast.

British Syrian Schools.

WRITING from Smyrna, after a visit to Beyrout, Rev. H. B. Macartney says:—"A most beautiful little work for God was founded at Beyrout by Mrs. Bowen Thompson in 1860, the year when the fanatical Druses made common cause with the Mohammedans for the destruction of the Christian population of Lebanon and Damascus, slew 11,000 males, burned 3,000 habitations, caused 4,000 to die from destitution, and made 20,000 widows and orphans! Turn from the sickening sight of 15,000 dead, and the spectacle of the wretched fugitives lining the Mediterranean shore, and picture to yourselves a lady of lovely character, the very impersonation of English piety, coming to the rescue, and founding 'the British Syrian Mission.' Her work was an abiding one, for to-day the Mission staff consists of twenty English ladies, twenty-five Bible women and Scripture readers, and 111 native teachers. Between 4,000 and 5,000 children were taught last year in their fifty-six schools; upwards of 4,000 received medical advice and assistance, and seventy girls were being trained at head-quarters, in an atmosphere, intellectual and spiritual, second to few in the whole world. And yet the report for the year ending June 30, 1901, closes with the news that, in consequence of deaths in England, general lukewarmness, and lack of information, another £1,000 a year is absolutely essential if the Mission is to be carried on without retrenchment.

"This fact has kindled my soul. I want to see the £1,000 restored at once, and interest revived on the Continent and in the British Isles; so I offered to visit Beyrout, Tyre, Lebanon, Damascus, and Baalbec during this February and March, with a view to public advocacy by sermons and meetings in April, March, and June, without any drain on the funds of the Society, with its tiny income of only £5,000 a year."

Mr. Macartney writes of gracious guidance being accorded him from on high during his journeyings. He saw interesting sights, and had many opportunities of testimony for Christ. He was also enabled to speak cheering words to many workers in out-of-the-way places.

Seamen at Dunkerque.

AS the Sailors' Rest and Reading Rooms at Dunkerque have become more widely known among Christians, their interest and practical sympathy have deepened. The directors, Mr. and Mrs. Stewart Mackenzie, continue to receive encouragement in their labours from many lands. Every opportunity is taken of setting before the seamen visiting the port the True and Living Way. Many cases of thorough conversion have been witnessed during the past year, and the workers are constantly cheered by hearing from men whose lives have been turned into a new channel as the outcome of their visit to the Sailors' Rest.

A young German writes after three years' experience as a Christian:—"Thanks for your kind letter. I can see you have not forgotten me, and I shall never forget you or the Sailors' Rest, where I found the right way. It gives me great joy to tell you I have now a Christian home. Under all circumstances I look to Jesus." Another writes on the eve of his departure:—"I hope I shall return to Dunkerque. The few nights I was able to get among you did more towards bringing me back to my Saviour than anything else." The Mission holds a distinct placé in its ministry to the spiritual wants of seafaring men. During last year the workers make 760 visits to the ships and thirty-nine to the hospital, while the seamen who visited the Rest numbered nearly three thousand. An extensive distribution of Gospel literature has also been maintained, and no effort has been spared in accomplishing the object for which the Home was founded—the exercise of Christian influence upon those engaged in seafaring life. Mr. Stewart Mackenzie may be addressed, Sailors' Rest, Dunkerque, France.

Y.M.C.A. Work in India.

By ROBERT P. WILDER.

AFTER twelve years of faithful and self-denying service for the Indian National Union, Mr. D. McConaughy has found it necessary to leave India. His strong and able leadership will be greatly missed. The Indian National Council of the Young Men's Christian Associations have asked me to succeed him as National General Secretary. In undertaking this important work I desire your earnest prayers and hearty co-operation.

The Association field in India embraces the young men of the Empire, who number at least 60,000,000. These we classify as follows:—Undergraduate students (including school boys), other educated Indians, Europeans, uneducated Indians, Eurasians, and Anglo-Indians. This field the Young Men's Christian Association seeks to cultivate in co-operation with other Christian organizations. There are at present forty-one student associations, with 2,052 members, and 110 general Associations, with 4,504 members. There is a National organization with a council of twenty-one members, representing all sections of India, and four district organizations, namely, the Bombay Presidency, Punjab, North Travancore, and Cochin, and the Malabar Unions.

To cultivate this field there are twelve foreign and seven Indian secretaries, of whom the following are engaged in National work:—Mr. J. Campbell White, college secretary; Mr. George S. Eddy, for Southern India; Mr. S. V. Azariah, Tamil Secretary; Mr. S. W. Sarvis, office secretary; an office assistant, and myself, general secretary.

THE MEN AND THEIR WORK.

Mr. Campbell White has for seven-and-a-half years rendered invaluable service to the Calcutta Association and the national work. The fine College Department building, where our National office is located, stands as a monument to his prayer of faith and perseverance of effort. He is general secretary of the Calcutta Association, and hence can give only a portion of his time to the national work.

Mr. Eddy's labours on behalf of the College Committee, and as travelling secretary of the Student Volunteer Movement, are well known. Two years ago he secured leave for language study. At the last meeting of the National Council the following resolution was carried:—"That Mr. George Eddy be welcomed back to the Indian National Council in July as a secretary for Southern India, when he plans to complete his language study." This knowledge of a vernacular will be of great service to him.

Mr. Azariah, who has given such satisfaction in his work for our movement, will continue to labour in the Tamil field, co-operating with Mr. Eddy in the cultivation of the 108 associations in the Madras Presidency.

Mr. Sarvis, who came from the Mount Hermon School founded by Mr. D. L. Moody, is not only thoroughly furnished from a business point of view, but is also trained and qualified for a strong spiritual work. He will serve as office secretary for the Calcutta student work as well as for the national movement.

The general secretary was born in India, and knows the Marathi language. He began his work for Indian students in 1892. As National College Secretary he has already visited nearly all parts of India.

FEATURES OF THE WORK.

The National Council is seeking to cultivate the field by means of the printed page. It issues a monthly magazine, "The Young Men of India," with a supplement, "The Inquirer." It has published fifteen pamphlets, bearing upon Christian life and work, and six reports. The Student Volunteer Movement of India and Ceylon, which is in close affiliation with the Student Department of the Y.M.C.A., has in addition six pamphlets.

The Council endeavours, through conventions and camps, to conserve and extend the movement. My report shows how many such gatherings have been held. The National Convention will be held hereafter triennially, and in the intervening years district conferences will be arranged in various parts of the Empire. These are to be bi-lingual when it is desirable to have the vernacular as well as English employed.

God's blessing has rested upon the work. Mr. McConaughy's report shows the growth in property, but it also shows what is far more important, the growth in membership. My own report reveals cause for gratitude in the development along the lines of Bible study and mission study. During the past two years the general associations have increased from 104, with a membership of 4,275, to 110, with a membership of 4,504—a gain of 229; and the student associations have increased from twenty-seven in 1899, with a membership of 990, to forty-one in 1901, with a membership of 2,052—an increase in two years of 1,062.

At the sixth National Convention held in December, 1901, the executive was instructed to establish a special department for work among railway men. Of the 350,177 railway employés in India, 5,867 are Europeans, and 7,295 are Eurasians. In addition, many important cities are calling for secretaries, and thirty branches of the Soldiers' Christian Association have voted unanimously in favour of closer affiliation with the Y.M.C.A. These calls are incentives to earnest prayer and effort. The old doors open more widely, and new doors stand ajar.

PLANS OF THE FUTURE.

Among the resolutions passed at the Allahabad Convention are the following:—

(1) That steps be taken to secure and train an increased number of Indian secretaries.

(2) That the evangelistic work be pressed more earnestly by all the Associations.

(3) That the Associations plan to increase greatly the number of young men in Bible circles and classes, and also the number of young men observing the morning watch.

(4) That the Associations, especially those working among students, seek to increase the number of young men who shall devote their lives to direct Christian work, and also to augment the force of voluntary Christian workers among laymen.

While the foreign secretaries are maintained by Associations and individuals in Europe and North America, the support of the Indian secretaries is provided for entirely by funds raised in India. The National Convention, held in December, 1901, passed the following resolution:—

"That in view of the growing demands of the work the Indian National Council be authorized to increase its budget to 3,000Rs. annually, and that the associations be urged to contribute more generally and more liberally, &c."

To publish literature, to support Indian secretaries, and to conduct correspondence with the associations this sum is none too large. It is hoped that friends who are purposing to give will do so now in order that the work may not suffer financially during the absence of the general secretary of the National Council on seven months' leave out of India. I plan to sail March 14 for much-needed rest and to represent our movement at conferences in Denmark and Norway. Communications should be addressed to Rev. A. B. Wann, Hon. Treasurer, 86, College Street, Calcutta.

School Work in Mexico.

ABOUT ten years ago, at Mr. Moody's Conference of Christian Workers at Northfield, I met Miss M. L. Hammond, principal of the Protestant Normal School for Teachers at Chihuahua, Mexico. I have remained in correspondence with her ever since, because her work is most interesting. The young girls, whom she trains, go afterwards as teachers to different parts of Mexico, and carry the light of the Gospel with them. Some have posts in government schools. Many of them are native Indians. These teachers are a potent factor in the evangelization of Mexico. At the present time the school is in great need of standard reference books (Spanish) for its library. As the readers of The Christian are partakers in good work carried on all over the world, perhaps some might feel inclined to help. I will gladly forward any money sent to me for the purpose. A CALL FROM KABYLIA.

AMONG the missionaries in Kabylia whom God has owned in recent years are Mr. and Mrs. Emile Rolland (Djemaa-Sahridj, par Mekla, Tizi-Ouzon) who were invited by M. Saillens (of Paris), to settle there in 1896. Two English ladies had been at work in the district for some years; but a plot had been laid against them by some fanatic Moslems and a Roman Catholic priest. The authorities had been persuaded that the ladies were giving gunpowder to the natives to enable them to rebel against the French Government, and the work was stopped for some months. Since 1896 the English and French workers have laboured in harmony, realizing the faithfulness of the Lord in the regular supply of their needs; but during the last year many friends have fallen off, and there is urgent need for help in this evangelistic effort.

LITERATURE FOR EGYPT.

It has long been felt that one of the great needs of missionaries in Egypt is a printing-press under the control of trustees representing all the Protestant agencies at work in the country. A statement on the subject issued last summer elicited a warm response from friends in different quarters; and Miss van Sommer (Cuffnells, Weybridge, Surrey) then placed herself in communication with all the bodies of missionaries involved. In every case the prospect of such a forward movement has been hailed with the deepest satisfaction. A further proposal for the formation of a Christian Literature Society could then take definite shape. The spread of education makes growing demands of all available supplies of literature; and efficiency in this department could be greatly increased by such united action as has been secured. A sum of £175 has already been contributed; but much more is required. Friends interested should place themselves in communication with Miss van Sommer.

ARMENIAN ORPHANS IN CONSTANTINOPLE.

The report of the Friends' Armenian Mission in Constantinople shows that the work is flourishing in every department save the financial.

"Our work here in Constantinople is both varied and very interesting. Our orphans—ten Armenians, two Greeks, and one Bulgarian—are a nice group. They vary in age from four-and-a-half to fifteen years of age. The younger ones are studying in their own language, but the older ones are now taking their lessons in English. They are now able, by doing a little needlework, to buy their own lesson books."

Of the industrial department, Miss Ann Burgess writes: "It was started at the time of the massacres, as we felt it a pity to distribute so much relief without allowing the people to make some return. At first we gave out sewing and knitting to be done, but this failed owing to insufficient sales, so by degrees we took up Oriental embroideries, of which we have this winter sold £50 worth weekly. We feel very thankful for this successful branch which gives us abundant contact with the people."

The subscriptions are insufficient to meet the demands made on the funds; and the latest statement is that £150 is due to the treasurer (Mr. J. Hingston Fox, 4, Gresham Road, Cambridge).

CONVERTED CHILDREN IN ZULULAND.

Mr. Norman W. Keyes (of the South Africa General Mission) describes a time of gracious refreshing at Makowe Station during the past Christmas season. At one gathering seven boys and two girls confessed their sins, and cried to God for forgiveness, their repentance seeming deep and earnest.

"Then we gathered around the Lord's table; and it was joy indeed to hear one after another of those who had that evening cried to the Lord for forgiveness now asking Him to take their hands, feet, and tongue, and use them for his glory."

Christian Education in Asia Minor.

Rev. Dr. CHARLES C. TRACY.

A PECULIAR interest attaches to the story of Anatolia College, at Marsovan, Asia Minor. It is one of the centres from which the light of the Gospel is being shed abroad throughout the less known portions of the Turkish dominions, and experience has already proved abundantly that the effort has been crowned with the blessing of the Lord.

The founder of the college, Rev. Dr. Charles C. Tracy, was born in 1838, in the State of Pennsylvania. His parents were English settlers who, like many others, had a hard struggle for existence in those early pioneering days. The only worldly prospect for their son was to share the same toilsome lot; but spiritually he was highly privileged, for both father and mother were praying people. They did not live to see the answer to their intercession; but when their much-loved son was eighteen years of age, he learned to love and to serve their Lord and Saviour. As another outcome, he believed, of these same prayers he was led to devote himself whole-heartedly to the ministry of the Gospel. After a course of study at Williams College, under Dr. Mark Hopkins, he obtained his more distinctly theological training at Union Seminary, New York.

Proceeding at once to the foreign mission field when he graduated in 1867, Mr. Tracy gave his life to evangelistic and educational work at Marsovan. As time passed, the latter department of his work gradually assumed such proportions as to lead to the opening in 1881 of a High School, which has further developed into the present Anatolia College. The foundation principle and motto of the College is:—

"THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN FIRST."

It is firmly believed that any supposed inconsistency between this and liberal education is entirely mistaken, and that the promise, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and all (necessary) things shall be added unto you," has wider scope than the mere interests of food and raiment. Whatever the microscope may discover, the calculus evolve, the laboratory disclose, or spectrum analysis bring to light, they only deal with phenomena, and play upon the outskirts of truth. Education without a true religious basis is built on sand; no man can be truly educated except as a child of God.

If there is, or ever was, any disagreement between modern science and religion, it is only in this respect that the former is too often chargeable with scorning or neglecting the most important part of truth, and building distorted structures; or that the latter too often substitutes prescription, prejudice, or superstition for sublime moral truth.

Anatolia College has prospered and enjoyed the Divine blessing in a remarkable manner. Beginning with only four boys, it has grown and extended its influence, till there are now 250 students, and the institution holds educational leadership in one-half of Asia Minor. A companion institution for girls has nearly 200 pupils; and, under the shadow of these schools, a hundred orphans, relics of the terrible events of 1895, are sheltered and taught. A hospital, with a surgeon and two English nurses, is located on the college grounds. Nearly six hundred young people, in all, are being taught, trained, and pointed to God.

While the effort is made to ground young men and women in sound knowledge, to encourage broad mental development, equal effort is expended in preparing them for practical life. The desire is to train young men and women among and for their own people, without weaning them from their own flesh and blood.

Great as the poverty of the people is, there is a surprising willingness to sacrifice for the sake of education. While it cannot be denied that in many cases the hope of bettering the worldly condition acts as a strong incentive, there is appreciation of something deeper. It is no small gratification to note that the reason why this institution has become so popular is the fact that everything immoral is sternly excluded. No sort of vice is forgiven. As this must serve as the model for rising schools, and must determine the character of those here trained, a high, and, as some would no doubt say, a Puritanic standard is insisted upon, and tobacco and intoxicating drinks are absolutely excluded.

In accordance with the needy circumstances of most of the people, a self-help system has been brought into requisition in connection with Anatolia College. Furniture-making, book-binding, tailoring, shoe-making are carried on, and poor students may pay a part of their expenses by labour. A cluster of benefits gathers round this plan—the students are made more self-reliant; they get good physical exercise, resulting in better mental condition; they get facility and readiness for life, become less tempted to bookishness and theorizing, learn the value of money, and are made more manly than when they depend on others for support. There is a great gain in economy. Instead of giving direct financial aid to the needy student, he is required to work and earn it; the work produced by his labour, in the form of furniture, &c., is sold, and most of the outlay recovered, to be used again in the same way. Often the best shop-workers stand first also as students in the class-room.

Around the college there is gathered a body of nearly thirty labourers, ladies and gentlemen, foreign and native. All the teachers in the schools are Christians, and are essentially of one heart and spirit. This is not simply a scholastic effort—a vast field for evangelical effort lies round about it, in which twenty centres of light are planted, and self-supporting churches and schools are coming forward.

Through many a furnace fire has this cause passed. Financial difficulties have been and are still heavy upon it, requiring a living and breathing faith; but He in whom the workers have trusted has never failed them, even at times when death and destruction threatened to swallow up all in an hour. The prayers, sympathy, and material aid of friends in England and Scotland has been so important an element in the prosecution of the work, that it is difficult to see how it could have been sustained without them. The outlook is now more hopeful than ever. The Spirit and power of the Lord are in these institutions—to Him alone be the glory.

A short time ago Dr. Tracy wrote:—"We have had a delightful stirring of spiritual life in the college, and about twenty young men have come out fully and decidedly for Christ and his service. The prayer-meetings among them are very tender and powerful. There are many groups of three to six meeting privately in rooms every evening to pray together. This has all been very silent and unpretentious, and, I believe, very deep. The movement began one Sunday morning when I went into the place where forty young men were together, and gave them a direct invitation from Christ, to follow Him at once. They 'rose, left their nets, and followed Him'. Others have been coming in ever since."

A Springtide Lesson.

The earth respondeth to the sun!
And at his warm and loving kiss,
Awakens to a springtide bliss;
Puts on her beautiful array,
The blossoms of her wedding day;
Till the bare earth on which we tread,
Is with ten thousand jewels spread.

The earth respondeth to the sun!
And wood and valley thrill with song,
As his bright gold car rolls along;
And thrush and nightingale awake
The silence of the budding brake;
While cuckoo tells us he has come,
To make with us his summer home.

Am I responding to the sun?
And at my Saviour's gracious kiss,
Awaking to a Springtide bliss?
Have I put on my fair array,
The garments of love's wedding day?
Are graces springing in my heart,
Flowers for each lone and hidden part?

Let me respond, Lord, to thy sun,
The goodness of thy glorious May,
Till songs re-echo o'er the way,
And every budding bough shall tell,
Thy tenderness unsearchable.
While the lost notes return once more,
And heaven's glad songs cheer earth's old shore.

The earth respondeth to the sun!
But not the busy crowded street.
On its hard stones no flow'rets greet
The touches of the life-charged beam.
Too often as the street I seem,
Lord, make me as the wood, the field,
Responsive flowers of grace to yield.

Pauperism and its Base.—In the third week of February there were within the London area no fewer than 107,438 paupers in receipt of relief, in addition to 1,007 vagrants who received assistance from the guardians. These figures mark an increase of about one thousand in the twelve months; but, startling as they are, they do not compare unfavourably with the statistics furnished from other centres. At Bristol, for instance, there are 9,000 paupers receiving relief at a cost of £120,000 per annum, notwithstanding the vast local charitable funds and the large outlay in private almsgiving. Of course a large amount of poverty is due to unpreventible causes, but the base of most of the poverty in these islands is the miserable drink traffic. As the revenues of the brewing and distilling companies go up and the dividends of their shareholders increase, the ratepayers' burden develops. It is a simple question of cause and effect.

A Missioner to Public Schools

Rev. NORMAN BENNET.

THE recent acceptance by Rev. Norman Bennet of the parochial charge of Hamworthy, in Dorset, is an event of deep interest to a large number of the rising generation.

Among the many missionary agencies which, during the last few years, have been in operation, perhaps one of the most interesting has been the work among school-boys, which he has, till now, carried on as missioner under the Church Parochial Mission Society. For seven years Mr. Bennet has laboured in this work, since, called to it as he believed by God, he left his curacy, under Archdeacon Farrar, at St. Margaret's, Westminster, and ventured to act as a pioneer workman in approaching public-schools. Since that time he has spent his life in one continuous round of school visits term by term, during which he has been brought into contact with thousands of school-boys, and been able to speak to them, in the midst of the vicissitudes of school-life, of the power of God unto salvation as it is in Christ. Every Sunday has found him in some school chapel, and week by week he has had opportunities of speaking to the boys, either in big school or in class-room in a less formal way. As a lecturer on Palestine and missionary topics, Mr. Bennet has also found a real opening. Without doubt, the possibilities of such a work were never so great as they are to-day. To a man who has got a true zeal for God, and "sanctified common-sense," the openings are many. Much work can be, and has been, accomplished by head-masters, house-masters, chaplains, and form-masters in the schools; but, as Archdeacon Sinclair has well put it, in a letter to Mr. Bennet, "there are many head-masters who are glad to welcome the words of one who is outside the school circle." This has been abundantly proved by Mr. Bennet during the long period he has spent in the repeated visitation of some forty schools and colleges. The possibilities of the work will be understood when it is known that there are no fewer than 1,300 names on Mr. Bennet's register of school-boys, every one of whom is personally known to the missioner.

In his work, Mr. Bennet has tried in all cases to bring himself into line with the wishes of the head-masters with whom he has from time to time been staying, and to work in such a way as shall be absolutely in accord with their ideas. In some cases he has taken courses of divinity lectures; in others he has given a series of addresses at the time of confirmation, or again he has thrown his energy into the working up of some school Scripture Union.

In the holiday times, again, Mr. Bennet has not been idle, but has invariably found his place, either at a school-boys' holiday or seaside mission, or in going further afield with parties of boys and University men to Switzerland or the Mediterranean. On two occasions of late he has pioneered missionary cruises in conjunction with Sir Matthew Dodsworth, whose zeal in connection with boys' work is so well known in the south. Those who have gone on these cruises have been brought face to face with definite missionary work; and it is hoped that someone will be found by the Church Parochial Mission Society to take up the thread of the work which is now being relinquished by Mr. Bennet, and follow it up in the future.

From a school-boy's standpoint the work has been, without doubt, an intense reality, as thousands of letters received by Mr. Bennet each year conclusively prove. Only this Christmas, on his return from Palestine, some 150 letters were waiting to be opened and answered.

The difficulties of school-life are great, and anyone who has sympathy with boys can do an incalculable amount of good, if brought sympathetically into touch with them in their actual conditions.

In 1900, owing to a breakdown during one of his school engagements, Mr. Bennet was ordered to take a sea voyage, and eventually found himself in South Africa, where he was for some little time occupied as an army chaplain. On his return from the front, he proceeded, on the advice of friends, to attempt the same work among the schools of the colony as he has been doing at home. He visited most of the public-schools at the Cape, made the acquaintance of hundreds of boys, and conducted during the Christmas holidays a school-boys' camp, as well as special missions, at Wynberg and Cape Town, all of which were crowned with success. Mr. Bennet's correspondents are now all over the world, and his enforced surrender, by reason of his health breaking down, of the work so dear to his heart, is no small trial to him.

Italians in London.—During the past winter a useful work has been carried on among Italians in London by Rev. Ernesto Grillo, a convert from the Church of Rome. Considering his brilliant University career and his marvellous oratorical gifts, Signor Grillo would have attained high office had he remained in the Church of Rome. Preferring to follow Divine leading, he was admitted into the ministry and has since devoted himself to the work of evangelizing his fellow-countrymen who have taken up their abode in London. The meetings are held in St. James' School, Clerkenwell Green, and are largely attended, the audience often comprising numbers of supposed Anarchists. In addition to his evangelistic labours Signor Grillo devotes three nights a week to the teaching of the English language to his fellow-countrymen, and being full of faith and courage he is by no means daunted or disheartened by acts of seeming rudeness of zealous partizans of the Roman Church. The lack of practical support is the hindrance to the extension of this work, which is heartily endorsed by local clergy. Signor Grillo may be addressed at 31, Myddelton Square, Pentonville, E.C.

Dr. Valpy's Verse.

OUR attention was recently called by an esteemed correspondent to a touching incident in the life of Dr. William Marsh, who was so greatly admired and warmly beloved by British Christians fifty years ago. In words that are substantially reproduced from the "Life," written by the well-known author (still with us, we rejoice to know) of "Memorials of Captain Hedley Vicars," the narrative reaches us as follows:—

Dr. Marsh was [in 1837] the centre and life of the Bible readings held daily at Lord Roden's seat—Tollymore Park. In the course of one of them, he told the story of the blessed change which took place in the views of his old school-fellow, Dr. Valpy, repeating a verse he had written as his confession of faith not long before his death:—

In peace let me resign my breath
And thy salvation see;
My sins deserve eternal death—
But Jesus died for me!

Lord Roden requested Dr. Marsh to write out the lines for him, and then fastened the paper over the mantelpiece in his study.

Some time after Lord Roden had adopted this verse for the motto of his study, one of the aged heroes of Waterloo, General Taylor, came to visit him at Tollymore. He had not, at that time, thought much on the subject of religion, and preferred to avoid all discussion of it. But whenever he came into the study, to talk with his friend alone, Lord Roden remarked that the eyes of the old soldier invariably rested for a few moments upon the motto over the mantelpiece. At length he broke the ice by saying, "Why, General, you will soon know that verse by heart!" "I know it now by heart," replied the General, with emphasis and feeling.

From the time of that visit a change came over his spirit and life. No one who was intimately acquainted with him could doubt its reality. During the following two years, he corresponded regularly with Lord Roden about the things which concerned his peace, always concluding his letters by quoting the favourite motto. At the end of that time, the physician who had attended General Taylor wrote to Lord Roden to say that his friend had departed in peace; and that the last words which fell from his dying lips were those which he had learned to love in life-time:—

In peace let me resign my breath
And thy salvation see;
My sins deserve eternal death—
But Jesus died for me!

It happened, in after years, that Lord Roden told this story at the house of a near neighbour. A young relative of the family, an officer in the army, who had recently returned from the Crimea, heard the story, but turned carelessly away. Some months later, Lord Roden received the intelligence that his young acquaintance was in a rapid decline, and was desirous of seeing him without delay. As he entered the sick-room the dying man stretched out both hands to welcome him, at the same moment repeating those simple lines. "They have been God's message," he said, "of peace and comfort to my heart in this illness when brought to my memory, after days of darkness and distress, by the Holy Ghost, the Comforter."

Towards the close of 1858—towards the end of his fruitful life—a last visit was paid to Dr. Marsh by his old acquaintance, Mr. Fuller Maitland. In the course of a conversation, designed to lead his friend to the Saviour, the aged clergyman quoted Dr. Valpy's beautiful lines. Mr. Maitland saw their force, and said, "I must learn that." So Dr. Marsh wrote down the verse for him. As he received the paper, Mr. Maitland said: "I shall wear it near my heart." It was found there after his death.

SUNDAY, April 13. Exodus xxviii.

NOTICE that three times over, in the first paragraph (1-5; see also v. 41), the Lord says that the priests are called to minister to Himself. Is not this the office of every believer? Let us not be so concerned about his work, or about our own salvation, as to forget that the Lord claims our ministry to Himself. It was when the little group of earnest souls at Antioch were ministering to the Lord that the Holy Spirit said, Separate me Barnabas and Saul (Acts xiii. 1-4). Remember Heb. xiii. 15.

Thrice, also, we are told that Aaron was to bear the names of the children of Israel before God (12, 21, 29, 30). It was as though God desired to impress upon his people the fact that they were never absent from his heart. He loved them notwithstanding all their sins. They were graven on his memory and heart. "Behold," He says in another place, "I have graven thee upon the palms of my hands, and thy walls are continually before Me." How blessed it is to know that each name is on a jewel near the heart of Christ. Not that we are jewels, but that we may and shall be, when the work of grace is done. Love idealizes, and counts us jewels in the light of its ideal and purposes. Ah, Lord, how canst Thou say of any of us, "Thou art all fair, my love"?

Those jewels have long since been lost. Somewhere in the rubble of the ages they lie in splintered pieces. No longer does the ruby sparkle in the kiss of the sunbeams, or the emerald gleam with living green; not now does the mystic light tremble in the stone of Urim and Thummim; never again shall the music of those bells ring around the feet of the anointed priest—but the reality of which all these were a type abides for evermore in Jesus. Jesus bears our names (12), bears our judgment (30), and bears the iniquity of our holy things (38). In Him we are accepted before the Lord (38; and Eph. i. 6).

MONDAY, April 14. Exodus xxix.

My Saviour, from this chapter, with its consecration and investiture of Aaron, my heart turns to Thee, who wast made, not after the order of Aaron, but of Melchisedec. No need that Thou shouldest be washed with the water of cleansing, for Thou wert ever the immaculately Holy One. No need to invest Thee with glorious and cunningly-devised robes, for Thou hast naturally and for evermore the very virtues which those robes symbolized. Thine is the splendid ephod of woven colour, attesting thy rich and majestic nature; thine the mitre of holy anointing, and thine the crown of royalty. No bullock of sin-offering is needed to put away thy sin (14). No ram of sweet savour is needed to attest thy entire consecration to thy Father's will (18). No peace-offering is needed (19). No one or two members of thy body are set apart for holy service, for all Thou art and hast was freely given for us, and is being given continually (20). Thou hast an unchangeable Priesthood. Let us partake of the spirit of thy consecration, until our whole nature be inflamed; but treat us not as strangers (32, 33). Only lay us on that altar of thy whole consecration to God, which sanctifies the giver and the gift (37).

Notice the daily offering of the lambs, morning and evening, emblem of our perpetual renewal of those vows of consecration, which though made once for all, must ever come back and back to mind and heart. The closing verses are very precious: I will sanctify . . . I will dwell . . . they shall know . . . I am the Lord.

TUESDAY, April 15. Exodus xxx.

Incense was necessary to counteract the effect of the constant burning of carcases on the brazen altar. But what was physically essential was also spiritually symbolical, for throughout the Bible the fragrance of the ascending smoke of incense was significant of the lifting up of hands and heart in prayer (Rev. viii. 5; Mal. i. 11; Acts x. 7, 35). But notice, in type and in reality, all prayer is only acceptable to God through the blood and sacrifice of the great sin-offering (10).

The half-shekel referred to in the next paragraph (11-16) is that which the officials required of the Lord (Matt. xvii. 27). It was a soul-ransom, and though no one could redeem his brother (Ps. xlix. 7), yet the Lord says, "Take and give for Me and thee"—not two half-shekels, but one whole shekel because He stands with us, and covers us. If you dare to give up all for Him, and let Him take you with Him through the world, He will pay your way.

The anointing oil and the incense were compounded on an entirely original receipt, which was in no wise to be imitated. The various ingredients were obtained from Arabia and Ceylon, but there was no difficulty in procuring them, as caravans were perpetually journeying towards Egypt laden with such wares, for which there was great demand in Egypt for the purposes of embalming (Gen. xxxvii. 25). But when we consider that the one stood for the inimitable grace of the Holy Spirit, the effects of which cannot be counterfeited, and that the other was typical of true and availing prayer, we perceive the significance of the prohibition of its use for any but the Divine service.

WEDNESDAY, April 16. Exodus xxxi.

For special service God gives special qualifications. Do not lose heart. If the new age demands new and special adaptations, the minds and hearts by which such developments are to be prepared will be forthcoming, though even these will not be primarily creators and originators, but seers, who behold the Divine plan, and see how to carry it into effect. The plan is there, but the method for executing it leaves scope for their ingenuity, under the guidance of the Spirit. It is good to devise and to work. God works in us to will and to work.

Uri is supposed to have been Miriam's husband. Aholiab was joined with Bezaleel, a member of the smallest, with a son of the largest, tribe—and this was as it should be. God's dealings are absolutely impartial, and often from the obscurest families have come the greatest geniuses. Let us not envy those who are called to special service, lest in doing so we put ourselves in collision with Him who has specially qualified and called them.

Notice the reiteration of the Divine command for the keeping of the Sabbath. It might be inquired, why it should occur in this precise place. A moment's reflection will answer the question. It is clear that the whole camp became immediately and deeply interested in the common work of preparing the great national Tabernacle; and there was grave fear lest in their eagerness to complete it, the people might infringe on the rest day. In all service, even for God, and of the most sacred character, there must be intervals of respite, when the heat of the wheels of life may abate, and time shall be afforded for communion with Him for whom we work. Even in Tabernacle building, there must be times of rest.

THURSDAY, April 17. Exodus xxxii.

This was a violation of the second commandment. The people did not intend to go after other gods, but they longed for a material representation of Jehovah. Perhaps Moses had been their cherished manifestation of God. "The man that brought us up out of the land of Egypt." The human heart finds it so difficult to conceive of God, apart from some visible representation; hence, in infinite mercy, He has given us the Man Christ Jesus, as the Mediator between God and man.

The saddest thing in this chapter is the weakness of Aaron. Too often the priest-nature is associated with a despicable duplicity. One strong word from him at the beginning of the outbreak would have stayed it, and all its fatal consequences. He hoped, however, to arrest his people in their purpose by demanding from them their earrings, supposing that they would be loth to part with such costly ornaments. In dealing with children, congregations, or mobs, be strong and fear not. If you do what is right, you always have an ally, the voice of conscience, which adds its potent force to yours. Besides, does God count for nothing? Aaron hoped to keep the impetuous torrent in its channel-bed by his careful wording of the proclamation (5). But acts speak louder than words. "There came out this calf!" We are all disposed to lay the blame of our misdeeds on our circumstances, our companions, and our times.

What a contrast to Aaron, the hireling, was Moses, the true shepherd. To the people, stern and unbending, standing alone against a nation, making the water they drank unpalatable, calling for the execution of the wrong-doers—but in the presence of God, a broken reed, pleading that his life might be taken in lieu of theirs, and arguing with holy audacity that God could not cast off the people to whom He had bound Himself by covenant promise.

FRIDAY, April 18. Exodus xxxiii.

First, it is suggested that God should withdraw his own immediate Presence from the host of Israel, substituting an angel to drive out their enemies from before them. This proposal filled the people with dismay, and they put off their ornaments, and followed with wistful eyes the entrance of Moses within the door of the tent which temporarily served as the place of meeting between himself and God. What joy filled every heart when they presently beheld the cloudy pillar slowly descend at the Tabernacle door, in token of the Divine converse with Moses, as a man speaketh to his friend (John i. 18).

Moses rolled back on God the responsibility which He had imposed on him, and pleaded that his literal presence, rather than an angelic guide, might be given. Was it quite just to impose such a burden, and then withdraw Himself? And he prevailed. "My presence," was the gracious reply, "shall go with thee." Yes, and, in addition, rest was promised. "I will give thee rest." That does not mean Canaan, for Moses never entered it, but must signify that perfect calm, that unspeakable composure and rest which come to the soul that casts all its burdens and responsibilities on the Lord.

Encouraged by such concessions, Moses makes one further plea—to behold God's glory. O soul, press on and on. There is nothing that thy God will deny thee. Thou canst not see God's face, but there is a cleft Rock, a standing in the riven side of Christ, whence thou mayest, without dismay, look out on the majesty of the Divine Nature.

SATURDAY, April 19. Exodus xxxiv.

Moses had asked to see God's glory, and He was privileged to behold his goodness. God's glory is his love—his undeserved and perfect love, which is long-suffering and abundant in goodness and truth. Let us dare to believe this, notwithstanding every argument that might be adduced to the contrary from the appearance of the world around. Its woes are not his handiwork; they are the results of sin, against which He is bringing all his redemptive processes to bear. Notice how Moses inverts God's words. Because Israel was so stiff-necked, Jehovah had questioned whether He should go with his people lest He consume them (xxxiii. 3); but Moses argues that because they were so, they all the more needed just such a God as this, who would forgive iniquity, transgression, and sin (9). In answer to this prayer, God renewed his covenant with his people, promising to drive out their foes before them, but demanding on their part absolute separation from the abominations of Canaan. God is a jealous God. Let us remember that our least deflection from the rule of perfect loving devotion to Him grieves his Holy Spirit, and fills Him with suffering. Oh, let us not hurt One who is so sensitive to our love! But let us keep his commandments, which to us are spiritual, as these to Israel were temporary and external (18-26).

Till, in verse 33, should be when (R.V.), intimating that when Moses was delivering the Divine message his face "shot out" rays; at other times he was veiled (see 2 Cor. iii. 13-16). Oh, to live so near God that we may be transfigured. As we behold, we shall reflect; as we reflect, we shall be changed. F. B. M.

The Word Wonderful.

By AVARY H. FORBES, M.A.

I.

ONE reads every now and again, in The Christian and other papers, complaints of the increase of vice in all its various phases, and of the decline of Christian virtues on all sides. There is, it is to be feared, but too much ground for these complaints. Whether we look at the fraud by which trade is being permeated, the sharp practice and chicanery prompted by professional competition, the degrading forms of music-hall amusements, or the immoralities of the much "legitimate" drama; whether we think on the racing, betting, and gambling to which the Press so largely lends itself, or the obscene and blasphemous language which so often offends our ears; whether we consider the Sunday concerts, libraries, and museums, the neglect of public worship, of family prayer, and of all the Ten Commandments, and of the other thousand forms in which the worldliness of the Church and the devilry of the world manifest themselves—these all spring from the same cause—"Contempt of thy Word and Commandment."

The remedy is plain; it is none other than God's Word. People talk about the Bible as obsolete Book! No book is so thoroughly up to date—up to the newborn minute in which we live. If the Bible were only obeyed, there would be no fraud in trade, no coveting of other peoples' money, nor the betting, lying, gambling and swindling to which coveting gives rise. There would be no questionable entertainments, no seven days' work for the labourer, no bad language, no violence, no idleness, no hatred, no strife.

History teaches us that nations fare according as they treat the Word of God. If they are wholly without it, they are incapable of great and sustained prosperity, and for the most part they degenerate into savages. If they possess the Scriptures, but neglect and despise them, they suffer from priestcraft, and fall behind other nations. If they obey, honour, and disseminate them, they prosper; if they grow indifferent towards them, they decline.

As with nations, so with individuals. The first, the deepest, the most fatal step in backsliding, is the neglect of God's Word. How can it be otherwise? A man who companies with the profane, or "standeth in the way of sinners," will naturally incline to join in their ribald talk, and "sit in the seat of the scornful." But he knows that if he reads his Bible he may come across some such passage as, "Let no corrupt communication proceed out of your mouth, but that which is good, to the use of edifying"; if he becomes worldly and averse to spiritual things, and he reads his Bible, he may find there, "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world"; if he stoops to the double-dealings of his fellows in trade, he may read in his Bible, "Provide things honest in the sight of all men"; if he begins to hanker after worldly lusts and pleasures, he may come across such a passage as, "Denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world." All these are blows that he does not like.

Now, most people hate the life of a hypocrite; and to live one kind of life and to study a book which denounces that life in the strongest language, and commands the very opposite, is a course few people care to pursue. The Bible then is thrown aside, if for no other reason than that it tears away the mask from ungodliness, and holds up the mirror to the hypocrite.

The supreme importance of the Word of God is shown in the temptation of our Lord, who met each assault of the tempter with the "Sword of the Spirit." First, the devil tempts Him carnally; but, while he was rushing on his prey the Lord thrust him through with the sword's point of "It is written!" Next, Satan tempts Him with ambition; but leaping forward he is again transfixed by "It is written!" Then the tempter tries to get the Sword of the Spirit himself; but he cannot do so. He can only find a broken sword, and hurling himself once more on the Saviour, his heart is pierced through with—"It is written!"

In this contest Christ might have argued at great length with Satan—as Milton imagines Him to do in "Paradise Regained." But He does not do so. He simply cites the written Word, and makes everything depend on its sufficiency. Had the Sword of the Spirit failed in any one of these encounters, or in any part of any one of them, all mankind would have been undone. Had it bent or broken, our salvation would have been imperilled. The whole future of our race depended—and was made to depend—on the efficacy of the Word of God. It was sufficient. It was sufficient for a million of such encounters. And if our Lord found it sufficient for every temptation the devil could launch at Him, surely it is sufficient for all our needs. Let us, then, Christian workers, fearlessly use it.

Good Friday Night

IN A LONDON INFIRMARY.

"HAVE they removed Sister —— yet?" I inquired of the porter at the gate of a great infirmary at the West-End, on Good Friday night, just as the stars had begun to shine through the fleecy clouds of a fine day. (Why is Good Friday always, or nearly always, a fine day?) With a pleasant touch of Scotch in his voice he informed me that she would not be removed until nearly nine o'clock, an hour dark enough not to attract much attention.

Knowing my way, I passed in by myself, and as I crossed the forecourt two or three groups of probationers ("pros," as they are called, who are on trial for three months), all of them well wrapped up in warm shawls, ran across from their quarters to begin their work for the night. Bright, clean, tidy girls they all seemed to be, nurses that anyone might be thankful to have wait upon him in a time of sickness, and they were going to nurse some of the poor men and women of a huge London parish.

Quietly the hall porter takes me to a sister, who has served some twenty years within these walls. She opens the door of a room where the gas burns low, where the flowers are on the table, where wreaths of flowers are suspended from the head and foot of an iron bedstead, and where a floral cross is laid on the winding sheet that hides a once bright form. Gently the attendant sister removes the cloth from the face, and reveals young features and fair hair. She tells me how they all loved her, and, pointing to the flowers, says that everyone on the staff had joined in paying a tribute to her memory—sisters, nurses, doctor, matron, servants, porters. "Yes," said the matron, who had heard of my arrival, and had kindly come to speak to me, "she had won our hearts; we all miss her very much; it hardly seems possible that she is gone."

None of her kith and kin had been to see her in her illness, yet there had been time enough; even two of them, who looked upon her as a kind of adopted child, had not gone across the city to give her a call. She had faced the end all alone, so far as they were concerned. The reason was not want of heart on their part, but tenderness of heart on hers.

"My dear old dad has trouble enough to face," she said, "and I cannot have him made anxious about me." So she would not allow any word to be sent as to how she was, and we thought she had only some trifling ailment which she caught when she went down home for a brief holiday, before entering upon her new duties as junior Sister. Dear girl, she only fulfilled them for a few days, when she must have forced herself to work; for how could she bear to fail where she had so well succeeded? Allowing all thought and sympathy to go to the old home, she held on in her path of service, brave, bright, and unselfish.

So we kindly and admiringly spoke of her as the Matron, and I paid a visit to the wards where she had principally laboured, and exchanged greetings, and, in some cases, a few kind words with the patients. One old man burst into tears at the mention of the Sister's name. One was a boy without father or mother or any relation in the world; he had been several months in the Infirmary, and was "a good deal better." He was cheerful, and had no shadows of coming trouble on his heart. When he is well again, whither will that pauper boy go? Will he hear the Sister singing as she often sang in these wards her favourite hymn?

Fight the good fight with all thy might,
Christ is thy strength and Christ thy right;
Lay hold on life, and it shall be
Thy joy and crown eternally.

Run the straight race through God's good grace,
Lift up thine eyes, and seek his face;
Life with its way before us lies,
Christ is the path, and Christ the prize.

Cast care aside, lean on thy Guide,
His boundless mercy will provide;
Trust, and thy trusting soul shall prove
Christ is its life, and Christ its love.

Faint not nor fear, his arms are near,
He changeth not, and thou art dear;
Only believe, and thou shalt see
That Christ is all in all to thee.

The old familiar words may, very likely will, come back again to his memory amid new scenes and new experiences.

Nine o'clock is at hand; the chaplain robes himself in the Board-Room, and asks me, before we join in the solemn service, to offer prayer with him. The undertaker and his men are here, and we follow them through the long corridor lined on either side with some eighty or ninety nurses and attendants. In the little room the doctor, the matron, two nurses, and myself, see the body reverently placed in its coffin, with white flowers, love's gifts, lying on its breast. The chaplain heads the procession, the matron and the one relation who could be present follow next the coffin, the kind doctor and some of the sisters follow on, and along the corridor and up the staircases rolls out the triumphant resurrection hymn.

On the resurrection morning
Soul and body meet again;
No more sorrow, no more weeping, no more pain!

As the procession passes along the nurses and others join in behind, and as the coffin is lifted into the hearse the chaplain raises his voice loud on the night air, and all sing:—

On that happy Easter morning
All the graves their dead restore;
Father, sister, child, and mother meet once more.

To that brightest of all meetings
Bring us, Jesu Christ, at last;
By thy cross, through death and judgment holding fast.

In silence the hearse moves through the grounds, all the company following to the gates, whence the one relation walks alone to the mortuary, and sees the coffin and its covering of flowers placed until they can be taken to the country, and put where flowers bloom, and birds sing, and dear ones can come, bringing mementoes of love.

Sister —— went out from home, as many a girl has done, in a time of stress and strain, and by God's help made a brave fight. Her work was soon done; but these brief years had sufficed to change her from an inexperienced, timid country girl into a capable woman, worthy to be trusted with sacred responsibility. The institution that trained her has trained multitudes more, and is an honour to the Christian religion. Seven hundred and fifty indigent sufferers are sheltered in it, and the cares of the chaplain and of the medical and nursing staff must be very heavy; science and religion have achieved great things here.

How little most of us know what is going on at our very doors! J. P. G.

Japanese Visitors to England.—Miss M. McLean writes that the party of a thousand Japanese expected to visit Great Britain to take part in the Coronation ceremonies, is to be supplemented by some hundreds more. The new Anglo-Japanese Alliance, in Miss McLean's judgment, imposes serious obligations upon Christians. The opportunities afforded by so many men, soldiers and marines, visiting our shores are very great; the books and papers given to them will be taken into remote parts of the Island Empire, where missionaries have not as yet been able to penetrate. Miss McLean desires to make arrangements equal to the need and opportunity, and she will be glad to hear without delay from those who can supply suitable book-bags, Scriptures, and books and cards, or help in any other way. Letters should be addressed to her at the Japanese Christian Institute, Tilbury Dock, Essex.

A Girls' Village.

WHAT does it mean? Can there be a village without boys? Yes, a village of girls, with a few ladies who care for them; no "noisy boys," no old men and women! Just imagine—that is, form a picture in your minds—a village of about 1,000 girls of different ages, with about 100 ladies and three gentlemen to take care of them. Imagine, further, a large school, a beautiful church, and ample playgrounds. There you have the pretty village to which I refer.

I think some of you are wondering where this village can be—how far away from such places as you know—places where all ages, boys as well as girls, and grownups as well as young folk, live together. Others will have an idea of what I am thinking about. The "good guess" of the smart boy and girl is right—I am thinking of one of Dr. Barnardo's many Homes, the Girls' Village, at Ilford, Essex, only a few miles from great London.

Dr. Barnardo is known all over the world as the ever-ready friend of poor children. His grand homes are open for boys as well as girls, and many thousands, who had no kind and good parents to care for them, have found in him and his host of helpers a true friend in need. He has sheltered and fed them, educated and trained them, prepared them for useful careers in life, and sent many of them across the sea to the broad lands of the Dominion of Canada. To-day in Canada there are many happy homes that have been built up by boys and girls whom Dr. Barnardo rescued from misery and want in the towns and cities of Great Britain and Ireland.

I recently visited this Girls' Village Home, and was greatly pleased with all I saw. The cottage buildings number fifty; ladies and gentlemen gave the cottages, which in some cases are named after the donors. There is also "Eton," "Oxford," and "Cambridge"; while others are named after flowers, as Lily, Violet, and Primrose. The girls vary in age from two-and-a-half to sixteen years; some cottages contain sixteen, and some twenty-five, older and younger being placed together in merry (although rather large) families. The lady who acts as "mother" teaches the young folk how to look after one another, how to do house work, cooking, and so forth. By-and-by, when quite ready, the girls have situations found for them—some in England, some in Canada. The training is such as to make them specially fit for domestic service, and into many homes the girls have carried willing hearts and able hands.

I looked in at the fine school, at which 600 of the girls are in daily attendance, also at the handsome children's church, which was given by a devoted lady; it not only accommodates all the inmates of the Village, but also a goodly number of adults from the residents outside the Village walls. The laundry finds work for seventy of the larger girls. Here is washing, and no mistake! The clothes from the London Homes are sent to Ilford, and altogether 18,000 articles are dealt with every week! It was a great pleasure to notice the happy faces of the girls—some of them quite tots—as they walked about the grounds and played with one another. I was told that the school drill was quite a sight to witness, and I can well believe it. When looking through one of the cottages I saw well-arranged piles of clothes and long rows of boots—all clean and sound. The sight would have rejoiced the hearts of all who, to any extent, have helped Dr. Barnardo in maintaining his great work; and I wished that many such could have seen what I saw.

The governor of the Village, Mr. J. W. Godfrey, as well as the other officials, are regarded by the children as their true friends. This is as it should be. Many of the former inmates, now settled in homes of their own, remember with warm affection the "mothers" and other authorities of the Village; they write letters to them, and receive friendly messages in reply. Thus the ladies who care for the girls when young, also follow their movements with prayerful interest in after years. I rejoice to think that children who have known nothing of that tender parental care which most of us enjoy, have, by the goodness of God, found "home, sweet home" in the Girls' Village.

Two of the cottages are used as a hospital; there the sick and ailing are dealt with, receiving skilful attention and loving care. It is hoped soon to provide a new house for this important purpose—a Village Hospital, in fact; and I am sure that all who read these lines will say, "the sooner the better!" Perhaps some would like to have a few bricks in this addition to the Girls' Village. Dr. Barnardo will, I am sure, be delighted to receive help in this important direction.

Christian Endeavour Topic.

Sunday, April 20, 1902.

How May I Know I am a Christian? (Rom. viii. 1-16).

THIS is the most important question that anyone can put to himself. There are certain unfailing signs that we have passed from death into life; but it should be borne in mind that amongst these our feelings have a very small part. If the weather is bright, our health good, and our spirits elastic, we are often inclined to bright and hopeful emotion, whilst if circumstances are depressing and sad, and our health fails, a cloud draws over our sky. Therefore, it is most unwise to trust in the verdict of our feelings, which are as fickle as April weather, and in which sun and shade alternate continually.

(1) We know that we are Christians if we are trusting in Jesus Christ as our Saviour. As many as believe on his Name have the right to count themselves children of God (John i. 12). Remember the words of Christ: "He that heareth my word, and believeth on Him that sent Me, hath eternal life, and cometh not into judgment, but hath passed out of death into life" (John v. 24). Are you in death or in life? You do not know, you say. You do not feel to be passed from one zone into the other; but note that the Lord says, if you believe in Him as being the Sent of the Father to live and die for man's redemption, if your heart moves towards Him in yearning desire, if you are able to place yourself in his dear hands for life and death, if with trembling faith you can reckon on Him to keep that which you have committed to Him, and, looking from all else, can rest on Him alone, you are most certainly a Christian.

You ask if your faith is of the right description. I answer all faith is right that has the right object, which is Jesus Christ Himself.

(2) We know that we are Christians if we are sensible of a Divine voice speaking in our heart, and urging us not to live after the flesh, but for God. There are always, at every point of our life, if we belong to God, two voices speaking, the one suggesting the lower path of self-indulgence and the other calling to the uplands of faith and devotion to God. When we are Christians, we shall not only distinguish these voices, but we shall desire ever to obey the prompting of the latter, and to "walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit" (vv. 4, 5). And if by reason of the strength of our old Adam nature we turn from the upland path, we shall instantly condemn ourselves, feeling the necessity of seeking the forgiveness and restoration of our Saviour's grace.

(3) We know that we are Christians when we are led by the Spirit of God (v. 4). The leading of the Spirit of God may generally be detected, because it is corroborated by the Word of God, and is a persistent, growing sense of duty. When the Spirit of God speaks, He makes known his will by the growing and ineffaceable conviction which lays hold of the soul. If you are in doubt as to the divine leading, lift your will to God, and ask Him to work in you to wish and to do what is well-pleasing in his sight.

(4) If we are Christians, we shall be conscious of the voice within addressing God as "Abba, Father" (vv. 15-16). Notice, I do not say that the voice will accost you as a child of God, but it will rise within you towards God as Father. The child is almost unconscious of being a child to its father, but is constantly taken up with thinking of the father as being a father to it; and when we are right with God, though in the midst of our greatest anxieties and sorrows, it will be with us as with the Lord in Gethsemane—we shall look up to God, think of Him, and address Him in the simplest manner, as "Abba, Father."

(5) We know we are Christians, because we love those who love Christ (1 John iii. 14). The Apostle John wrote his Gospel that we might know that Jesus was the Christ, the Son of God (John xx. 30, 31), and his Epistle that we might know that we have eternal life (1 John v. 11). His pages abound with the words, We know; and one primary evidence that we know and love God is that his love to man burns strongly in our hearts. We cannot like everyone, but we should love all; i.e., we should be willing to serve their interests above our own, and minister in every possible way.

C.E. NOTES.

Dr. Clark has a wonderful report to give of the progress of Christian Endeavour in Northern Europe. In Sweden there are sixty societies, whilst the work is also firmly taking root in Norway; Finland also has several societies. Between now and the British Convention in Manchester at Whitsuntide, Dr. Clark proposes to visit Bohemia, Bulgaria, Macedonia, Holland, Switzerland, France, Spain, and Portugal.

Members of the U.S.A. Floating Society started a C.E. Seamen's Home at Nagasaki, Japan, six years ago. It is at present doing a wonderful work among the soldiers and sailors who come ashore from foreign ships. The sleeping accommodation consists of seventy-five beds; the largest number ever cared for over night was 101. In the dining room, from six to seven hundred meals a day can be served. The Home is practically self-supporting and free from debt.

International S.S. Lesson.

Sunday, April 20, 1902.

Subject: "Peter and Cornelius" (Acts x. 34-48).

Golden Text: Acts x. 34.

"Also to the Gentile."

THE outpouring of the Spirit on Pagan hearers is the important fact emphasized in the narrative of the reception by Peter of Cornelius and his household into the Christian Church.

A Vision to each of the two notable men of our lesson (x. 3, 10) was the Lord's method of teaching them. Roman pride and Jewish prejudice fell like the walls of Jericho at his word, and a plain road was made for the "Lord of All" to pass over and place "a banner to be displayed because of the truth" in the hand of a Roman soldier (Psa. lx. 4). Thus "the uttermost part of the earth" was opened to the Gospel for Jerusalem, Judea, and Samaria had already had it proclaimed to them (Acts i. 8).

Peter, a Jewish fisherman of Galilee, now an Apostle of the Lord Jesus Christ, and Cornelius, a Roman officer, seeking after the truth of God, were introduced to each other by none less than a ministering angel (Heb. i. 14).

Cornelius. A noble character! Just, devout, and earnest; not only charitable, but large-hearted, for his servants were devoted to him, and as soon as a promise of blessing came to himself he immediately called around him his kinsmen and near friends to share it with him (x. 24, 33). He feared God, was a man of prayer, and acted up to the light he had. He believed God, and diligently sought Him (Heb. xi. 6); but as yet he was a stranger to Christ as his Saviour. The Lord never fails to send his messengers (seen or unseen) when "the windows of our soul are open towards heaven" (x. 3, 13; Dan. ix. 21).

Peter. Not without a struggle, denied himself (as a Jew), and obeyed unhesitatingly the Spirit's guidance. Was commended by his own conscience, and the centurion to whom he was sent (vv. 29, 33). Richly rewarded, for to him was appointed the unique privilege of giving the right hand of fellowship in the name of his Master to the first Gentile Church member (xv. 7). By divinely given wisdom he secured the company of six men from Joppa to go with him to Cæsarea, who provided valuable witnesses at the Church Conference held later in Jerusalem (xi. 12), as they had been helpers at the baptism of Cornelius, and eye-witnesses of the gift of the Holy Ghost at his conversion. Here we have a—

Special preacher	Special audience
Special commissioner	Special preparation

Special sermon.
Special blessing.

Peter's Sermon was, "Jesus only."

Jesus came, the anointed of God.
Jesus lived among men doing good.
Jesus died on the Cross for sin.
Jesus rose from the grave.
Jesus will judge the quick and dead.
Jesus gives remission of sins to "whosoever believeth in Him."

While Peter spake, "on the Gentiles was poured out the gift of the Holy Ghost, and they spake with tongues," "sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise" (Eph. i. 13), and were baptized.

Verse 24. Not who but what. Are they sheep? not What colour is the wool? (Matt. xxv. 32-34). We have rank and wealth in England, caste in India, colour in America, but in God no difference. "Whosoever."

Our late beloved Queen Victoria and the poorest girl in her empire could only come unto God by Jesus Christ her Saviour.

How to Listen to a Sermon.

Preparation—Prayer, and a quiet mind.

Attitude—"Present before God," devout.

What for?—To hear "the counsel of God" through his minister, as "the ambassador for Christ" (2 Cor. v. 20).

Responsibility—As those who must give an account—preacher and hearer, as in 2 Cor. v. 9, 11-20; vi. 1-11.

Warning—To neglect is to reject (Heb. xii. 25; Luke vii. 30).

Prayer and faith never fail of blessing. "As" equals "so" (Matt. viii. 13). (Cornelius.)

What special passages prove the use of preaching?—1 Cor. i. 17-24, 2 Thess. ii. 14.

"Who hath believed our report?" (Rom. x. 16).

Irish Notes.

THE thirty-fifth annual Congress of the Irish National Teachers' organization, met last week in Queen's College, Cork, under the presidency of Mr. Jas. Regarty, B.A., and was largely attended by representatives from all parts of the country. In his opening address, the chairman alluded to the recent changes made in the programme of the national education system, and said that these are not calculated to attract the best class of persons to the teaching profession, or to make teachers take a deep and intelligent interest in their work.

In an Irish Roman Catholic journal, a Roman Catholic priest lets the cat out of the bag with regard to emigration. He says that during the last sixty years no less than 4,500,000 persons, of Irish birth, have emigrated to America, and that under ordinary circumstances there ought to be now 20,000,000 of Roman Catholics in the United States instead of 10,000,000. Where have the other 10,000,000 gone to? The writer says they have apostatised from the Roman Catholic Church, and he therefore declares that for Irish Roman Catholics "America is the road to hell." On the contrary, however, no doubt, many of them have found that it showed them the road to heaven.

Mr. Frank Hugh O'Donnell, an M.P., has been writing the Irish papers on the Irish University question, and has been bringing strong charges against the Roman Catholic bishops, and especially against the Jesuits, who, he says, teach that it is "right to kill heretics, and that every civil government must kill heretics when ordered by the Catholic Church." Mr. O'Donnell, who is a devoted Roman Catholic himself, wants a University which will be under the control of the laity, and not of the priests, and in which Protestants and Roman Catholics will be able to meet on equal terms.

Welsh Notes.

THE Welsh Baptists are preparing for publication a Hymn and Tune Book for Bands of Hope and Temperance meetings. The book will contain solos, quartettes, anthems, &c., most of which have been specially composed for this work.

The Welsh Congregationalists of the Maelor Valley held their half-yearly meetings at Wrexham on Monday, March 31. Resolutions were passed approving of the new Temperance Bill of the Government, also one censuring the conduct of his Majesty the King in visiting a brewery. Another resolution drew attention to the increase of betting and gambling in the country, and called upon those who are interested in the moral and social progress of the nation to do all in their power to check these vices.

The arrangements for the meetings of the Welsh Congregational Union at Carnarvon, July 2-5, are now finally completed. On Tuesday missionary and temperance meetings will be held. On Wednesday the presidential address will be delivered by Rev. Principal Rowlands, of Brecon College. The same day a paper will be read by Rev. Professor T. Rees, M.A., of Brecon, on "The Pulpit and the Present Aspect of Biblical Exposition." The last day of the meetings will be set apart for the preaching of the Gospel.

The inhabitants of Llanrhaiadr-yn-Mochnant have issued an appeal to the Welsh nation for contributions towards a memorial to Bishop Morgan, the translator of the Bible into the language of the Cymry. Bishop Morgan was vicar of Llanrhaiadr for ten years. In 1595 he became Bishop of Llandaff, and some six years later was translated to the see of St. Asaph. Some idea of the value of Bishop Morgan's translation may be gathered from the fact that in the opinion of the late Principal Edwards, of Bala College, the Welsh Bible contains most of the improved renderings of the English Revised Version.

Convention in Norway. — Our issue for September 26 last contained a brief account of the first Convention of Christians of various denominations held in Norway. It is proposed to hold such Conferences year by year, and a committee of seven have made the arrangements for this year. The place selected for this year's Conference is Larvik, a coast town near the entrance to the Christiania Fjord, very beautifully and centrally situated, accessible by rail and steamer. The time fixed for the Conference is Sunday and Monday, June 29 and 30. British Christians who propose to attend the Conference will be welcome, and opportunity will be afforded for them to address the meetings through an interpreter. Further particulars will be given by the chairman of the committee, Mr. Abr. Grimstvedt, Nordstrand, near Christiania, Norway.

Affliction, Comfort, Power.

NOTES FROM SERMONS BY THE LATE REV. C. A. FOX.

THE USES OF AFFLICTION.

(2 Cor. i. 3.)

AFFLICTION brings out the personalness of God. The soul breaks forth into a desire to praise Him. He becomes a reality—an all powerful, all present God, who is all and in all to his people. He becomes an indwelling Person in the soul, able to guarantee power and victory to those who trust Him. This enables the soul to create fresh and endearing titles for God. Mercy divides itself into streams innumerable, until it is proved that God is the Father of all mercies, and then He is the Spirit of comfort.

2. It opens up Scripture as no other thing can do. When we read of the Fatherhood of God by the firelight of affliction, it becomes no longer a doctrine but a reality; and Christ becomes not only a Saviour on Calvary, but for every day "Jesus saves me." Every new affliction adds a new volume to Divine literature. There is not a verse read by the firelight of affliction which does not become a new truth. The soul has been feeling its sorrow, but it then begins to see that it is but a part of the world of affliction and the brotherhood of humanity. Better still, it opens windows, and we are able to feel for others and to suffer with them. There is no power so great as the power of the man who has been under the touch of God.

FORSAKEN BY MEN.

(2 Tim. iv. 16, 17.)

(1) A noble example.—You would hardly have expected Paul to have been forsaken by all; yet the highest apostles, like Jesus, had to stand alone. Before, all went out to meet and welcome him, but in his extremity he was left alone. Though God has a whole heaven of angels, He often takes a solitary witness; and if you stand alone it is more important that your witness should be faithful. There is not a solitary witness who does not bring joy to heaven.

(2) A glorious experience: "Notwithstanding." How often a Christian does not remember that the Lord stands with him. It is well to recall the times when the Lord was manifestly with us, "as seeing Him who is invisible." Can you see the invisible?—not holding mere theories. We grow not so much by adding truth to truth as by acting it out.

(3) Not only the presence, but a purpose of the Master—"that by me the preaching might be fully known." There is a preaching you and I have to do—we have to bear witness. There is something unique in Christian heroism—God with us, and we with God; no misty halo, but a halo of God.

STRENGTH COMMANDED.

(Psa. lxviii. 28.)

There are three things which the child of God must have when going out in his Master's service.

(1) A Promise. It is a covenant. God who has cleansed you from sin. Realize that it is your God who is in positive life union with you. Every precept is a promise. If you fulfil your part, He will fulfil his. Every precept is a possibility of power. He has opened up the channel, and has provided that his righteousness shall be ours. What He commands He enables us to do. We have each our own strength, as well as our own cross. Do not appropriate the crosses of others, but take up your cross; and observe that with it there is a peculiar power, according to the need.

(2) A Prayer. Even though God has promised it, "nevertheless I will be inquired of for this." The promise is to be the blessed stimulus to prayer. Just because the Spirit of God has gone forth, and it is a finished work, therefore pray—pray because it is the season for the latter rain. Spread out a promise, and kneel on it; and if one is not enough bring another. But it is not well to heap up promises. One promise is quite sure, and does not need another. Take the one promise and press it; this virtue will pass into it. If God is not working in us miraculously, He is not working at all.

(3) A Present. The child must bring a present and thrust it into the Father's open hand, and you shall have your reward. You may only have a weed, but bring it. If you have intellect, it is God's; lay it down at the feet of God. Those who do so find that they have enriched themselves when they have enriched God. It is not generally by the rich that large gifts are given, but by the poor, who love to put a present into the hand of God. There is a present all must give. Give yourselves afresh to the Lord—"Just as I am, without one plea." It is the simplicity of the gift which pleases God, not giving pompously.

"I Believe! I Belong!"

The Bishop of Durham (DR. MOULE), at Keswick Convention, advised his hearers to commence each day by reverently repeating, as in the presence of Christ, the solemn words:—"I believe! I belong!"

"We believe."—JOHN iv. 42. "Ye belong to Christ."—MARK ix. 41.

Joyfully.
REV. J. MOUNTAIN.
1. I am glad I have heard of the Sa-viour's great mer-cy! And that now I am
2. Once the slave of my sin, then my soul lay in dark-ness, Kept a pris-'ner by
1. sing-ing His re-demp-tion's new song; And e'er since, by His grace, un-to
2. Sa-tan in his dun-geon so strong; But the Lord, by His power, set me
1. Him I sur-ren-der'd, In my heart has been ring-ing—"I be-lieve! I be-long!"
2. free from my bond-age, And He gave me this watchword—"I be-lieve! I be-long!"
CHORUS.
Tell it out! tell it out! Christ the Theme of my sto-ry! Sing, ye moun-tains and hills! breez-es, waft it a-long! Praise the Lord! He pro-vi-deth a per-fect salva-tion; So we'll take as our watch-word—"I be-lieve! I be-long!"

3. I believe for a full and a perfect salvation;
I belong to my Saviour with a love deep and strong:
And though oft sorely tempted to change my allegiance,
Still my faith gives the answer—"I believe! I belong!"

4. But I look for the time when, my journey safe ended,
I shall join in the chorus of the heavenly throng;
Oh, what rapture 'twill be on the throne to behold Him,
To eternity singing—"I believe! I belong!"

Martin Hope Sutton Memorial.

MAY I draw attention to the effort being made to erect a Memorial Mission Room, to bear the name of my beloved father, the late Martin Hope Sutton, adjoining the Church of Greyfriars, Reading, where he worshipped for the last thirty-nine years of his life, and where his help and interest are now sorely missed?

A friend who knew his deep interest in the spiritual work of Greyfriars has offered £25 for this purpose, and it is my earnest desire (as his daughter, and the wife of the vicar of this parish of over 5,000 poor) to raise a sum that will build and maintain this room for the use of our branch of the Young Women's Christian Association, children's and missionary meetings, sewing classes, &c.—the room hitherto lent us free for these purposes having to come down through expiration of lease, and no other being available.

In the work of our parochial Y.W.C.A. (which numbers over 100 members) my father took a special interest, while all the work for which the room will be used is such as he would have liked to be associated with his memory.

Therefore I venture to ask those of his friends and correspondents who wish thus to commemorate his Christian life and work in his native town, to unite in raising this tribute to one who was ever ready to sympathise with others, and to help them to the extent of his powers.

Further contributions may be sent to me. LAURA S. SOOLE.

(A number of friends have already responded to this appeal. It will have a special interest for many of our readers who followed with deep interest the career of the late Mr. Martin Hope Sutton.)

The Welcome Home, Canning Town.—The Easter muster of the "Christian Lifeboat Crew" was well attended. Miss Child gave the text for the month, Col iii. 1.—"If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above." Mr. William Luff gave an appropriate address, which was followed by a number of interesting testimonies to the blessedness of living the "risen life" with Christ, both on the sea and the land.

The Christian Temperance Campaign.

KIRKCALDY.

WRITING from Kirkcaldy with reference to the recent fruitful mission of Dr. J. Q. A. Henry, a deeply interested friend says that owing to circumtances the committee found themselves in a deficit. A few large-hearted friends interested in the advancement of the Gospel temperance cause came to the rescue and cleared off the amount with a liberality which augurs well for the continuance of the work and possibly for a second visit from Dr. Henry.

It is interesting to note on the question of finance, in connection with temperance work, that a member of Parliament recently informed Mr. Robert Scott of the statement of a wealthy brewer, that for every £1 put down by total abstainers, he (or perhaps they, meaning brewers generally) would put down £100 against them. However, although the brewing interest is undoubtedly possessed of vast resources, Christian abstainers may well fall back on the words of Paul, "If God be for us, who can be against us?" Moreover, if eight millions of total abstainers would but subscribe 2s. 6d. each, making a sum of one million pounds sterling, this would in some measure be answering our own prayers, and at the same time meeting the brewers' empty boast. Mr. Scott will be pleased to receive the £1,000,000 or any portion thereof, acknowledge it through The Christian, and disburse it without deduction.

ALLOA.

The number of pledges taken at Alloa in the three days' mission recently conducted by Dr. Henry was 220. The temperance cause in the town and district has received a splendid stimulus. Commenting on the mission, the Alloa Advertiser says:—"Whatever may be the practical outcome of Dr. Henry's visit to Alloa, in connection with the Twentieth Century Christian Temperance Campaign, there can be no doubt that his able, eloquent, and persuasive addresses left a deep impression on the minds of those who had the privilege of attending his meetings in the Town Hall. His intense zeal and earnestness in the advocacy of a subject he has made a life-long study was only equalled by the fervour and enthusiasm which he imparted into his utterances. He marshalled facts and figures in a way likely to fix them in the memory of his hearers, and the knowledge he showed of the question from a British point of view was most surprising."

MACCLESFIELD.

Mr. Reginald Weaver (a son of our late dear friend, Mr. Richard Weaver), writes: "The visit of Dr. Henry to Macclesfield, April 1-3, was carefully arranged by a committee which included members of all the Protestant churches of the town, both Anglican and Free Church. Ministers and laymen did their best to make the short visit a great success. The town was mapped out, and every part was planned for house-to-house visitation. The mission began on April 1 with a children's meeting, presided over by Rev. W. J. Barkell (Wesleyan), when there was a large attendance. As most of the children present were already Band of Hope members pledges were not taken. Dr. Henry told a number of interesting stories, and spoke in a way well calculated to fasten lasting truths on the minds of the young people. Altogether it was a very enthusiastic gathering.

"In the evening the chair was taken by Mr. F. Wadsworth, President of the local Band of Hope Union, who has shown his sympathy with temperance work in many ways, standing at the last municipal election in the temperance interest against a drink-seller. Dr. Henry gave a magnificent speech that roused the enthusiasm of the audience to a high pitch. It was realised that we had a speaker of no ordinary ability with us.

"For the Wednesday afternoon a meeting for women had been arranged. Rev. Todd Ferrier (Congregationalist) presided, and Dr. Henry spoke with great power on the duties and responsibilities of women in the temperance cause. At the close a number of pledges were taken. It was agreed, as a result of this meeting, to originate a women's temperance organization in the town, and a ladies' committee was formed on the spot. With but one exception it was the largest women's meeting that Dr. Henry has addressed in England.

"In the evening, Colonel Thorp occupied the chair, and Dr. Henry addressed himself to the individual aspect of the question. The opinion of old temperance workers was that a more argumentative and telling speech they had never heard. By this time interest in the mission had greatly increased, and at the closing meeting the largest audience of the series assembled under the chairmanship of the new vicar of Macclesfield, Rev. L. Smith, M.A., who delivered a stirring speech in favour of total abstinence. Dr. Henry then gave his final address, and for an hour and a half he held the vast audience spellbound as he brought forward the testimony of soldiers, travellers, athletes, and doctors against the use of strong drink. His words of entreaty and warning will never be forgotten by those who had the privilege of listening to his eloquence."

In the course of an interesting letter, Mr. J. W. Lees writes: "Dr. Henry has rendered splendid service. His speeches were God-inspired and full of convincing matter. Their influence will be felt for many a long day; 237 pledges were taken."

There is, indeed, but one opinion as to the far-reaching effect of the Mission. To hear of the leading medical man in the town having signed the pledge is more than encouraging, looked at not only as a personal act, but in view of the tremendous influence which, as a man of decision in this all-important matter, he cannot fail to have upon his numerous patients.

REDHILL.

The organizers of the week's Gospel Temperance Mission recently held at Redhill were well advised in securing Dr. Henry for the concluding three days of their campaign. There were four meetings for adults, and one, on Saturday afternoon, for children; and so great was the enthusiasm aroused that, at the final meeting, we understand hundreds of people were unable to obtain admission. The hearty co-operation of many devoted workers contributed largely to the success of the mission, and Dr. Henry's glowing eloquence and effective appeals were the subject of deep satisfaction. No fewer than 180 pledges were secured, including some from persons of much influence, who will assuredly prove to be stalwart supporters of temperance work in days to come.

FUTURE MEETINGS.

April 10, 11, Rutherglen; 12-18, Dumbarton; 19-25, Airdrie; 26-29, Edinburgh; 30, Metropolitan Tabernacle (Baptist Union); May 17, Manchester (Christian Endeavour Convention); 18-23, Dr. Barnardo's "Edinburgh Castle," Limehouse, E.; 25, 11 a.m., Rev. Dr. Wells' Church, Pollokshields, Glasgow; 27, Church of Scotland Temperance Breakfast, The Café, Edinburgh; 28, 11 a.m., Mildmay Conference Hall; 8 p.m., East London Tabernacle, Burdett Road, E.; May 31-June 6, Belfast; 8, Sheffield; 10, Maryport.

Matamoros Gospel Hall, Malaga.—The devoted colporteur, Juan Bonachera, writing in February last, says:—"We have just finished holding a Gospel meeting at Villanueva, at which there were more than three hundred present. After calling on all to humble themselves before God, Captain Carey Brenton, late of the Mexican Navy, taking his text from the first epistle of St. John, caused much interest, attention, and blessing by the words spoken. May God pour out a blessing on this place, and may God establish here a Gospel centre." Dr. Juan Podadera, writing of large and important meetings, says:—"Imagination fails us to describe the respectful attention with which the hearers listened to our words. Let us not forget in our prayers the many brethren who are anxious to hear the Word of God.

Obituary.

MISS HAWKES, EASTBOURNE.

THE workers at home and abroad, who have during the past twenty-five years received the benefit of the seaside branch of Miss Mason's Homes of Rest, at Eastbourne, will learn with a keen sense of personal bereavement of the death, a few days ago, of the much-loved honorary superintendent. After about seven weeks' illness and much suffering, Miss Hawkes passed away, and the funeral took place in Ocklynge Cemetery. The first part of the service was conducted at Trinity Church by Rev. W. A. Bathurst, and the service at the cemetery was read by Rev. W. T. Turpin. Many tokens of love and sympathy were sent by those who desired to witness to the usefulness of a life dedicated to God in the special department of ministry to his children.

REV. DR. S. H. BOOTH.

After living in retirement since 1898 on account of ill-health, Rev. Dr. S. H. Booth—formerly secretary of the Baptist Union—heard on Monday last the call to his eternal rest. The address presented when he retired from office bore earnest testimony to the high esteem in which he and his work were held. His conspicuous business ability found full scope in the conduct of the affairs of the Union, and the impress which he left on its plans is an enduring one. Coming into contact with many beyond his own denomination, he was honoured by all who knew him. As pastor and preacher he did excellent work at Birkenhead, Holloway, and other centres, his pulpit utterances being distinguished by a gracious felicity.

MR. THOMAS ARNOTT, NEWCASTLE.

A life with a peculiar fragrance of holiness was closed a few days ago by the home-call to Mr. Thomas Arnott, Killingworth Hall, near Newcastle. For a period of thirty years he had been a faithful witness to the Gospel of Christ, and was ever ready to distribute his gifts to needy members of the household of faith. The interment of the body was attended by a large body of friends, but by his own special request no outward emblems of mourning were visible. The service was conducted by Mr. Richard Hoyle, and another personal desire of Mr. Arnott was carried out by the singing of the hymn, "Yes, we part, but not for ever." He rests from his labours, but his works do follow him in the lives of men and women with whom he had come into contact.

MR. CHARLES O'BRIEN, BOMBAY.

A telegram has been received from Bombay stating that Mr. Charles O'Brien passed away on the 4th inst. He only landed in Bombay with his wife on February 22, and had consequently been little more than a month in India, though he had a satisfactory medical certificate before starting. Writing on the 15th of last month from the office of the Bombay Guardian, where he was working diligently, and rapidly acquiring a knowledge of the requirements of the business, he says: "I had a touch of fever one day. By resting all afternoon I was all right the next day." This is the only reference to his health. Many prayers had been offered that his consecration to mission work might be very fruitful for good. This may be another fulfilment of the principle of Christ's Kingdom announced by the Master Himself, "Except a grain of wheat fall into the earth and die, it abideth by itself alone, but if it die, it beareth much fruit." His heart was thrown energetically into his new work, as his letters abundantly testify. Mr. Percy Horne says that his end was "triumphant," but to those who are left behind it is sad. Mr. Horne and his wife had long been needing additional help, and this offer appeared to supply the need. It may be that out of his willing-hearted surrender there shall yet spring up to the cause of the Bombay Guardian, to which he had given himself, far more abundant fruition than we can yet understand.

About Books.

"THE MARROW OF MODERN DIVINITY."

THERE is theological significance as well as antiquarian interest in the reissue of The Marrow of Modern Divinity, as edited, with introduction and notes, by Rev. C. G. M'Crie, D.D. (5s. nett. D. Bryce & Son, Glasgow). Originally issued in 1645 and 1649, in two parts, this anonymous work still keeps the secret of its authorship, after all the guesses and suggestions as to the identity of the "E. F." of the title-page. The first part is described as "touching both the Covenant of Works and the Covenant of Grace: with their use and end, both in the time of the Old Testament and in the time of the New." The second is set out as (following the archaic spelling) "touching the most plaine, pithy, and spirituall Exposition of the ten Commandments, the examination of the heart and life by them, the reason why the Lord gave them, and the use that both unbeleevers and beleevers are to make of them." (sic.) Both parts are in dialogue, the speakers being Evangelista, a minister of the Gospel; Nomista, a legalist; Nomologista, a prattler of the law; Antimomista, an Antimomian; and Neophytus, a young Christian.

Alike in England and Scotland, this classic work has gone through many editions. In substance it is, in the words of Dr. M'Crie, "largely a compilation from the writings of Reformed and Puritan Divines, including such foreigners as Calvin, Beza, and Luther, and such Englishmen as Lightfoot, Reynolds, Hall, Goodwin, Sibbes, T. Hooker, Perkins, and others, all of whom in 1645 were considered of modern or recent times. Hence the title of the book, which has long since outlived the fitness of its designation." To continue quotation: "The design of the treatise is to elucidate and establish the perfect freeness of the Gospel salvation; to throw wide open the gates of righteousness; to lead the sinner straight to the Saviour; to introduce him as guilty, impotent, and undone; and persuade him to grasp, without a moment's hesitation, the outstretched hand of God's mercy."

Dr. M'Crie gives us this historic work in excellent form. He has collated the early editions; and he writes a deeply interesting introduction, in which the story of the "Marrow" men is told in brief, and with generous sympathy. Personal and ecclesiastical relations are explained; and in a carefully prepared appendix particulars are given of the "fathers and brethren" mentioned or concerned in the work, as well as of those writers (a goodly number) from whom the "Marrow" author makes quotations.

The precious teaching of the "Marrow" has, of course, been embodied in many subsequent works; the style, however, is peculiar and of a kind all its own. As an Evangelical classic, redolent of the strenuous thought and serious purpose of the seventeenth century, the book is a treasure. The pages present the creed and the message of such men as Hog of Carnock, Boston of Ettrick, and the Erskines (Ebenezer and Ralph); and while their names are held in reverence, as they deserve to be, the "Marrow" should not lack devout and sympathetic readers.

TWO HUNDRED YEARS OF THE S.P.G.

AS an organization, the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel represents the Church of England in those features and tendencies which are least acceptable to Evangelical Christians. Yet the S.P.G. is a great Society, exercising a widespread influence, religious and educational. Its workers are in many lands, and include men of high character and singular devotion. Not only is the Society large, it is old also, as may be gathered from the mere title of a massive volume recently issued —Two Hundred Years of the S.P.G.: An Historical Account of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, 1701—1900. By C. F. Pascoe. (7s. 6d. Office of the Society, 19, Delahay Street, Westminster, S.W.)

This book of nearly 1,500 pages deserves a place alongside the great histories of missionary effort that have seen the light during recent years. It has been prepared by the Keeper of the Records of the Society, and is an amplification, bringing the story down to date, of his "Classified Digest" of the Society's operations, published in 1893. As a mere compilation this is a wonderful book. The author has dealt with many thousands of pages of journals and reports, letters and magazine articles, and the result is a very readable book, (1) describing the various lands in which the Society has settled agents, and (2) detailing the operations in which those agents have engaged. The outline sketches of men and movements are as vivid as they are succinct, and the word-pictures of manners and customs, prejudices and superstitions, are of great interest. Students of missions to the heathens, however much they may disagree with the S.P.G. point of view, will find this work full of instruction and charm. The following items "sample" the very readable contents:—

Of Rev. John Wesley, missionary appointed to Georgia, we read:—

Arriving at Savannah in February, 1736, Wesley found little opportunity of carrying out his design of evangelizing the heathen, owing to the bad lives of his countrymen. (!)

Regarding Caledonia diocese, in the province of British Columbia:—

It is questionable whether any Bishop mixes with the Indians more with a view to raising them than Bishop Ridley does. He tells of a wonderful transformation wrought at one place in his diocese, where "a missionary fresh from an English parish asked in plaintive tones if those were the people he had to work among," and on being told that they were "the raw material," added, "Then I may as well go home again!"

Regarding recent developments in Tembuland, Cape Colony:—

Some of the preachers—men and women—were prepared by Rev. John Xaba (a native clergyman) to assist in evangelizing their heathen brethren. The women used to preach to their own sex only, for no woman dare approach a heathen man for instructing him. She would be told: "Keep your place; shut your mouth; you are nothing but a woman."

How missions are treated by Indian newspapers:—

Sir John Woodburn, Lieut.-Governor of Bengal, after a visit to Chhota Nagpur in 1898, characterized India as a "land of surprises." And "the last surprise" he had witnessed was that among the savage tribes in Chhota, Nagpur, which "we are accustomed to hear of, and to speak of," as "almost irreclaimable from the naked barbarism of their nomad life," he found in the schools of the missionaries "scores of Kôl boys rapidly attaining University standards in education."

As a footnote to this stands the following "N.B.":—"The Englishman, the leading Calcutta paper, while giving a most minute account of the secular side of the Lieut.-Governor's tour, studiously ignored any reference to mission work, and yet it was the very mission work among the Kôls that made the greatest impression on his Honour during his tour."

Regarding Christianity and caste in South India:—

The Romanists accommodate themselves to heathen practices, accepting caste distinctions (even allowing Brahmins to retain their sacred thread and caste marks after conversion), having car processions in close imitation of the heathen, and being lax as to the institution of Christian marriage.

In an account of a stronghold of Roman Catholicism in South India:—

It is significant that, as reported by the Bishop of Madras in 1845, the heathen were "in the habit of calling the Roman churches Mary-churches, and our churches God-churches," and that some of the Roman Catholic converts "did not know so much as one word of the Lord's Prayer."

In form the work is all that could be desired. After an account of the founding of the Society, comes a survey of the fields. There is a very interesting chapter on the extension of the episcopate to America and the Colonies, and a descriptive list of schools and colleges. The authorities for statements are given with precision, and there are many tables and rolls of clergy and other workers. In a word, the book is a perfect mine of information—ethnic and religious, curious and practical, with many portraits and other illustrations thrown in. Every chapter bears witness of the ability of its author, as a master of concise statement and clear arrangement.

A useful little volume to place in the hands of young or perplexed believers will be found in Mrs. Florence Holt's Walking with God. (1s. 6d. The Author, Merstham, Surrey.) The counsel given is simple, wise, and spiritual.

The 1902 edition of the Ritualistic Clergy List, compiled by the Church Association (1s. net. 14, Buckingham Street, W.C.), contains the names and other particulars of 9,600 clergymen of the Church of England who are associated with Ritualistic and Romish practices.

In Sermons from a Little-Known Pulpit (2s. 6d. A. H. Stockwell), there are given to a wider audience eleven sermons preached by Rev. J. Solon Rees at Bethany, Aberaman. We can readily understand the wish of hearers to have them in more permanent form, and feel sure they will help others who now come into contact with them for the first time.

The fourteen years spent by Rev. B. Hackett at Ashbourne, as represented by Memorials of a Ministry (2s. 6d. A. H. Stockwell), appear to have been a time of quiet gathering in and upbuilding of the flock of God. The sermons are such as lead to quiet meditation on heavenly things; and the statement of faith, &c., made at ordination, is a touchingly simple testimony for Christ.

The Divine Authority of the Scriptures of the Old Testament. By Rev. David M. M'Intyre. (1s. Drummond's Tract Depot.) A series of thoughtful papers, as outspoken as they are thoughtful. The headings of the principal chapters indicate the treatment: "The Burden laid on Faith;" "The Testimony of Christ;" "The Witness of the New Testament Writers;" and "The Voice of the Church." Mr. M'Intyre stands for the authority and integrity of Scripture. To him the Bible is Holy—the Word of God. This is a capital little book, and we trust it will be widely circulated.

Readers of the Sunday School Chronicle will recognise in Rev. James Black's Building in Silence (2s. A. H. Stockwell) a series of leading articles, the first giving a title to the whole. Teachers who had become somewhat weary and disheartened were stimulated and refreshed by them; and we are assured that they have a wider ministry to perform among Christian workers who are meeting discouragements by the way.

Rev. John Tuckwell has published under the title, A Plea for the Old Faith (2s. A. H. Stockwell), the substance of three lectures on "Did Moses write the Pentateuch," "The Inspiration of the Old Testament," and "Our Lord's Use of the Old Testament." The volume is one from which old and young alike may learn much that will reassure them at a time when attacks on the Word of God abound on every hand.

Having felt the need of a book, "practically and simply written," which he could place in the hands of young converts, Rev. W. Ridley Chesterton has sent forth Talks with Young Christians (1s. net. A. H. Stockwell), dealing with some of the difficulties commonly met with early in the journey Zionward. No one will rise from its perusal without feeling that the author has touched with sympathetic and helpful hand the secret springs of many a life.

The exposition of Scripture by men of true spiritual insight is ever welcome, and Rev. Dr. Frederick A. Noble's Discourses on the Philippians (3s. 6d. net. James Robinson, 24, Bridge Street, Manchester) has given us a book of a deeply devotional character, which will, at the same time, have a distinct value to plain people who, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, are being led into a knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus. Addressing himself to men and women with the two English versions at their command a valuable lesson is conveyed in the comparison and mutual elucidation of these. Above all, a practical application is made of every truth to the needs and experiences of daily life.

A Faithful Sower is the appropriate title given to a singularly interesting though composite memoir of Rev. George Everard, compiled by his daughter. (2s. 6d. Nisbet.) Many will rejoice with the Bishop of Durham that a record has been made of the main facts of such a life; chapters on different periods and phases have been contributed by Revs. Dr. Oliver (Garston), J. Powell (Ipswich), W. A. Challoner (New Malden), H. H. Dibben (Brierley Hill), and Rev. Ernest V. Everard (Sheffield); while Revs. H. A. Courthope, D. H. Dolman, and Charles Bullock have also helped. The reader will learn something of the charm of this consecrated life from the testimony of those who found him a brother beloved, a guide in the way of holiness, and an exponent of spiritual truth.

The "after-thoughts" of a man of ripe experience and close observation have ever a special value for those who would follow in his steps; in the case of a teacher, their value is to the community at large. After forty years of dealing with young people, the Warden of Glenalmond, Mr. John Huntley Skrine—who will be known to some as the friend of Edward Thring—has set down in Pastor Agnorum (5s. net. Longmans) a very high ideal indeed for those who would concern themselves with the coming generation. The point of view is that of the public school and of Episcopalianism, and to the matter-of-fact reader method and style may at times appear fantastic. But for him who sees "between the lines" there is much to lift the mind above anything that may savour of professional drudgery. The earnest discerning spirit will be helped to a vision of an ideal for himself.

The story told in the Memoir of the Rev. W. M. Thompson (6s. nett. Presbyterian Publishing Office, 14, Paternoster Sq., E.C.) is that of a busy useful life lived in the service and to the glory of God. It is the loving hand of a son that has rendered this last token of affection, and the pages abound with those details which are never trivial to the true writer or reader. The long ministry to civilians and Presbyterian soldiers at Woolwich had few crises such as newspapers record. It was more noteworthy for the events which cause joy in the presence of the angels of God. Much interesting light is thrown on the effect of the disruption of the Church of Scotland, in 1843, among those whose distance from the scene of operations gave them perhaps a better perspective. Special interest attaches to the Bible-class for cadets, with the story of which our readers are familiar, and which has exerted a far-reaching influence among officers, especially of the Royal Engineers and Artillery.

A new edition of Litton's INTRODUCTION TO DOGMATIC THEOLOGY, in one octavo volume, is announced for publication shortly, by Mr Elliot Stock. The new edition will contain a Preface by Dr. Wace.

Rev. J. G. Greenhough, M.A., is shortly publishing, through Mr. Arthur H. Stockwell, a volume of Reminiscences and Impressions received during his recent visit to the Colonies. The book will bear the appropriate title, TOWARDS THE RISING SUN, and will be illustrated with some thirty special photographs.

Missions to Young People.

CHESTER.

A TEN days' mission has been held at Chester by Mr. NEWTON JONES, assisted by Rev. W. A. Eyre, of Runcorn.

The mission was under the auspices of the Chester Sunday-School Union, the officials of which were assiduous in their efforts to render effective co-operation.

On each Lord's Day large meetings of scholars and teachers were held, and on the week evenings two meetings, one at 6.30 for boys and girls, and another at 8 for young people and adults.

About sixty decision cards were handed in, and there were other interesting cases of conversion. The concluding meeting was of a very impressive character. Rev. H. Davenport and Mr. Beresford Adams (President of the Union) took part in the service.

SOUTH BERMONDSEY, S.E.

On Sunday morning last, over seventy workers connected with the Ilderton Road Baptist Church, South Bermondsey, S.E., met to plead in prayer for blessing upon the mission they were undertaking. Three large congregations assembled to hear the Gospel preached and sung. Mr. WILLIAM OLNEY spoke with power and tenderness. At the close of the afternoon service three inquiry rooms were filled with young people seeking Christ.

The Metropolitan Theatre, W.

The meetings at the Metropolitan Theatre, W., closed for the season on Easter Sunday for the twenty-seventh consecutive year. One special feature of blessing seen has been the conversion of many of the relations of the workers of the mission. Many such are rejoicing over brothers and sisters who have just been converted, and are joining heartily in the work of the mission. Unfortunately the collection, which was for the special object of helping to clear the season's liabilities, was taken by a clever thief. Mr. CHAS. COOK'S health shows a slight improvement. He is leaving London shortly for a well-earned rest.

Mr. Charles E. Barraclough at Silsden.

An encouraging and fruitful mission has just been held at the Free Methodist Church, Silsden. Consecration and prayer meetings were held many weeks before the mission, which, along with a thorough house-to-house visitation, with a personal invitation by the workers, accompanied with a tract, proved a great blessing. Open-air processions were undertaken every night through different parts of the district, when invitations were given by the workers to the passers-by. The earnestness of the workers resulted in increasing attendance during the week, and a full church the second Sunday, despite the inclement weather. Mr. CHARLES E. BARRACLOUGH preached the Gospel faithfully, earnestly pleading for decision for Christ. A good number were helped in the inquiry rooms, and professed to find peace. W. T. W.

Imperial Mission, Hanley.

On Friday last Mr. J. T. LEAFE concluded a two-months' mission at, and also his superintendency of, the Imperial Mission Hall, Hanley. He leaves the town with the prayers and good wishes of the people. His preaching has been greatly appreciated. He is a pastor in the very truest sense, and his expositions of the Word are instructive and stimulating. The congregations have increased under his ministry. The last two months was a mission especially to Christians, and was felt by many to be a time of peculiar heart searching and soul refreshing. At his closing meeting on Friday, Mr. Bewley Weaver and others spoke of the good work Mr. Leafe has done, and how much the members regret that they are unable to retain his services. The wish was expressed that his way may now be opened in the wider field of a mission preacher, to which he is in the future devoting himself.

Mr. Monro Collings at Fakenham.

A three-days' mission, conducted by Mr. MONRO COLLINGS at the Corn Hall, Fakenham, has been wonderfully owned and blessed. At the closing services on Easter Monday we had a most delightful time. In the evening over 1,000 people came together in the Hall, many of whom had to stand, and all of whom listened with rapt attention.

More than half the Hall was filled with people from the villages around, so that Fakenham people had to get in where they could, and many could not get in at all. Doubtless this large attendance was partly due to the winter work carried on in the villages by Messrs. Chenery and Driver, whom God enabled us to support in this needy district, and to the prayer that has been made without ceasing.

We must not forget to add that Mr. Monro Collings had the assistance of Mrs. Hamilton Tetley, who sings only for the Master, and certainly attracted many who otherwise would not have come.

SOPHIA HAMOND.

At Torquay Races.

These Races, held as usual on Easter Monday, attracted crowds, the weather being fine. Five workers went on the course with suitable Scripture portions, text cards, and tracts, and gave away some 2,000. Between the races, services were held on the track near the Grand Stand. There was, alas! much indifference, possibly on account of there being no interruptions by "drunks," &c., as last year. One old man walked across our ring, saying, "Shut up;" but he did not have the courage of his convictions enough to stay and say why. The gospel message was faithfully delivered, and nearly all on the course must have seen or heard the witness. Some interesting conversations were held with individuals, and we believe God will bless the Word distributed. Open-air meetings were held in the town both nights of the races; we had a good lamp, and an organ kindly lent by a lady at St. Mary Church, good audiences came round and heard the Gospel sung and spoken.

A MEMBER OF THE RACECOURSE MISSION.

Hamilton U.F. Presbytery Simultaneous Mission.

Special meetings under the auspices of the Hamilton Presbytery are presently being carried on in different towns within the bounds. In Motherwell, the people have had the ministry of Rev. JOHN SMITH, D.D., of Edinburgh, Rev. WILLIAM MUIR, B.D., of Blairgowrie, and others. The services were carried on the first week in Brandon Street U.F. Church, and later in the Clason Memorial U.F. Church.

In Hamilton, Rev. JOHN MCNEILL conducted meetings during the first week of the Simultaneous Mission in St. John's U.F. Church. Hundreds were turned away for want of room on the opening night, Sabbath, March 16, and on the week nights that followed, the large spacious edifice was filled with interested hearers. No after-meetings were held, but good results were apparent. The local paper says that "his visit has been with profit, and that a fresh stimulus has been given to church life." Mr. McNeill is this week at Bellshill, a mining town a few miles distant from the scene of his last week's labours.

At Newarthill, Mr. JAMES MARSHALL, Assembly evangelist, is conducting a mission in the U.F. Church with evident result. J. C.

Mr. W. H. Jude in Liverpool.

Encouraged by the fruitfulness of the mission held a month ago, the friends of Mr. W. H. JUDE made preparations for his return visit on Sunday and Monday, March 23 and 24, at the Y.M.C.A. Mr. Jude conducted an afternoon service on the Sunday; which was well attended and remarkable in its impressiveness, while the evening service was one which will long live in the minds of many who attended it.

From start to finish the crowded audience listened with such earnest attention that it had the effect of inspiring both the speaker and the body of singers; and when Mr. Jude rendered the music-recitation, "Little children, gather round me," the intense interest of the listeners was most marked.

On the Monday the cold, wet weather made no perceptible difference in the number of the audience. The hall was filled, and cold and wet were forgotten in listening to Mr. Jude's stirring message in speech and song.

All the music was selected from the missioner's own compositions, and the way in which the audience sang was an eloquent tribute to the worth of such to stimulate and enthuse congregational singing.

Lest these remarks should appear to indicate that the success of these meetings was mostly due to the musical talent of the missioner, it should be added that his addresses were rich in blessing, and were as cheering and helpful as were his songs.

Mr. Henry Thorne at Sudbrook.

Sudbrook is a village on the banks of the Severn, lying quite off the main line of traffic, called into being in the construction of the Severn Tunnel, and built by the late Mr. T. A. Walker, whose thoughtful Christian care for his men led him to erect a fine mission hall in the place.

On March 15, Mr. HENRY THORNE came among us for seventeen days' evangelistic work. The service on the first Sunday afternoon for young people was stamped with the seal of Divine approval, a number of the children remaining and professing their trust in the Lord Jesus Christ. Inquirers were nightly pointed to Christ. Some long prayed for have been brought to decision, while others have attentively listened to Mr. Thorne's presentation of the Gospel. A special feature of the mission was the daily Bible reading in the afternoon; the attendance was on the whole encouraging, and the series one of real helpfulness to the children of God.

In the meeting for prayer upon the closing Sunday evening, the superintendent of the school touchingly expressed his gratitude for blessing in his own family and the school. Two or three others also spoke of their thankfulness to God for the services. A capital attendance graced the last meeting when Mr. Thorne told the story of his life in the lecture:—"From the Stage to the Cross." W. H. GORHAM.

A Yorkshire Village Mission.

A fifteen-days' united mission at Clayton West and Scissett, conducted by Mr. H. BRAY, of the Evangelization Society, was a time of spiritual refreshing. The services were held in the Congregational Church, this being the largest place available. On the Sunday afternoons the Sunday schools united for a young people's mission service, where much good was received.

On the Sunday evenings all the available accommodation was taken up by a great congregation. The week-night services were also well attended. Powerful Gospel addresses were given by the evangelist, and the need of a Saviour was vividly brought before the unconverted. Over fifty young people, mostly the elder scholars, with the addition of a few adults, manifested a desire to become followers of the Lord Jesus Christ.

The evangelist also drew together, prior to the evening services, the young people, who from time to time decided for Christ, and instructed them in Gospel truths. An extension of the mission having been arranged, Mr. Bray presided over a meeting of the united Band of Hope, and at a gathering of the members of the different churches gave parting advice in a capital address on "Thankfulness."

G. MORTON, Secretary.

The Boy Preacher.

The four weeks' mission which Mr. JACK COOKE, the boy preacher, has undertaken at Westbourne Grove Baptist Chapel (Rev. George Freeman's), commenced on Sunday last, with the promise of much fruitfulness.

The chapel, which is estimated to hold some 1,500 persons, was well filled for the morning service, when Mr. Cooke gave an address on "Prayer." The earnestness of the preacher made a deep impression, and there was much in his words to encourage and stimulate as he dwelt on some of the privileges and responsibilities of Church members, and spoke of the place of prayer in the spiritual life.

The evening service was timed to begin at seven, but soon after the doors were opened the building was filled. An overflow meeting was held in the school-room beneath the chapel. This gathering was devoted chiefly to prayer for the meeting upstairs, those present including many of the seat-holders who had vacated their places for the benefit of strangers. Mr. Freeman conducted the service, Rev. J. R. Coutts also taking part.

In the chapel Mr. Cooke made a telling appeal to the unconverted. His address was marked by characteristic fluency, and his fervent exhortations made a solemn impression upon many hearers.

The friends at Westbourne Grove are much encouraged, and confidently believe that the mission will do much to kindle fresh interest in the verities of Christian truth, and to attract and awaken the unconcerned and thoughtless crowds who usually spend their Sunday evenings in the pursuit of worldly pleasure. Mr. Freeman hopes, however, that people from a distance will not attend on Sundays, as the numbers turned away for want of room are very large. Mr. Cooke is to preach nightly (except Saturdays) at 8, and on Sundays at 11 and 7, until May 2.

Coatbridge Christian Union.

Under the auspices of this Union, a sixteen days' mission has just been completed by Mrs. E. L. BAEYERTZ, the Jewish lady evangelist. From the very commencement there was a time of great blessing. Night after night the interest deepened. The subjects taken up were spread before the audience in such an attractive form, that great numbers each night eagerly took advantage of the invitation to come to the inquiry-room, where Mrs. Baeyertz dealt with them, and made the way clear for them from Scripture. It was evident that any who could go from such meetings undecided went sinning against light.

Three hundred and fifty passed through the inquiry-room, and many who would not go in went away under deep conviction. The general opinion is that there never has been such a mission in Coatbridge before.

It was most impressive to see parents waiting for their children coming out of the inquiry-room, and children waiting for parents. Whole families have been brought to Christ at the mission.

The afternoon Bible readings proved a source of great blessing to Christians, upon whom the high standard of holiness teaching made deep impression, and many sought fresh consecration. The only disappointed ones were those who were turned from the door, there being no accommodation. In the last nights of the mission hundreds were denied admission. This the members of the Union deplore very much, but were helpless in the matter. It was with delight that the workers looked upon Sir David and Lady Buchanan sitting on the platform every day, and their grateful thanks go out to them for all they did at Drumpellier House to make Mrs. Baeyertz at home.

Jas. Johnston, Sec.

The twenty-fourth anniversary of Mr. William Forbes' mission-work among theatrical people was held recently in the Welsh Lecture Hall, Charing Cross Road, Mrs. Moore and Mr. F. Spencer Johnson spoke and sang, and the occasion was one of encouragement.

At Kingston Congregational Church, near Ringwood, Hants, Mr. Bob Johnson conducted services on Easter Sunday and Monday. On the Sunday, in spite of inclement weather we had a full chapel, and on Monday the place proved to be far too small. Truly, it was a time of heart stirring. Chas. Burton.

A brief evangelistic mission at the Presbyterian Church, Cheltenham, conducted by Rev. W. Harvey-Jellie, M.A., and Mr. W. R. Lane, has been productive of most encouraging results. The services and Bible readings were well attended, and a general quickening in the life of the church is manifest.

A three-weeks' mission, conducted at the Railway Mission, Wisbech, by Mr. F. Chapman, of the Evangelization Society, has been fruitful in blessing both in the Gospel meetings and at the Bible readings, which were a great help to many friends who came together from the places of worship in the town.

Mr. Charles Noakes, of the Evangelization Society, has conducted a fifteen-days' mission at the Baptist Church, Hartlepool. The services were arranged by the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavour. Mr. Noakes' presentation of truth was with acceptance and power. In connection with the mission, a men's meeting was held, which was well attended. With close attention the men listened to the telling words of the evangelist. Members and workers in the church have been blessed and cheered, and souls have been led to a saving knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ.

The Churches.

Church of England.

The Bishop of Durham is indisposed. He was to have opened the new parish rooms built for the parish of St. Paul's, Stockton, but he was compelled to ask to be released from his engagement, as the doctor, in view of his long journey to the Riviera to join Mrs. Moule, has ordered him to reserve his strength. He is suffering from bronchial trouble and overstrain caused by diocesan work.

In the united parishes of Wendy and Shingay, near Royston, Herts, the former village has a church, but the latter had only a small mission-room until Viscount Clifden presented a new and commodious hall. At the opening on Easter Monday Lord Clifden gave an appropriate address; a dedicatory service was read by the Dean of Peterborough; the lessons were taken by the vicar and a Nonconformist minister; and Archdeacon Emery, of Ely, closed the proceedings with happy and useful words of counsel.

Congregational.

Dr. Kuyper, the Dutch Premier, will be present at the special meetings to be held in Gainsborough early in June in connection with the tercentenary celebrations of the John Robinson Memorial Church.

Rev. John Oates, of North Finchley, in a "pastor's letter," refers to the success of the Sunday Evening Services for the People. "It has," he says, "always been a problem with Congregationalism how to reach the people. This problem we have been able in part to solve by the church accepting the suggestion of its committee to popularize the evening service by free seats and solos, and a practical address. It only shows that where a Church is willing to make some sacrifice of æsthetic taste in the conduct of public worship, and to place its seats at the disposal of the non-church-goers, it is possible to draw them into the House of God. While in our venture numerically the result has been most gratifying, spiritually it has been most encouraging."

Baptist.

Kingsthorpe Church, Northampton (Rev. F. Neal), held its seventy-ninth anniversary on Easter Monday. Rev. H. Collings (Clipstone) preached in the afternoon, and at the evening meeting Rev. W. Fidler (Towcester) presided. The secretary reported that the spiritual outlook was very hopeful. The membership stands at 161. Notwithstanding special financial strain, £42 has been raised for the Twentieth Century Fund. Helpful addresses were delivered by Revs. H. Collings, J. Field, and S. W. Hughes. There was a capital attendance throughout the day.

The 247th anniversary of old Stevington Baptist Meeting was celebrated on March 28, when the pastor and a number of friends from Rushden Church visited this—the mother church of most, if not all, the Baptist churches in Bedfordshire and adjoining counties. Addresses of an inspiring character were given by Mr. W. H. Griffith, of Rushden, and Revs. J. Gordon and W. F. Harris. The meeting at Stevington was commenced in 1655, and the present building, which is in good preservation, was built in 1720. Stevington meeting was the centre of Baptist principles in the days of Bunyan.

A breakfast given on March 27 by Rev. F. B. Meyer, B.A., to ministers and members of Free Church Councils in the S.E. London district, at Rye Lane Baptist Church, Peckham, was followed by a conference. Suggestions were made as to the revival of dying churches, the getting at non-churchgoers, individual effort in winning men, and the helping of working men by lending rooms for clubs, &c. Mr. Meyer presided, and short speeches were given by Revs. J. Stephens, B.A., J. W. Ewing, M.A., J. P. Gledstone, J. Fletcher, and Mr. J. E. Sears (secretary). The conference was full of interest and intensely practical.

Methodist.

A deficit of £6,000 will have to be reported at the Wesleyan Foreign Mission anniversary in May. Expenditure has exceeded the estimates by £5,000, and the income is £1,200 below the amount expected.

The bequest made by the will of Mr. John Henry Wanhurst to the Methodist New Connexion is to be devoted largely for connexional extension purposes. The amount available is stated by Sir Charles Skelton to amount to about £40,000.

The "Garrett Memorial Hall," as the proposed new Wesleyan Central Hall in Liverpool is to be called, is to be erected on the ground on which the Mount Pleasant Hall stands. It is Connexional property, and is in the midst of a dense population, which the missioners are anxious to reach.

Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, who has been staying at Bournemouth since November last, will leave that popular resort on Saturday next, but he will not return to work in London until September next. Later on he hopes to take up his residence at Hindhead, coming to London every week for his Sunday work at St. James's Hall.

Presbyterian.

At the anniversary of the church at Penrith the services, conducted by Rev. Ebenezer Ritchie, of Blackburn, were impressive and helpful, the attendance on both occasions being large. In the evening a crowded meeting was held in the church, which was presided over by Rev. James Christie, of Carlisle, who gave an inspiring address on the late Principal Cairns. Rev. A. Dalrymple Gray, minister of the congregation, also took part.

The hall in connection with the new congregation of St. George's, Moston Lane, Manchester, was opened on Sunday last, when the services were conducted by Rev. A. H. Drysdale, M.A. (Morpeth), Moderator-designate of Synod. The hall, which seats 300, is situated in one of the most populous working class districts of Manchester, and has been built under the auspices of the Church Extension Committee of the Manchester Presbytery at a cost of £1,500.

Fallen Asleep.

Mr. Robert Newton, a deacon of King Street Baptist Church, Oadham, and a devoted and energetic labourer in many branches of Christian service.—A well-known Pennsylvanian pastor, Rev. D. L. Turner, of Hartsville, in his seventy-ninth year. Mr. Turner was a lineal descendant of William Brewster, the Puritan postmaster at Scrooby, who in 1620 sailed in the Mayflower to New England.—At Fermoy suddenly, Rev. Joseph Fraser Hurst, B.A., Presbyterian minister, aged fifty-eight years.—At Holy Trinity vicarage, Cliftonville, Margate, Rev. Walter Senior. In 1887 he accepted from evangelical trustees the vicarage of Trinity, Margate, where he worked vigorously till his death. Mr. Senior was a strong evangelical and a zealous supporter of the Church Missionary and the Bible Societies.—Mr. John Henry Tucker, eldest son of the late Rev. J. K. Tucker, rector of Pettough, Suffolk, at Blackheath, on April 1, after three days' illness, aged sixty-seven. Mr. Tucker was an ardent and bold champion of the Protestant cause, and a member of the Council of the Church Association.

Requests for Prayer.

For Gospel services and Bible studies being conducted in Berkshire villages by Mr. A. E. Sidford.

That 100,000 Gospels, 15,000 New Testaments, and 2,500 Bibles, provided for India, may all be watered by the Holy Ghost. Applications keep coming in from missionaries, for which no provision has been made.

Personalia.

Rev. Robert Wallace, of the Marchmont Home, Belleville, sails to-day for Canada with a party of children, and would much value the prayers of our readers for a safe and prosperous voyage for these little ones, such as has been vouchsafed to the thousands who have preceded them.

Rev. R. J. Seton Adamson has been appointed rector of Delaware by the Bishop of Huron. Mr. Adamson has been successively incumbent of Owen Sound and rector of Southampton, Ontario. Like his father, the vicar of Old Ford, he is a staunch Protestant Evangelical. His earnest and Scriptural ministry has been greatly blessed in the diocese of Huron.

The Y.M.C.A.

At Burton-on-Trent on Easter Monday Mr. Lewis Barber, J.P., presided over the twenty-second annual Conference of the Midland District Union of Y.M.C.A.'s. There was a good attendance of delegates, representing sixteen different Associations. The chief subjects of conference were—(a) "The Relations of the Y.M.C.A. and the Churches," and (b) "Y.M.C.A. Work at Volunteer Summer Encampments."

Over a hundred of the leading residents of Cape Town were present at a luncheon given in connection with the completion of the handsome enlarged buildings of the Y.M.C.A. Mr. J. D. Cartwright, M.L.A., president, was in the chair, and was supported by Mr. Councillor W. Thorne (Mayor of Cape Town), Sir Bisset Berry (Speaker), Hon. A. Douglass, M.L.A. (Colonial Secretary), and Sir Somerset French (Postmaster-General. Mr. Will G. Sprigg, to whose devoted service the efficiency and success of the work are largely due, is shortly retiring from the general secretaryship on account of his health.

The sixteenth anniversary of the Bayswater Association was held recently at the Paddington Baths Hall. There was a large attendance, and the proceedings were marked by deep fervour. Mr. Walter Wild, the secretary, said that the various meetings held during the past year have been most profitable and helpful, having an earnest and spiritual tone. Upwards of 600 meetings had been held in the year, in addition to open-air services. The other agencies employed to benefit in a variety of ways the young men engaged in business houses in this part of West London were lucidly set forth in the report, which furnishes a striking record of good work. Addresses were subsequently given by Rev. Canon Fleming, who spoke on the Y.M.C.A. and its usefulness as "a great missionary society, at home and abroad," and Rev. F. B. Meyer, who set before young men the importance of noble ideals, and the value of a Christian life.

The Christian.

☞ To avoid delay it is requested that all letters relating to business matters should be addressed to the firm, Messrs. Morgan and Scott, and not to its individual members. Letters of a personal nature should in every case be so marked.

Communications for The Christian should be addressed to the Editor, 12, Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C. All Advertisements should be sent to Messrs. John Haddon and Co., Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

☞ The Publishers request that all orders for The Christian by post, and remittances for same, be addressed to "The Christian" Postal Department, Bouverie House, Salisbury Square, London, E.C. Cheques and Post Orders to be made payable to Messrs. John Haddon and Co. at that address. (For Subscription rates, see Page 1 of Cover.) Postcard or stamped envelope should be enclosed if receipt is desired.

Notes & Comments

Personal Evangelism. We have followed with interest the correspondence in a contemporary upon the subject of personal evangelism; and we are persuaded that the right note has been struck throughout. It is evident that special missions do not attract, as once they did, great numbers of bona-fide non-church-goers. The Spirit of God seems to be directing attention once more to that ancient Philip and Andrew method of securing souls one by one by means of personal influence. It is perfectly certain that the great mass of people can only be reached in this way. Perhaps the greatest need of modern Church life is a quickening of the sense of individual responsibility for the salvation of men. It is thrilling to estimate of what might be accomplished if every communicant in this land exercised a direct influence for Christ upon the circle of acquaintances best known to him.

Brotherhood in Christ. Although the path to reunion may be beset with difficulties, there is no reason why there should not be a development of Christian friendliness between those who are working by different methods in the same harvest field. Mr. C. S. Read, at the Norwich Diocesan Conference, told how this spirit influenced the late Bishop Wilberforce. He was on one occasion approached by a young curate, who asked advice how he should treat a Primitive Methodist preacher. "Treat him with the greatest possible respect," said the bishop, "and thank God he has been the means of preserving a spirit of religion and piety in your parish."

Not as the Scribes. The Principal of Hackney College, in a discourse delivered recently at the midday service at Bishopsgate Chapel, based upon St. Mark i. 22, some forcible views in regard to authority in preaching. He strongly urged that, if modern preaching is to arrest the attention of the people, it must undoubtedly be dogmatic. The essential note of good preaching, and that which differentiates the teaching of Jesus from that of the scribes, is authority:—

> Jesus Christ, as a preacher, is the example to follow. He was not rhetorical, nor eloquent, nor pompous, but He was authoritative. There may be literary grace and beautiful thoughts, but if moral weight is lacking there will be no good results. It is not Christianity to be merely in sympathy with Christ: Christianity is to obey Him.

In too many cases the pulpit is influenced by modern refinement, and an essay in apologetics is substituted for a stern denunciation of sin, and a clear declaration of God's offer of salvation.

The Pulpit and Unbelief. It is a grave question to what extent a Christian minister should deal, in the pulpit, with current unbelief. No true servant of God desires to shirk the difficulties which may be troubling his people, nor does any true man desire to suggest sceptical notions to those who, happily, have never been troubled with them. And yet the latter danger is always present when a man undertakes publicly to combat scepticism. The president of the Wesleyan Conference, speaking to the ministers of Bristol last week, dealt with this difficulty, and wisely advised them to devote themselves to the positive exposition of the great truths of the Gospel. There is a way of preaching positive truth which at once places in clear day the Christian verity, and also makes unbelief at least intellectually impossible. Bare statements of the truth are not of much permanent use. Wise master-builders must, above all things, lay a solid foundation which no storm of unbelief can possibly touch. Thorough teaching is the best preventive against doubt.

Working from the Centre. The very serious and increasing lapse of older scholars from the Sunday-school is naturally giving great anxiety to the leaders in that branch of Christian service. The question was fairly faced last week in the largest provincial Association of Sunday-schools, and some attempt was made to offer a solution of the grave problem. Rev. Carey Bonner, the vigorous secretary of the Sunday School Union, puts his finger upon the very centre of the weakness, when he declares that people have forgotten that the home is the true and natural centre of all teaching and Christian ministry. The Sunday-school can never take the place of the home, but it can become, and should become, its most powerful auxiliary. Where there is a contradiction between the life of the home and the teaching of the school, all the probabilities are in favour of the home influence preponderating—and when that influence is bad, ungodly, and un-Christian, there is little wonder that youths and maidens should, at the age of choice, turn in the wrong direction. For good or evil, the home is the centre from which all work. The greatest need of our country to-day is a pure, sober, Christian home life. The majority of parents, however, do not realize this.

Education and Popular Control. There is a strong tide of indignation rising, among those who believe in the principle of religious toleration, against the new Education Bill. It is felt that it is a thoroughly backward step both politically and religiously to endow "voluntary" (which means "denominational") schools out of the rates without providing the safeguard of effective popular control. It is not too much to say that no Government would dare introduce such a principle into any other branch of legislation. It is one of the misfortunes of our times that elementary education has been the last stronghold of religious strife in the community, to the great detriment of both education and religion. This Bill, instead of helping on the good time when this deplorable fact will be effaced, tends to perpetuate and embitter the contest, and to re-introduce the controversial spirit which has so long been the bane of our English political life.

Another Hint from the Colonies. A lesson comes back to the Old Country from her latest colonial child on the best method of settling the religious difficulty in education. In Rhodesia, there is a tentative ordinance under which every minister of any denomination has the right to have time allotted to him for the religious instruction during school hours (not more than half an hour per day) of the children of his denomination. A correspondent of the Mission Field, the organ of the S.P.G., writes:—

> We are working cordially with the Government on these lines. At Salisbury there is a public school under Government. We visit the school regularly and instruct our children. At Umtali the American Methodists have the school. Here, too, we have the right, but arrange for our religious teaching by a guild of children and in Sunday-school. At Buluwayo we have our St. John's School with 130 children. Here there are a number of Jewish children, who are taught religion by their Rabbi each morning, whilst one of our clergy teaches our children in another room. My own feeling is that this is the only true and straightforward solution of the religious question in schools receiving public money, and in nine cases out of ten ought to work smoothly, and would save the rights of religion and be the true conscience clause.

If the same catholic spirit of co-operation were shown at home, it would greatly help to allay the present acute and threatening situation. But in our own land, in view of the contention of parties, the only safe rule is the status quo, which provides for the reading of the Scriptures without controversial comment on the part of the teachers.

A Colossal Project. In the April number of the Review of Reviews, a remarkable account is given of the life-aims and of the religious "beliefs" of Mr. Cecil Rhodes. The former included an ambitious project for the subjugation of the whole world under the control of the English-speaking peoples, in which America was to be co-ordinate with Britain and her colonies. One of his proposals for securing this end was the establishment of "a secret society of millionaires organized on the plan of the Jesuits," who would be pledged to leave their wealth, not to "incompetent relatives," but to great public purposes. Mr. Rhodes' provision of scholarships at Oxford to elect sons of the race in America, the Colonies and Germany, was but one item in his vast plans. There is something colossal about the conception, but those who believe in the working of a Divine providence will feel that this great man was apt to mistake his own plans for those of the Almighty, and to imagine that the Divine purposes could only be attained in the line of his own ambitions. Those who have acted on this basis in past times have gone far astray in their calculations.

The "Religion" of Mr. Rhodes. Mr. Rhodes' attitude towards the great mysteries of religion was painfully vague and unsatisfactory. It is humiliating that a man brought up as he was, in the full light of the Gospel, should have given utterance to the flippant judgment that it was "an even chance" that there was a God; and that the only use which he made of this extraordinary dictum was to buttress himself up in his own personal ambitions, by saying that if there be a God, "I think that what He would have me do is to paint as much of the map of Africa British red as possible." This is not the attitude of a devout and serious mind, and, in view of the far-reaching hero-worship which he enjoyed, the words are calculated to do untold mischief.

The Rebuke to Idlers. One of the most remarkable items of Mr. Rhodes' remarkable will is that in which he refuses any benefit to any person who has not done at least ten years' work in some business or profession. His estate is not to be the playground of idlers. This is a bold and salutary stand to take, and coming from such a man it ought to weigh considerably with men who affect to scorn hard work. The true interests of life can never be really served by men who are on the look-out for the easiest way of amassing money—honestly or dishonestly; whilst it can be even less served by the human parasites who think that society exists for their convenience. It would be an excellent thing if every man who bequeaths money and property would safeguard both it and the heirs in some such way as Mr. Rhodes has done. The law of work is essential for everyone; there can be more true character apart from its operation.

Cause and Effect. The Home Secretary has apparently been studying the literature of the temperance movement, and has come to recognise the relationship between the drink traffic and the national death-rate. Speaking in the House the other night he said:—

> In England and Wales between 1877 and 1881, the average number of deaths from intemperance per million among men was sixty-nine, and among women thirty-one. In 1892 to 1896 the average for men was reduced to sixty-one per million, while the average for women had increased to thirty-nine. The proportion of men had decreased by 12 per cent., and the average for women had increased by 25 per cent.

The matter is one simply for legislative activity. In 1837 the deaths from arsenical poisoning averaged 6·5 per million of the population, and in compliance with the public demand an Act was passed fencing the sale of the dangerous poison with safeguards. To-day there are only four deaths for over 30 millions of the population.

Our Sailors. A naval officer has been writing to The Times concerning the men of the service, whose exposure to temptation is so serious. He complains that the crews "frequent the lowest and most degrading quarters" which are found in the vicinity of the ships, and then suggests, as a remedy, the formation of a Sailors' Rest at every port. These "Rests" exist already in large numbers, and for years they have been doing most excellent work. Our own columns bear frequent testimony to their value amongst sailors. There is ample room, however, for extension. Further, we should certainly like to see some strong attempt made to remove from the sailor's path the temptation to which he so easily succumbs. Why are the vilest drink dens, and places even worse than these, allowed to flourish in the neighbourhood of the docks? The authorities have the matter in their own hands; let these hells be peremptorily removed, and one of the chief death traps for the sailor would at once disappear.

Practical Temperance Work. It is stated that an association in Berlin is engaged in establishing halls, where workpeople can hold meetings without resorting to the public-house for the accommodation. The step is one which temperance societies in England might take with great advantage, for there can be no doubt that the arrangement under which, in the case of only too many branches of Friendly Societies, publicans provide rooms free of rent, and depend upon the consumption of drink for their remuneration, is one productive of much intemperance. Perhaps some of our total abstinence associations will take the matter up.

The Ethics of Commerce. A brave and earnest attempt has just been made, by a number of Manchester young men and women engaged in business, to face fairly the pressing problem of modern business life in the light of the ethics of the Gospel. We congratulate the four hundred persons who assisted at the meeting, not only for the part they took in it, but also because of the example they have given to others. It is a significant thing that the one speaker, whose words on "bowing in the House of Rimmon" were interpreted to mean that an employé might lower the standard of honour in certain circumstances, received unmistakable evidence from the audience that his suggestion was entirely unwelcome. The audience, on the contrary, entirely agreed with another speaker, that lying and shady practices in business were simply impossible to a Christian—whether master or servant. If Christian employés everywhere could meet in conference in this way, untold good would come of it. Those who are tried by vexatious customs would gain strength to overcome, whilst a conscience would be created amongst some who at present are very lax in the matter of commercial honesty.

The Labourers' Exodus. Mr. G. F. Masterman, dealing, in The Commonwealth, with the statistics of the last Census return, takes a melancholy view of the future of the English village, and lays stress upon the decline of the birth-rate from 37·8 to 31·5 in the past twenty years, "an ominous drop for a country that has annexed half the world, and desires to populate it with an English-speaking race." In Mr. Masterman's opinion, the passing of the village means a dismal history of national decline; the great towns drinking up the best life of the country—a process towards extinction which cannot indefinitely continue:—

> With a deserted land studded with a few country houses and shooting centres, each supporting a semi-parasitic population; villages of old men and women, the lame, the tired, the mentally vacant; the fields, as now in Essex, passing back to the condition of waste and veldt, where "the down of the thistles in the month of August may be seen blowing all over the country like a snowstorm," and the English people collected in great lumps and blotches of population with glare and noise and heated congested life—what can we anticipate but a profound and fundamental upheaval in all the characteristics which we have hitherto associated with the old national life of England?

The Worship of Success. Just now, when men, like children, are caught with the glitter of imposing spectacles, it would be a great advantage if everyone could read "The Talk with Young Men," which Mr. J. A. Hammerton gives in the current Family Friend. Among other things he says:—

> To my mind there is no greater danger confronting the young men of to-day than the tendency to exalt worldly success above character. In politics, in literature, in the commercial world, in social life the man who succeeds is the man who is admired, and few seem to care two straws for the methods whereby that success has been attained.

Unhappily, for the time, this is true. The man with money or with fame can command the public, quite apart from his personal character. There are men—many of them, God be thanked—who like the three children, remain erect, whilst the rest of the world bows down to the golden image. We must work so that the number of such may be multiplied; but we must begin early, and teach the children from the beginning that a man's only real glory is "in the Lord."

Young Women and Service. In a recent issue attention was called to the sordid conditions of life in provincial slums, and it was pointed out that the evils which bear so injuriously upon the poor in certain districts of the Metropolis are just those which are powerful in the degradation of multitudes in country towns. The inadequate remuneration for home manufacture of garments is undoubtedly largely accountable for this. The wonder is that so many girls and young women are content to sit down and suffer under these starvation wages. Christians who move in and out among the noble band of needle-workers will do well to remind them that it is now a matter of choice, since there is room to-day for thousands of young people in comfortable situations where they can command reasonable wages. Why the wretched conditions of slum life are endured in preference to the more congenial surroundings of domestic service, is a question which has perplexed many minds. It must be confessed that the love of pleasure and liberty, even to licence, is undermining the gentle womanliness of the girls of our land, making them reckless of consequences, if only the absorbing passion for so-called enjoyment can be gratified.

The Preaching of Luck. Nearly every newspaper and magazine has contained for some months past one or more advertisements offering the great secret of getting on in life for the consideration of a few shillings. An investment of this sum is to result in the acquisition of powers which will place the world at the feet of any man or woman. The continuance of these expensive advertisements is a revelation of the extent to which the popular mind is open to the preaching of what is called "luck." Hundreds of thousands of people, it appears, have sought the possession of the great secret. All this kind of thing means that many men have yet to learn the lesson that the only way to true success is not along the seductive bye-path of "luck," but along the King's highway of holiness, honesty, and hard work.

A Serious Situation. Nonconformist Churches are often told that they are not keeping pace with the growth of population. The same seems to be increasingly true of the Church of England. The official returns betray an alarming drop in the number of persons confirmed during the last few years. In ten years the number of confirmations in a year has fallen, with some fluctuations, from 214,730 to 195,693. In the last recorded year the decrease was 8,500. A similar decrease occurs in the number of baptisms and of Sunday-school scholars; and still more so in the membership of the Temperance Societies connected with the Church, both in the abstaining and in the non-abstaining sections. In view of the great activity of the High Church party, this is all the more serious. In this there is an emphatic call to all religious bodies to do their utmost to renew and extend their hold on the population of this country. There are many things fighting against them; but in the spiritual warfare this should be an added reason for strenuous and unremitting effort. The Gospel is still the power of God unto salvation, but it needs to be more simply and effectively preached.

On "FURIOUS DRIVING."

THE development of haste and rapid transit so characteristic of modern times points not only to successful business or exciting pleasure, but to an imminent danger. The racing horse, the scorching cycle, the puffing motor, imperil our safety in the day and haunt our dreams by night. But against these the law provides a remedy.

Not so, however, against the no less varied forms of danger that beset the spiritual life; for therein, too, is furious driving found. This art was highly developed by a man in Old Testament times, Jehu by name, whose character has become a byword on this account. (Read 2 Kings ix, x.)

A strong and interesting personality, he was a product of the stirring times in which he lived; a man whose influence was felt wherever he went; who could not do things by halves. God raised him up at a particular time, to do a particular work, and he delighted in the task. But his strength revealed inherent weakness. He obeyed the command of God as to the destruction of Baal, but for himself retained the worship of the golden calves.

It was not to establish idolatry, as such, that Jeroboam had set up these objects of worship; he seems rather to have conceived the idea of their forming a medium by which the people might worship God, without having to undertake protracted journeys to Jerusalem from north or south. It was a policy of expediency, and there was a sort of refinement about this form of idolatry that was absent in the grosser rites of Ashtoreth and Baal.

Into this snare Jehu fell, and thereby injured what had otherwise been a useful and powerful career. "Come, see my zeal for the Lord!" he cried, as exultingly he lashed his horses in the direction of the groves. Down went the idols, overthrown were the altars, massacred the priests. Surely a divine work, to lead the people back to God!

But while slaying and denouncing others, it was the animal nature of the man at work, the unconsecrated zeal of one strong in the flesh, but sadly deficient in the spirit. "He took no heed (margin, "observed not") to walk in the law of the Lord" (x. 31). Walking was not his forte, when horses and a chariot were to be had. Such a man is as much a danger as a deliverer. A great force in public, in private he may be a minus quantity.

He "observed not," he cared not, when once his passion was inflamed. As with Stephenson's engine, so with him—all must flee out of his way, or, "so much the worse" for them. Strong in dealing with others, he was weak in regard to himself. Abjuring the grosser kinds of sin, its more subtle and insidious forms nestled within his heart. He fain would keep the vineyards of others, but his own was a bed of weeds. He did some splendid work for God, but he marred his record by the "little foxes" that spoiled his vine.

Are there not many such around us to-day? Nay, are we not all more or less prone to make the same mistake? The natural man finds it a congenial task to put other people right, to denounce and scatter those whose idolatry differs from his own. Have we not known men who were champions against Rome, but who fell a prey to drink; who were red-hot upon orthodoxy, but could not control an evil temper; who were strong on temperance, but failed to curb the tongue? Let us not cast stones at Jehu, if we dwell in a house of glass. Better walk slowly in the law of the Lord, holy and just and good, than drive furiously, to fall at last.

Zeal is badly needed, truly; but let not zeal over-ride discretion, or disaster will ensue. You may be engaged in a work for God, praiseworthy in itself, but its efficiency will be sadly marred by lack of circumspection to "observe the law of the Lord."

SYMMETRY OF CHARACTER.

First, then, let us take heed to ourselves, that our Christian character be not unequally developed; that we become not like the lobster with one great protruding claw; intent upon some one spiritual hobby, to the exclusion of all else. Let us seek the symmetry of the grace of God, and "adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things." Then may confidently be committed to our care some great work for Him, which shall win some while not repelling others, and we shall commend our service by reason of its well-balanced spiritual force.

Second, let us consider others. "We that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves." Many there are, threading their anxious way across the dangerous spots of life. They have arrived, perchance, at a cross-road, and are in doubt as to the right course to pursue. (How often do parents find their children thus)! Be not impatient at their trepidation, lest you cause them to stumble to their hurt.

We have known some who are in doubt as to the path of orthodox belief, perhaps in regard to inspiration, future punishment, or what not. Gently dealt with, they will cross in safety, if given time to weigh the issue. Force them to premature decision, and they are more than likely to take the wrong direction, or fall beneath your chariot wheel.

They are not all priests of Baal who go not to your conventicle. You may be right, they may be wrong; but upon your treatment of them their eternal welfare may depend. "He gently leads" those that falter or are overburdened. They cannot keep your pace to-day, but to-morrow they may not be far behind, if treated thus. They may be led, not driven. There is a sweet reasonableness about the Gospel of Christ. "Deal gently with the young man," though rebel he may appear to you. Your kindly word of counsel, directing him intelligently into the truth of God, may turn him from the error of his way; and you shall save a soul from death, and hide his multitude of sins.

He who would drive furiously requires a level head; he who is full of zeal must have

A LEVEL HEART.

There will probably be great surprises by-and-by, when, in fulfilment of our Master's words, "many who are first shall be last, and the last first." Some who had anticipated a chief place in the Kingdom may find that precedence is given to others whom they had despised. One who has "observed" more closely "the law of the Lord," to "love the Lord his God with all his heart, and his neighbour as himself," who has exercised a quiet pervading influence, may see the furious driver many seats below.

We stand to-day in the portrait-gallery of these men of olden time, as in an ancestral hall; we study them, we criticize them, we scan their features, we dissect their lives. A year hence, or sooner, we may stand amid the great cloud of witnesses before the throne. God grant that meantime we may profit by the lessons we have learned, that we be not hereafter put to shame. "Playing at Missions."

WE have spoken highly of missions, and of missionaries on the field. Had our stay in India extended over years instead of months; had we seen ten missions where we have seen one; had our view been less cursory than it has necessarily been—we might probably have observed some defects which have escaped our observation; and we should doubtless have come in contact with many more of the same quality as those who have laid down their lives in ministering to the famine-stricken in India; or those who have suffered death by sudden violence or prolonged torture in China. And these would have been native no less than European.

Nevertheless, the words of the great missionary, Dr. Alexander Duff, remain true—that we are but playing at missions. Taking the churches as a whole, we are trifling with the Great Commission, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature."

For what are we doing in this twentieth century, since the Lord Christ gave his last promise and his last command—"Ye shall receive the power of the Holy Ghost coming upon you; and ye shall be my witnesses, both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth"?

Considering that the Church of Christ, "which is his body, the fulness of Him that filleth all in all," exists on earth for the purpose of being his witnesses, of preaching the Gospel by life and lip, by word and work to every creature, is it not trifling with a great responsibility to spend ten times as much on religious and semi-religious luxuries at home as on the barest necessaries of spiritual life in the great heathen world?

"BRING THE WHOLE TITHE."

It is most true that apart from our Lord and the operation of his Spirit we can do nothing. But when we cry to our Father in heaven to fill our mouths with good things, does He not reply, "Open thy mouth wide and I will fill it?" Jesus at the grave of Lazarus said, "Roll ye away the stone." And while God yearns to bless, as He always does, is it not on the condition that we "bring the whole tithe (R.V.) into the storehouse"?

Probably every Revival is the answer to some prayer from one or two or more earnest souls who have heard or read of the wonderful works of God, until desire was awakened and a cry went up which loosed the ever-willing hands of God. And such revivals have never fallen short of the faith and prayer which expected great things from God, and attempted great things for God.

But can we expect the windows of heaven to be opened, and such blessings to be poured out, if we withhold the tithes; tithes of loved and loving children educated, cultured, trained to shine in society or to achieve success in profession or business in these forward days; tithes of money and property; tithes of times and thought; tithes of study and meditation on the great love of God in the Word made flesh that He might put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself; tithes of pity for the millions of souls living and dying without hope and without God in the world; tithes of our whole being, spirit and soul and body? "Bring ye the whole tithe into the storehouse that there may be meat in my house; and PROVE ME now herewith, saith the Lord of hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing that there shall not be room enough to receive it" (Mal. iii, 10).

But words enlarge their meaning. The Gospel enthused the Greek words for love and grace with a new and higher significance. And translators of the Scriptures into heathen languages are still obliged to use words which do not as yet express divine thoughts, because those thoughts do not exist in the heathen mind. But such words become transfigured, and shine with a divine glory, as they are used to express the mind and will of God as the truth is in Jesus.

The Gospel cannot be satisfied with limiting the tithe due to God to a tenth part. When Joseph had laid up corn for the salvation of Egypt, the people willingly gave a double tithe, a fifth part, and said, "Thou hast saved our lives; let us find grace in the sight of my lord, and we will be Pharaoh's servants."

But the Antitype of Joseph has saved us with a greater, an eternal salvation. And "Ye are not your own, ye are bought with a price. Ye are a temple of God." "I beseech you, therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God—your reasonable service, your spiritual worship."

Abraham brought "the whole tithe" when he offered Isaac upon the altar. And Isaac, and Jephthah's daughter, and the elders of whom the world was not worthy, and the eleven apostles, and Paul the twelfth, as one born out of due time—all these brought "the whole tithe" when they gave themselves up to death, or became the offscouring of all things for Jesus' name.

Above all, God brought "the whole tithe" when He "spared not his own Son, but delivered Him up for us all." And Jesus the Son of God brought "the whole tithe" when He gave Himself for us—when He "suffered for sins, the Just for the unjust, that He might bring us to God."

Let us meditate upon these things; let us give ourselves wholly to them; that our progress may be "manifest unto all." M.

A Solemn Thought!

"So much to do, so little done!"
Said Africa's illustrious son,
In whose short life was crowded seen,
What deemed as "much" to most had been.

"So much to do, so little done!"
How true the words of every one,
Who, unprepared, sees death in view,
With no kind hand to help them through.

How different to the saint of old,
Whose faith in glowing words is told:
"My course is finished, race is run;
Henceforth the glory and the crown!"

To live was "Christ," to die was "gain;"
How empty other lives, and vain!
How blest to say, as sinks life's sun,
"Through Christ, life's glorious victory's won!"

ALBERT MIDLANE.

The Cruelty of Fashion.—The Society for the Protection of Birds is doing excellent work not only in Britain but in Continental countries, the Colonies, and in India, in the interest of "the fowls of the air," the feathered creatures of whom Jesus said that "not one falleth to the ground without your Father." It seems, however, that influential as the society is in the way of influencing legislation, and educating the agricultural mind as to the beneficial co-operation of the birds, it is to a certain extent powerless before the rule of silly and objectionable fashion. The committee say:—"The most repellant feature of bird adornment this season has perhaps been the use of whole terns, or sea swallows, or gulls' wings—a revival of the evil fashion which called forth the famous counterblast from Professor Newton at the meeting of the British Association. Many of these are undoubtedly English-killed birds, as the slaughter of gulls and terns is still carried on to a barbarous extent on the Yorkshire coast. . . . It is still a trade, though a diminished one, in that district, and it is stated that one person alone has entered into a contract to supply 10,000 birds to a London milliner."

Has the Gospel Run Out?

By Rev. THEODORE L. CUYLER, D.D.

A VERY able and influential daily paper has declared that, "There is an impression in some quarters that the Bible is not in touch with these modern times; that its possibilities have been exhausted, and that, in order to retain its hold on the masses, the Church must more closely align itself with liberal and advanced thinking. No one can have failed to observe that the pulpit nowadays is not so much an agency for the dissemination of the Gospel as it is a lecture platform for the delivery of prize essays."

The editor goes on to say that a search of newspaper files for six months past would show what an enormous number of sermons have been on "social and secular topics, and that these ministers are presumably afraid that if they confine themselves to the Gospel they will be accused of want of progressiveness."

These are weighty words of warning; and they do not proceed from a hostile source, for this article concludes by saying: "The Bible fits into modern times just as well as it did any other period of the world's history; the great need of the pulpit is strength and power, and these qualities are sacrificed to the extent that ministers of the Gospel ignore the Word on which Christianity rests."

God's Word goes a great many leagues deeper than any problems of social philosophy. It goes to the roots of things. It strikes down into the depraved human heart as the source of all the sins and the wrongs and the sorrows and the sufferings that exist in this present evil world. Satan's throne is in the unregenerate heart: and out of that heart proceed the evil thoughts, the cruelties, the adulteries, the thefts, the murders, the falsehoods, and all the swarm of mischiefs and miseries that afflict society.

Christ's Gospel is the only remedy that can reach the heart; and therefore it is the chief and foremost duty of every Christian minister to preach and to press home that heaven-sent message upon every conscience. Any so-called reformation that stops short of renewing men's hearts can only be shallow and short-lived.

Jesus Christ, the healer of sick bodies, came into this world chiefly to save sin-sick souls. He preached

HEART-REPENTANCE AND HOLY LIVING.

Paul and his fellow-apostles did not go about lecturing on sociologies, even in that corrupt age. They grappled with the mightier problem of man's utter heart-depravity, and struck for nothing less than putting Jesus Christ into men's souls, and their entire regeneration by the Holy Spirit. That is the prime office of the Gospel of redemption. What business, my dear brethren, have you or I to be scratching on the surface of things, when the Holy Spirit commissions us and charges us to go down to the roots of all evil things? The wonder-working Gospel of atonement, faith, regeneration, and supporting grace—which is God's masterpiece—has no more "run out" than has the law of gravitation, and is no more "antiquated" than are fresh air and sunshine.

An admirable object lesson for all ministers may be found in the successful career of Richard Baxter in the manufacturing town of Kidderminster. When he came there, the town was overrun with wickedness. He did not ignore the bodily needs of his parishioners, for he had great skill in medicine, and great assiduity in caring for the sick. He did not ignore their domestic and social conditions, for he laboured for the cleanliness and comfort of their homes. But his chief aim was the salvation of their souls; and as he honoured the Gospel, God honoured him, and gave him a great baptism of spiritual power. After several years of genuinely apostolic labours, Kidderminster was not only reformed, it was revolutionized.

NEW HEARTS MADE NEW HOMES

and a new state of society. Baxter said that instead of profanity, drunkenness and Sabbath-breaking, he could walk the streets on Sunday evenings and hear the sounds of psalms or Bible-readings in well nigh every dwelling.

Human nature—whether in mansion or in hovel—has not changed since Baxter's day, or since the apostles' time. Christianity has not changed, and never will. It provides for the life that now is, and infinitely more for the life that is to come.

To his ministers God entrusts this life-giving Gospel—not to be altered, or overlaid or veneered, much less to be apologized for or concealed. Its sublime purpose is to bring God to man, and man to God. Time can never "antiquate" this precious Gospel; it is as fresh, and as indispensable and powerful, as it was when it was thundered from the lips of Paul. Woe be to this world if the Gospel "runs out"!

Did Thomas Touch our Lord's Body?

By Rev. RICHARD GLOVER, M.A., Rector of Wotton, Dorking.

IT seems to me very strange how almost universally it is taken for granted that Thomas actually touched our Lord's body after resurrection, because our Lord invited him to do so: "Reach hither thy finger, and thrust it into my side," &c. But it does not say that he actually did so. Jesus said to him, "Thomas, because thou hast seen Me, thou hast believed."

But it seems to me strongly implied that, though he was helped to conviction by the sight of Christ, and by the sound of his voice, yet the great source of his conviction was that Christ's address to him proved that though He was not visibly present when Thomas, on the previous Lord's Day evening, uttered the words, "Except I shall see in his hands the print of the nails, and put my finger into the print of the nails, and thrust my hand into his side, I will not believe—" yet Jesus had heard and knew the very words that he had then uttered, and all the thoughts that had passed through his mind, and thus proved that He was Omniscient and, therefore, Divine.

This, I think, was the process in his mind when he heard Christ's address to him: "It is indeed Jesus! I see it is. But how marvellous! He addresses me in the very words I used last Lord's Day evening. He must then have been invisibly present. He must know our very words and thoughts, and therefore must be God as well as man! My Lord! and my God!"

And may we not infer from our Lord's acceptance of that homage—the homage, as the words proved, due to the Most High God—that He was indeed what Thomas called Him? Peter was not silent when Cornelius offered him worship, but he said at once, "Stand up, I myself also am a man." And when John in Patmos "fell down to worship before the feet of the angel which showed him these things, then said he unto him, See thou do it not; for I am thy fellow-servant; worship God" (Rev. xxii. 8, 9). Surely Jesus, who was far more "lowly and meek," and far more jealous of the honour due to God alone than either St. Peter or St. John, would not by his silence have accepted those exalted epithets as his due, if they were not his due; but would have refused them as resolutely as they did. In this view, the accepted exclamation of Thomas is one of the strongest indications of the proper Deity of the Saviour that we find in Holy Scripture.

Samuel and Saul.

By Rev. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

The Causes of Saul's Downfall.

(1 Sam. xiii. 13, 14.)

THIS chapter is the story of a great tragedy, since it contains the history of the incident which revealed Saul's unfitness to be the founder of a line of kings. Had he stood this test, there is no doubt that he would have been, not only the first monarch of Israel, but the father of a royal race, and the whole after-history of the chosen people might have been different. But, as we shall see—though, at first, his kingdom augured prosperity to his fatherland—it evidently lacked the elements of permanence and continuity, and of becoming Israel's permanent bulwark against the invasions of the enemy from without, and of disintegration or corruption within.

Let us gather around this story, not only because it has so much to do with the history of God's people, but because it is full of instruction for ourselves. Turning from Saul to David, Samuel said, "The Lord hath sought Him a man after his own heart." It is, therefore, clear that, in some way, Saul had ceased to be "a man after God's own heart," and it becomes us carefully to inquire the reason, that we may avoid the rocks on which this good ship split and foundered.

You will remark that the chapter which tells the history of this tragedy, the overcasting of a bright morning, the spoiling of a fair and beautiful promise, also contains the story of the unutterable distress to which the chosen people had been reduced. We are told, for instance, in v. 6, that the people of Israel were in a strait, that they were distressed, that they hid themselves in caves and thickets, in rocks and in pits; indeed, some of them even crossed the Jordan, and forsook their fatherland in the hour of its extremity; while those who were yet associated with Saul and Jonathan, as the nucleus of the royal army, followed him trembling (v. 7). A spirit of fearfulness had settled down upon the whole people; the old national spirit had decayed; it seemed as though they could never again be induced to stand against the Philistines, any more than a flock of sheep against a pack of wolves.

We also have the numbers of the vast host of Philistines which had been gathered from all parts in order to crush out the movement towards a national existence, of which the coronation of Saul and the exploits of Jonathan were symptoms (v. 3). We can overhear the tidings brought to Saul (v. 5) by some panic-stricken messenger, who, with the exaggeration of abject fear, described the Philistines as the sand which is on the sea-shore in multitude.

A further proof of the hapless misery of the people is adduced in verse 19: there was no smith found throughout the whole land of Israel, and the Hebrews had to take their implements of agriculture down to the smithies of the Philistines in order that they might be sharpened for their use. Never in its history was Israel reduced to more dire calamity, more absolute hopelessness and despair.

At this juncture Saul seems to have withdrawn his troops, such as they were, from Michmash, and to have taken up his position on the ancient site of Gilgal, where the act of circumcision was performed after Israel had crossed the Jordan under Joshua. While Saul and his soldiers remained here, every day marked the diminution of the host. This man and that stole away, either across the Jordan as a fugitive, or to hide in some hole and corner of the hills.

It may be asked why, at such a time, Saul did not make one desperate effort against the Philistines. Why did he wait there day after day, whilst his army evaporated before his eyes? Ah, thereby hangs a story—to understand which we must turn back a page or two in the inspired record. In 1 Sam. x. 8, in that early morning interview, when Samuel designated Saul for the crown, he told him that the crisis of his life would overtake him at Gilgal, a prophecy the fulfilment of which had now arrived. "Thou shalt go down before me to Gilgal; and, behold, I will come down unto thee, to offer burnt-offerings, and to sacrifice sacrifices of peace-offerings: seven days shalt thou tarry, till I come unto thee, and show thee what thou shalt do."

SAUL'S GREAT MISTAKE.

Now this command, uttered three years before to Saul, as he stood on the threshold of his vast opportunities, involved two things, and each of them constituted a supreme test.

First, whether he was prepared to act as God's vicegerent, not as absolute monarch determining his own policy, and acting on his own initiative, but as God's servant, receiving the marching orders of his life through the prophet's lips; that he should not act as an autocrat, but as one to whom there had been a delegation of Divine authority.

Second, whether he could control his impetuous nature, put the curb upon his impulse, and hold himself well in hand.

It was this embargo which Samuel had laid upon him that made him wait day after day. Can you not imagine how his chosen advisers and warriors would come around him and urge him to do something? Might they not have pointed to the Philistine hosts encamped at Michmash, gathering like a cloud of storm? Might they not have told him how, unless he acted quickly, his paternal estate would be wiped out before the invasion? Might they not have pointed to the dwindling hosts, and said, Rise up and do something; it were better to die beneath the Philistines' hand than allow them to pounce down on you as the bird of prey on the trembling dove!

But he waited day after day. "He tarried seven days, according to the set time that Samuel had appointed; but Samuel came not to Gilgal, and the people were scattered from him." Then it would seem that within a brief space of the expiry of the allotted time he could wait no more. He thought that Samuel must have forgotten the appointment, or was intercepted in making his way from Ramah through the Philistine lines. He had waited till within half an hour (because to offer a burnt-offering and a peace-offering could not take much longer), and then spoiled the whole, by his inability to delay further; and he said to the priest, who still lingered by the ancient site where God had been worshipped and the Tabernacle posted, "Bring hither the ephod, and let us offer the sacrifice." "And it came to pass that as soon as he had made an end of offering the burnt-offering, behold, Samuel came."

Ah, if only some sentry standing on a pinnacle of rock could have looked over into yonder valley and seen the form of the old man drawing nearer to the camp, he might have warned the King, crying, "Samuel is coming." But there was no one to arrest him, nothing but the monition and remonstrance of his own heart. It was shown that he could not wait for God in absolute faith that He could not fail nor deceive. He was careful to maintain an outward rite, but the spirit of devotion and faith was altogether wanting. As he was, his successors would become, to the undoing of Israel; therefore his kingdom could not continue.

The one lesson that comes back to us with almost overwhelming force is, that the man who is after God's heart is the man who will obey God to the letter, who will wait for God to the last moment, who will dare to stand amid a diminishing and dwindling army, and to see disaster imminent, but, because he has not received the marching orders of God, will stand still, until presently God sets him free.

How many religious people there are, who, as they review their past life, can recall moments when they did not know what to do. An inner voice, still, sweet, but commanding, bade them wait and trust; but many other voices, loud and strident, summoned them to act; so that the still small voice of faith, of resignation, of absolute obedience, has been silenced, the one rash word spoken, the one irrevocable act performed, betraying the weakness of the heart, the ineffectiveness of the resolve.

At last, Samuel has come, and we have reproached ourselves, saying, "Oh, if I had only thought that God was so near, I would not have acted as I did; woe is me, why could not I wait?" Samuel always comes just at the last moment, but it is so hard to wait till he appears. God's mighty processes sweep around a wide orbit. One day is as a thousand years—but He is coming as the morning, as the spring, as the millennium. "His going forth is sure as the morning, and He shall come unto us as the rain, as the latter rain that watereth the earth."

SAUL'S DISINGENUOUS PLEA.

Notice Saul's explanation to Samuel. He said: "I said to myself, The Philistines will come down upon me to Gilgal, and I have not intreated the favour of the Lord. I forced myself therefore, and offered the burnt-offering." That surely was insincere. He laid the blame on circumstances; he said practically: "The circumstances of my lot forced my hand; I did not want to do it, I was most reluctant, but I could not help myself; here were the Philistines coming; I tell you the sceptre was wrested from my grasp, and I had to obey the imperious voice of the misfortunes that fell thick and fast upon me." His speech reminds us of Aaron's, who stripped the people naked before God and their enemies, and sought to excuse himself by saying, "They gave me their earrings; I cast them into the fire, and there came out this calf."

We are all prone to speak in the same tone. When the rash word has been uttered, and the proud act done; when we have refused to obey, and have seen the house of our life toppling down upon us, or consuming in the flames of our folly, then we have said, "Circumstances compelled me, I had to do it, and I did it; I forced myself, my hand was forced."

O soul of man, thou art greater than circumstances; greater than things; greater than the mob of evil counsellors. Thou art meant to be God's crowned and enthroned king; to rule and not to be ruled: to obey God only, and to resist all other attempts to bring thee under the yoke. Rouse thee, lest it should be said of thee also, that thy kingdom shall not continue.

MARK THE ALTERNATIVE TO THIS.

Samuel had said, speaking in the name of God, "I have chosen a man after my own heart, who shall perform all my will." Listen to the manner in which this man after God's own heart speaks, "I waited patiently for the Lord, and He inclined unto me, and heard my cry. He brought me up also out of an horrible pit, out of the miry clay, and He set my feet upon a rock and established my goings. And He hath put a new song in my mouth, even praise unto our God; many shall see it, and fear, and shall trust in the Lord. Blessed is the man that maketh the Lord his trust, and respecteth not the proud, nor such as turn aside to lies" (Psa. xl. 1-4).

Wait, wait thou thy Lord's leisure. Let your heart stop its feverish beating, and your pulse register no more its tumultuous waves of emotion! To act now, would only disappoint the highest hopes and mar the Divine purposes, and set stones rolling that shall never be stopped. Wait for God, stand still, and see his salvation. God's messenger is timed to come when the heart has almost failed, the steps almost gone, and hope almost vanished. "The Lord is at hand!" Oh wait, my soul, wait, wait upon God, for God cannot be behind, as He will not be before, the allotted and appointed moment.

And when He comes, there will be laughter for tears, harvest for sowing, blue skies for clouds, and long days of rapturous bliss that shall make thee forget the shame and reproach of the past!

"Our Daily Bread."

SUNDAY, April 20. Exodus xxxv.

AGAIN, on the threshold of the erection of the Tabernacle, the command of the Sabbath rest is repeated. Since fires were not needed for the cooking of the manna, it is clear that the prohibition here is against the melting of metals, or other purpose requiring a fire in the rearing of the sanctuary. Even amid these sacred labours they must rest.

The double keys of this chapter are the words willing-hearted and wise-hearted. For the former see verses 5, 22, 29. For the latter verses 10, 25, 35. It is of little use to be wise, unless we are willing. But this willingness is God's gift. Notice the words, Every one whose heart stirred him up (21, 26); and at the close of the chapter, we are told still more explicitly, The Lord hath called, He hath put in his heart to teach, and He filled with wisdom of heart.

May we not believe then that the pious Israelites (for evidently all were not included) were sensible of Divine stirrings, heard a Divine voice, and were conscious that they had only to work out what God was working in them, to will and to do of his own good pleasure? We should read 2 Cor. viii. and ix. along with this chapter; and should ask that God would incite us to similar generosity. It is good to give a tenth by rule and careful practice, but how much better when so great a spirit of love fills our heart that we sow bountifully. "God loveth a cheerful giver."

Notice that there is room and opportunity for every one to help forward the work of God. The women were needed no less than the men, and the ordinary men no less than the rulers. Nothing was required that was not found in their possession (23, 24). What is there found with you? God entrusts his property to you; see that you give Him of his own.

MONDAY, April 21. Exodus xxxvi.

How great was the honesty of the workers. They had the disposal of unlimited wealth, and might without risk of discovery, have appropriated much to their own use; but they urged that the people should be restrained from giving, so soon as they saw that they had enough. It is probable that the most gifted at the end of their task had made nothing by their efforts. It was enough for them to have wrought for God and to have pleased Him. (Remember Col. iii. 23, 24.)

Every morning, as Moses held his levée for receiving the people and adjudging their disputes, the tide of gifts flowed in. Probably the tides of generosity submerged the black rocks of envy and pride, and their liberality was very abundant. It has been calculated that the gifts of gold and silver and brass to the Tabernacle must have amounted to not less than £200,000.

The modern parallel to this is the Moravian Church, in which there is a missionary in the foreign field for every fifty-eight communicants in the home churches, and there are two heathen converts for every single member at home. And what is the incentive? While acknowledging the supreme authority of our Lord's parting commission, the Moravian Brethren have ever emphasized as their chief motive the inspiring truth drawn from Isaiah liii. 10-12, making the Lord's sufferings the spur of missionary activity. This is the all-constraining motive. If the Israelites did so much under the beetling crags of Sinai, how much more should we do, who have stood on Calvary? "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive . . . riches."

TUESDAY, April 22. Exodus xxxvii.

The description of the sacred things within the Tabernacle is almost word for word the same as in chap. xxv. It is not, however, a useless repetition, because it accentuates the fact of the exact care of the workers to make all things according to the pattern: and it. therefore, teaches us the minute accuracy with which God expects us to obey Him. Nothing is unimportant in life. There is an ideal for every act and word—even for knops and flowers, which may stand for the elegancies and courtesies of life.

Every article symbolised some spiritual truth. The learned and devout Bengel remarks that, while two chapters in Genesis are given to tell us how the world was created, there are sixteen to tell how the Tabernacle was constructed. For the world was made for the sake of the Church, and the great object of creation is to glorify God in the redemption and sanctification of his people.

Every part of the sacred structure, from the golden chest which stood in solitary grandeur within the Holy of Holies, down to the smallest pin or cord which fastened the whole to the ground, is replete with instruction, not as affording a pattern for ritual service in connection with Christian worship, but as "the example and shadow of heavenly things"—"figures of the true"—faint, but faithful representations of those blessed realities which subsequent revelations have made plain.

The Ark was covered by the mercy-seat, God's throne. The cherubim stood on it, because the loftiest beings in the universe are brought nigher God by the blood (Lev. xvi. 14, 15). The Saviour is the Propitiator where they and we meet God, as the Apostle affirms in Rom. iii. 24 (compare Heb. ix. 5). The Table bore the "Bread of the Presence," which is Christ, on whom the Father feeds in glad satisfaction, and we. The Candlestick denotes the office of the children of God fed by the oil of the Holy Spirit. The Altar of Incense stood in front of the beautiful veil, a type of our praises and prayers accepted through the much merit of our Lord.

WEDNESDAY, April 23. Exodus xxxviii.

The Altar of Burnt-offering was so called because the whole burnt-offerings, with parts of other sacrifices, were offered on it. It was the first object that met the eye of the worshipper as he passed within the holy court. Projecting from each corner were horns, which elsewhere in Scripture are typical of power (Deut. xxxiii. 17; Luke i. 69). To take hold of the horns of the Altar was, therefore, like taking hold of Jehovah's strength (Is. xxvii. 5). It was also the act of the suppliant for mercy (1 Kings i. 50). The horns pointed every way, because they shall come from the north and the south, the east and the west.

The laver was made of the brazen mirrors, used by Egyptian women, to teach us that we need to examine ourselves in the mirror of God's Word, before we engage in his holy service (Jas. i. 23-25). It is not enough for us to have been once purged (Heb. x. 2). We need constantly to have our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience (Heb. x. 22).

Snow-white curtains surrounded the House of God, symbolizing the holiness which becometh the habitation of the Most High. They were suspended by silver hooks, from sixty pillars, the ends of which were inserted in so many sockets of brass. There was but one gate to the court, one door to the Tabernacle, one vail for the Holiest; and there is one, and only one, way to God (Heb. x. 20).

The gold used in the Tabernacle amounted to £150,000; and the silver, derived from the census, to £35,000. Probably the spoils of the Egyptians, gathered from the shores of the Red Sea, conduced to the ability of Israel to make such generous donations.

THURSDAY, April 24. Exodus xxxix.

Next to Aaron's person was an inner coat, or garment, made of fine linen, embroidered (Ex. xxviii. 39). "This vestment," says Josephus, "reached down to the feet, and had sleeves tied fast to the arms." It is expressive of the personal purity of the Lord Jesus (Heb. vii. 26). This coat was bound together by a girdle of fine white linen. "The circumvolution," Josephus tells us, "began at the breast, and was there tied, so that the ends hung down to the ankles." This reminds us of the righteousness, faithfulness, and humility of our Lord (Isa. xi. 5; John xiii. 4, 5).

Over the white-embroidered coat was the Robe of the Ephod, a long, loose, blue garment, reaching to the feet. Upon its edge, or hem, was a rich fringe of blue, purple, and scarlet tassels, made in the form of pomegranates, and these alternated with golden bells. Perhaps this symbolizes our Lord's heavenly and beautiful life on earth. Over this blue robe came the Ephod, consisting of two separate pieces, one for the breast, the other for the back. On each of the bands that bound them together, over the shoulders, was an onyx stone, engraven with the names of six of the tribes. It was as though Aaron bore up the whole nation, and we are reminded that the government is on Christ's shoulders (Isa. ix. 6). God hath laid help on one that is Mighty.

The mitre was made of fine white linen, and bound round the head in long coils like the modern turban; and bore in front the golden plate. "In the High Priest's garments, as in the Tabernacle itself, the culmination of all is in holiness to the Lord." God will be sanctified in them that come nigh unto Him. You are holy in Christ, but strive after personal holiness (Lev. x. 3; Zech. xiv. 20, 21; Heb. xii. 14).

FRIDAY, April 25. Exodus xl.

It is supposed that the work of the Tabernacle took just six months. How greatly the expectancy grew, and how vast the interest manifested by the entire people, when Moses reared the sacred structure, and set the furniture in its place! All was done, as we are repeatedly told, "as the Lord commanded Moses."

Then the cloud of the Divine presence settled on the prepared house. It had remained for some time on the summit of the Mount, but how greatly would every bosom swell with joy when that majestic symbol descended towards the plain, and finally covered the Tabernacle, and from that moment it became the guide of the pilgrimage (Psa. lxxviii. 14), and a protection from the burning heat.

We learn that it not only rested on the Tabernacle but filled it with glory. It was light and fire, and even Moses could not enter, because of the burning glory. The Lord Jesus in and by his Word, and especially by his Spirit, is to us what the cloud was to Israel. Let us not go before, nor lag behind Him, but wait till we know his will, and then follow without fear (Psa. xlviii. 14).

> Burns the fiery pillar at our army's head;
> Who shall dream of shrinking, by our Captain led?

SATURDAY, April 26. Leviticus i.

The offerings brought to the door of the Tabernacle were of five kinds, whereof the burnt-offering, as here, stood first. In each some special aspect of Christ's great sacrificial work is set forth.

The characteristic feature was that it was wholly consumed; and it ascended to God as a sweet savour (Phil. iv. 18). There is only one Man whose entire life was yielded thus to God. Isolated acts of devotion may be seen in his followers, but only one could say, "I do always those things that please Him" (John viii. 29).

Before the victim was offered, the priest placed his hand upon its head, and by this act identified himself with it; so we must be one with our Lord in his entire devotion to his Father's will. We are to present our bodies a living sacrifice, no longer living for ourselves, but for Him who died that we should not henceforth live unto ourselves, but unto Him.

The burnt-offerings were not all of equal value (3, 10, 14). And this difference may illustrate the diversity of spiritual apprehension which prevails among true believers of the excellency of the Person and Work of the Great Anti-typical Burnt-offering. One class of Christians has large and comprehensive views of Jesus—the bullock; but all do not share in these, nor respond to them—the goat or pigeon. Let us follow on to know, for feeble apprehensions of Christ's sufficiency issue in enfeebled service, and this again in diminished faithfulness and reward.

Other Lands.

The Real Chinese Wall.

By Rev. W. REMFRY HUNT, Nanking.

THE real Chinese wall is a fact. Until recently westerners spoke of it as a myth. Few myths are, however, made of bricks and mortar. In the reign of Tsing Hsi, B.C. 240, the colossal wall was begun. It took 1800 years to complete, and cost millions of lives. Chinese history may be studied from this summit, just as Egyptian archives are best observed by the side of the pyramids. Chinese history is a long tragedy. There is a lurid glare in every chapter and in every act. Their religions are national, partial, temporary, and have produced after their kind, exhibiting their bounds, and enclosing their own sacred seclusion in every web of the social fabric. It is this massive prerogative, so alien to all human brotherhood, that has circumscribed and stifled the race. Beside these moral walls the 1,500 miles of masonry which skirt the Mongolian plateaus are a mere garden fence.

CONFUCIANISM.

The greatest wall of China is the fortress of Confucianism. It is the citadel of classic heathenism. It is enthroned high in the State, and deep-rooted in the hearts of the people. When this buttress is removed the foundations will fall, and the errors undermining it will lie in the débris of dead systems.

Confucianism is a moral failure. It is an intellectual anachronism. This is the testimony of history and the wail of its own disconcerted disciples. Stamped with all that is of the earth earthy, this cold, unreal, veneered ethical creed is responsible for the entire lack of sincerity and the prevalence of national dishonesty. Atheism, lying, polygamy, official corruption, blood revenge, geomancy, suicide, the nameless evils of the seraglio, and all the misery, jealousy, filth, and scum of the eunuchs and their confrères, are the natural product of the Confucian rôle.

Confucianism is nevertheless the State religion, and from within its walls and without its battlements will be aimed the sternest and most telling blows on the vital and most easily-attacked lines of its foes. The conflict to-day is between Christianity and Confucianism. The stagnant waters of Buddhism, swarming alive with the putrid masses of the ignorant and depraved priesthood, are as a moat around the "city of the dead past," and afford little real opposition. The light and warm love of the truth and knowledge of the true and living God will soon purify and cleanse the hearts of its million-peopled devotees, and make through it a highway, instead of a waste, for the wayfaring. Let the missionaries nerve themselves, and, above all, be nerved and filled by the Spirit and power of Him who, in this great commission, is "of God made unto us wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption."

A HOPEFUL OUTLOOK.

The consensus of opinion among the leading missionaries is that the Confucian altars will fall. The battle will be a severe and long one, but the issue is not in doubt. A religious renaissance is spreading all over Asia. Out of the travail of its regeneration is seen the renaissance of Sinim. The mental standstill of the literati is changing to an attitude of inquiry, and an eager appetite for true and exact science. The four hundred millions who have been cheated are awakening. It is a pathetic, solemn, and almost sublime scene. Surely the light of his star has arisen again in the East!

By contrast and comparison, by adoption and adaptation, by means and agencies in and out of season, by the peerless victories of the Faith in all lands, by its unique and glorious achievements over all other faiths and philosophies, the facts and evidences have universally and incontrovertibly proved that the religion we bring to China is the one all-progressive, world-embracing, and eternal panacea for the sons of men.

SECLUSION AND SUPERSTITION.

There are thousands of the better classes in China, as well as many of the literati all over the country, who would have audience with Jesus Christ, but the remains of the high walls of seclusion* in the ancestral temple, with its beauties and all the officers in their rich array, prevent the hearing. We have intercourse in our Chinese guest-room with scores of intelligent young men who are tired of the shadows and dim guesses of this ancient "museum specimen of ethics."

Let the walls of superstition, isolation, and Pagan civilization fall, and the light will shine in and reveal the monster fraud, and arouse in the minds of the people new hopes, new ideals, and new and holier enthusiasms. It is unreasonable to think that the Chinese do not want a genuine sense of liberty, more truth, and truer love. In heathenism they found neither. It is safe to say there are hundreds who are seeing, and thousands who are beginning to see, in the Christian religion, a Providence set over against fate, Revelation versus speculation, Facts versus visions, Life versus death, and the hope and path of eternal bliss set out clearly against the gloom and uncertainty of age-abiding darkness. Avaunt heathenism!

Surely the present opportunity is a rare one. We shall need the Divine light to guide us on our way, and lead us into all truth, as we deal with the remoulding of the materials and the rebuilding of the moral and physical structure of this wrecked, broken, and almost derelict empire.

Before Jehovah's awful throne,
Ye nations bow with sacred joy;
Know that the Lord is God alone—
He can create, and He destroy.

The Gospel in Spain.

WHILE Spain has been the scene of numerous upheavals during the past year, and the middle and upper classes of society are still degraded under the spell of Romanism on the one hand, and infidelity on the other, it is gratifying to note that there is an increasing willingness both to hear and receive the Gospel on the part of artizans and the labouring classes. Mr. and Mrs. Armstrong continue their self-supporting labours in Barcelona, greatly aided by their Swiss helper, Eliza Kunsi. Mr. John Nisbet, who with some fellow-workers resides in the north-west of Spain, devotes much time to travelling about and spreading the Gospel message in the small towns of the provinces of Leon, Galicia, Asturias, Zamora, and Valladolid.

From one of these provinces Mr. R. Pollock Simpson writes:—

One of the most cheering events of the past year is the wonderful opening our evangelist has had in a small town of Estremadura. They began work in September, 1900. The secretary of the town, and afterwards his daughter, were converted. On the first Sunday in December, after large audiences in his preaching hall, he was standing reading by his lamp when a shot was fired through a hole in the door, and narrowly missed him. The would-be assassin was pretty well known to be the brother of the priest. The secretary, seeing that a larger hall was required, bought a piece of land, and is building one for himself. The utmost efforts are being made to get him out of the place. The last letter describes his being brought before the governor of the province, who, after inquiring into the case, dismissed the secretary without punishment.

The information received respecting Gospel effort in the Philippine Islands (Spain's former colony) has been distinctly encouraging. The desire to hear the message of salvation seems all but universal, and whenever this desire has been met by Christian labourers there is a deep spiritual work. The need seems to be for a greater supply of consecrated labourers to sow the seed. Particulars and further details of the work of the Association for the Diffusion of the Gospel in Spain may be obtained from Mr. B. F. Babcock, 4, Water Street, Liverpool.

Notes from India.

WORK AMONG THE PARIAHS.

ACTIVE evangelistic work among the much oppressed and depressed classes of Pariahs in the suburbs of Madras for some years has produced very good results, and an infant congregation has been raised. Financial difficulty has, however, retarded progress, and hence it is necessary to appeal for outside support. Communications may be addressed to Rev. K. R. Gopalah Aiyar, Methodist Episcopal Mission, Kodambakam, Madras.

A GROWING CONGREGATION.

The work of the Basim Mission (Berar), under the care of Rev. W. A. Moore, has considerably enlarged during the past six years. The late famine brought about a hundred children into the school, exclusive of those who died immediately after being received. Most of these are being supported by patrons in America, but help is required to meet the salaries of capable teachers, and to start industrial work. There are also several poor Christians who need to be helped by the provision of work to do. "Our large congregation of over 200 meets in the girls' schoolroom; but the room is too small. We have been promised a very fine site in the native town, and are endeavouring to raise funds to build a suitable place of worship, £500 being sufficient for one to seat about 400 persons."

CAMPAIGN IN CALCUTTA.

Reports received from missionary and other sources show that the evangelistic campaign conducted in Calcutta in February was very successful in many directions. The spirit of inquiry was marked and widespread. Workers of experience were specially impressed with the interest and attention of the audiences, such general arousal to the claims of Christianity having never before been witnessed in the city. A procession made through the city on one of the Sundays was very effective and impressive. Respectful crowds of natives lined the sidewalks, and filled the windows on the route. Missionaries marked with satisfaction and pleasure the thoughtful quietness with which these onlookers beheld the hundreds of Christians marching past singing the praise of the Redeemer. Thousands of tracts were received by these multitudes, and the distribution of suitable literature during the entire campaign was altogether abnormal. A number of cards were signed at the meetings, and a number of the helpers came into contact with those whom they believed to be honest inquirers. The universal feeling among missionaries and native leaders is that great and lasting good was done, the fruit of which will be gathered later.

LIMITATIONS OF WOMANHOOD.

The experiences of workers among the women are often most trying. We quote the following from the report of those under the direction of Rev. W. J. Edmonds (London Mission, Quilon, Travancore):—"The majority of the heathen women are superstitious about Christian books, and one day a woman burnt a book, fearing her daughter might learn to be a Christian. Many fear to buy and read the Scriptures because of the wrath of their deities. Even then they listen to the miracles and parables and the sufferings of Christ. In some places it is chopping down the trees of the jungle, and in other places it is like sowing. One day a few women, after seeing themselves unable to prove that the devils do good to them, threatened me and said, 'I will punish you.' 'How?' said I. Then one replied: 'I will make the devil to beat you and you will reap the consequences within four days.' This woman and six of her neighbours, seeing the inability of their devil, and being ashamed of themselves, quietly listen now and confess Christ to be the only Saviour. Many a time they seem to be much distressed in their hearts because of their inability, owing to the Travancore Marumakkathayam law, to act according to their conscience."

Churchmen and Foreign Missions.

C.M.S. LAY WORKERS' CONVENTION.

ADVANTAGE was taken last Saturday, by the London Lay Workers' Union, of the 103rd Foundation Day of the Church Missionary Society, to hold an all-day convention at Exeter Hall. Recognising the ever-increasing importance of missionary effort, and in view of the present position of the Society, it was desired solemnly to realize before God the greatness and glory of the mission which Christ has committed to his Church in the evangelization of the world, the enormous nature of the task, and the demand on the individual Christian for unwearied prayer, self-denial, and diligence in carrying out the Master's command to "preach the Gospel to every creature." The morning and afternoon sessions were restricted to men, and from the outset it was evident that the deepest interest had been aroused among the members of the Union.

The subjects set down for the day were "The Master: The Work: The Worker," and the chairman in the morning (Mr. Eugene Stock) found the true attitude of mind to be desired in the words, "His heart was lifted up," used of four kings in 2 Chronicles; three times in a bad sense, but once in a right fashion (of Jehoshaphat, xvii. 6), because it was "in the ways of the Lord."

"ONE IS YOUR MASTER."

The Mastership of Christ was opened up in most helpful and interesting manner by Rev. Hubert Brooke (St. Margaret's, Brighton), who showed how, by analysing the five New Testament Greek words referring to the Lord Jesus Christ, that have been translated Master, they present Him as the Overseer, the File Leader, who goes on before, the Teacher, the Despot, and the Supreme Owner. These imply (1) that under every aspect of the Name He is something different to us, and we are something to Him; while (2) at the same time He both supplies and expects something.

The names imply that (1) He is responsible for all needed provision; (2) it is our right and duty to look to Him for absolute guidance; (3) He is ready to fulfil his promises of instruction; (4) there must be complete submission to his will and command; and (5) his rights as owner can only be acknowledged by consecration.

Dealing with "The Work," Rev. W. St. Clair Tisdall (Persia) showed how the Lord Himself has called those who have heard the Gospel to be (1) witnesses, and (2) evangelists (Acts i. 8); but false witness to Christ is being borne plentifully in heathen and Mohammedan lands by those who are leading evil lives. To such an extent is this the case that by many Mohammedans in Persia the chief duty of a Christian is believed to be to get drunk every night. Among the greatest difficulties in the way of progress were enumerated (1) the death penalty prescribed by the Koran for all embracing any other faith; (2) the state of oppression which prevents any security of life and property to subjects; (3) the small element of truth which underlies their own teaching; (4) their erroneous belief in our Lord as a prophet whose time is past; (5) the utter lack of any power in Mohammedism to reform itself.

The society's special missioner (Rev. H. S. Mercer) made practical application of the assertion of the claims of Christ and of the heathen world, by calling for correspondence between—(1) our endeavour and the work; (2) our earnestness and the importance of the issues at stake; (3) our enthusiasm and the gladness of our message; (4) our self-denial and the example of our Master; (5) our personal holiness and our Divine companionship.

REALISING "THE MASTER."

From the chair in the afternoon, Mr. Herbert R. Arbuthnot (president of the Union) bore strong testimony to the importance of the share in missionary work taken by those at home who are creating a strong, healthy, intelligent public opinion. Thereafter Dr. Ingham (formerly Bishop of Sierra Leone) asked earnestly—(1) A realization of The Master: "that is, to make Him plain to ourselves. Nothing but a personal appearance and a daily revelation to our souls can do this. Disciples may say, 'We have seen the Lord,' but if the disciple is to be a disciple indeed, he must be able to add, 'The life is manifested and we have seen it.' We may go forward boldly if we know that because Jesus lives all that He embodied is going to live for ever." (2) A realization of something of his method and his plan—(a) "Come and see: you must consent to look out on everything from his point of view. I am content to put my hand in that of Him who is the sole Disposer of opportunity." (b) We must go "with Him"—his very thought, mind, and purpose, and his almighty strength conceived of as in the hearts of the men and women who companied with Him; "that is the way in which the Master provided for the continuance of his mission in the world, and in which He calls you and me to take part in it." (3) A realization of our Lord's purpose that we should go, and that He should go with us. "The 'must' that dominated the Lord's movements when on earth, dominates his purpose still."

"NEVER HEARD AND NEVER WILL HEAR."

India was represented by Rev. G. T. Manley (Allahabad), whose field lies among university students. Speaking on the first day after his arrival in England, he was deeply moved to find himself face to face with an audience comprising more Christian men than are at work among the millions of our great Eastern dependency. Striving to lay on the hearts of his hearers something of that great burden which had impelled him to go forth, he described the utter impossibility of the average missionary in India reaching the whole of the population allocated to him. On one side of Allahabad are half a million natives living in villages; "nine-tenths of them have never heard the Gospel, and never will; they will live and die heathen." India is one great untouched mission field.

Summing up the messages of the brethren from the field, Prebendary Webb-Peploe asked, "Are you prepared to accept whatsoever the Lord your King will say to you? In almost all the commands of the Lord Jesus there is involved the idea of missionary labour. There is one thing which He requires us to do, and we are called to consider whether we have realized the message. In the Acts of the Apostles the thought impressed on the Church of Christ is summed up in the words, 'Arise and go.' Let no man say that he has heard the call, 'One is your Master,' and then shrink from answering the call. If I speak to any young man who is feeling, 'I would like to begin to say something for Christ, yet I dare not because I have not the talent and resources,' remember it is in Christ that all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge are hid, and the unsearchable riches of God are found for us. God has the same power to make use of through any and all."

The excellent audiences earlier in the day were succeeded by a crowded house in the evening, when the chair was taken by the Archbishop of Canterbury. Reviewing the present opportunities for the spread of the Gospel as compared with former times, his Grace showed that the call to go forward is louder than ever before. The difficulty of language has been largely removed by the scattering of hundreds of translations of the Bible; the former dreadful persecutions have given place, so that those which remain form rather an incentive to devotion, through which we hear the Lord's voice proving that He is at work as He was of old, and showing that He has not left altogether aside that which stirred men in former days. He uses the same instruments, the same incitements. He answers prayer by the same method. He encourages us in the same old way. It is an encouragement to all others when a man dies for Christ.

REFLEX INFLUENCE.

"The more any country takes upon it the great task of preaching the Gospel to the world, that country will gain in spiritual power, in the general elevation of the standard of life, in a higher sense of the holiness which God requires, more than by any other method that we can take. In proportion as a nation bestows on this an ever increasing devotion and self sacrifice, in that proportion, and more will it be lifted up towards God.

"If England desires to lift itself higher towards God, if we desire to be a more religious people, to be a more moral people, to be more earnest in prayer and in the study of God's Word, to be more faithful in the fulfilment of all we are called upon to do at home—if we desire these things, let us throw ourselves with all our energy into the task which the Lord gave us at the beginning; let us see to it that we preach to others and we shall truly find that we have been preaching to our own people, that we have entered their very hearts by what we have devoted to those who have not yet received the glorious news."

Basing his address on the vision of Christ our Master and its results, recorded in Revelations i., Rev. S. A. Selwyn (Hampstead) showed the necessity of the message to the Apostle John and the Seven Churches, and how real are its lessons to the Church of England to-day.

NO UNHAPPY MISSIONARIES.

Special interest gathered round the statement made by Dr. Albert Ruskin Cook (Uganda) of the needs of heathen and Mohammedan lands, realised as they were during his own experience in Africa. Bunyan's "man with the muck-rake" illustrates the attitude of Christians who are too much taken up with their own little heap to raise themselves and look round on the great world beyond. Referring to the opening up of the countries surrounding Uganda, he stirred the hearts of his hearers by the statement of his expectations for the near future. A friend had said to him, "I have never seen a missionary with an unhappy face; how could we be unhappy with such a work and such a message? I would not exchange my practice in Africa for the best practice in England. I was told before I went of the joy of the work, but the half was never told."

The closing word for the day was spoken by Prebendary H. E. Fox. Comparing the world to a great law court, he said we cannot escape being witnesses for Jesus Christ. The days of witnessing in the Acts of the Apostles were those of church extension, when there was no need to talk about church defence. If the possession of information, which will be of use to others, imposes responsibility, "with the open secret of salvation, how dare we hold our tongues?"

Valiant for the Lord.

The Late Major H. M. CONRAN.

FROM among the officers of the British army have come from time to time many of the brightest lights that have shone for God in dark places of the earth. Of some of these men much has been written and spoken, and their names are household words; a far greater company have been faithful in their own circle, doing a quiet work of which the story will never be widely known on this side of the great day. Among those whose memory is fondly cherished, especially in India, was Major H. M. Conran, who heard with joy the home-call from his Lord on February 23.

From an autobiography published some years ago we learn that, as a boy, the future officer was wayward and passionate to a degree. There were times when he was arrested by thoughts of better things, but it was not till he had received his commission and been sent to India that the Spirit of God strove with him effectually. As an officer of the Bengal Artillery, he was stationed for some years at Dum Dum, about eight miles from Calcutta. The first circle of friends which opened up for him was that of an attached band of young Christian disciples whom an officer of standing—afterwards Colonel Powney—had for some years been gathering round him from among the officers of the regiment. Dwelling in a house with six or eight such companions, he gradually found himself steeling his heart against the life they were living. Neglecting the unusual opportunity afforded for inquiring into the truth, he turned his attention more and more to sceptical thoughts and arguments which had been taking root in his mind under the name of "enlightened views."

The young officer was proud of the anti-Christian books which he had gathered together; and cultivated in Calcutta the society of leaders and speakers of the same order. Ultimately he did not hesitate to avow and defend the principles himself. Strangely enough it was at what he expected to be an entirely political meeting that his unbelief received its greatest blow. The agitation against "suttee" had reached its height, and the speaker was a native gentleman who pleaded for strong action on the part of the Government. To the surprise of at least one of his hearers, he proceeded to bring the truths of Christianity to bear on the question with great power, and carried the sympathy of the great audience with him. More than the words themselves, their effect on the meeting seemed to work a revolution in the feelings of Lieutenant Conran. Then the young man realized that he had been building on a foundation of sand, and while not yet a Christian he could no longer proclaim himself an unbeliever.

The next step in the winning of this life to the service of God was his coming into contact with one of Rev. Dr. Alexander Duff's converts—afterwards Rev. Krishna Mohun Bannerjee—whose faithful dealing roused the officer's mind into a state of acute concern. The intervention of a period of ill-health produced something akin to despair, and ultimately the actual fear of death, he says, became unbearable. But when the darkness was most dense, the dawn was at hand. One night he got out of bed, fell on his knees, and called upon the Lord to have mercy upon him. The Father who had been seeking his child for long years heard the cry, and from that moment the wanderer was reconciled. Bodily health improved immediately the whole tenor of the life was changed, and the power of the old vices and habits was broken once for all.

But a stern battle ensued with besetting sin, and it was long ere there came what might be described as settled peace in believing. So long did the attacks of sin continue, and so persistent was the cloud overhead, that there came into this troubled mind grave doubt of ever experiencing the entire deliverance of which he had read in Scripture and in "The Pilgrim's Progress." He had, of course, been led to destroy all the sceptical books of which he had previously been proud, and now he gradually found help and light from others of a different class. Among those on which he afterwards looked back with gratitude were Owen on "Indwelling Sin in Believers," and "Psalm cxxx.," Baxter's "Saints' Rest," Flavel's "Saint Indeed," and Bunyan's "Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners." A keen appetite for Christian biography took the place of one for novels, and such memoirs as those of Charles of Bala, Halyburton, and David Brainerd were read with avidity. A tract on prayer, by Madame Guyon, brought much comfort; and a book on Hebrews viii. 10-12, by Dean Goode, was also a means of blessing.

For many months the Word of God itself was to this seeker a sealed book. It was almost with dread that he could continue reading a daily portion; and not till he had searched the Scriptures so constantly and diligently that his copy completely wore out, after being repaired again and again, did he hear through the sacred page the voice of the Father comforting him "as one whom his mother comforteth." When the light did break with growing fulness on his soul, this student formed an ever-deepening love and relish for the actual Word itself, and found himself turning especially to the words of the Lord Jesus as recorded in the Gospels. He was subject for years to great ups and downs in the Christian life. One reason of this was his shrinking from taking an outstanding position, resolved as he was to be a "judicious" Christian. Another mistake was refraining from openly identifying himself with such gatherings of believers as were available. A third pitfall was his openly-expressed determination to prove that the Christian life need not make a man miserable, his determination to prove which leading him at one time to go back into sports and other occupations which for a time he had entirely forsaken.

The "root of the matter" was in the soul however, and by the leading of God he was at length delivered out of his distresses. Contact with experienced believers was in this case as in others, a fruitful means of grace. On this subject he says himself:—

> I was somewhat indebted for my progress in Christian experience to occasional intercourse I obtained with "the excellent of the earth." On one occasion, when I was staying with Colonel Powney, a select committee of distinguished artillery officers was assembled at his house from all parts of India; and, as it happened, Mr. (Anthony) Groves, the missionary from Bagdad, came in for the night, on his way from Persia to Calcutta. Never did I see the beauty of holiness so evidenced as in that servant of God. His whole conversation and his striking history, which he narrated to us, seemed to present the reality of religion to my mind, as though "telling me all that was in my heart;" whilst his fascinating manner and intelligence so impressed this set of hard-thinking, world-engrossed officials, that they sat till deep in the night, spell-bound. Groves, taking up his parable, as "the man whose eyes were opened," carried their wrought-up minds through all those varied adventures, purposes, and peculiar views, which, not many years later, culminated in the addition of another denomination to the Christian body. Before this, I had experienced cravings in my spirit after a higher and more evangelic piety, which, like Nebuchadnezzar's vision, disappeared, "and the thing was gone from me." In Groves I saw the reality of such an attainment, and the interpretation of my vision. A new hope and object seemed to open on my soul.

The battle was not yet finally won, but great and real progress was being made, and the child of God was able to sum up in the following words:—

> True, these lustings of the Spirit were overborne again and again by lustings of the flesh; yet intercourse with others of exalted piety, with whom I fell in from time to time, was instrumental in reviving these yearnings of my spiritual life, until, ere many years had elapsed, they gained the ascendency, and gave hope and direction to my life.

Five years' residence at Dum Dum terminated in 1837, and during a march of three months which followed, the young believer, whose spiritual life had been advancing step by step, had only two like-minded companions; and it was his privilege to stand forward whenever personal witness for Christ was called for. Various experiences led him, some time afterwards, to self-examination whether he should not devote his life to missionary work. Led to the decision to abide in the calling wherein he was called, he was enabled in after years to use faithfully such opportunities as were afforded him for preaching the Gospel to natives as well as Europeans, a step which called for much grace to overcome the fear of man, as well as popular prejudice.

During the earlier half of the nineteenth century, the British authorities in India had many a difficult task set to them in dealing with the native tribes on the various frontiers. Conflict followed conflict at shorter intervals than was quite realized by the nation at home; and for the officers and men in the field there was many a dark day. Doing his military duty in a way to call forth the praise of his superiors, Major Conran yet found constant openings for serving the Captain of his salvation. Poor fellows who were wounded and dying far from home and friends were gladdened by the ministrations of one who could with his sympathy tell them of the way to everlasting peace and rest.

In the course of a long residence in the North-west Provinces, mainly at Peshawur, Major Conran's sympathies were drawn out very notably on behalf of the Afghans. He took a deep personal interest in every effort to reach them with the Gospel or education, seeing by faith great conquests for his Master through this means of entrance into Central Asia. To give practical effect to his wishes, he made an offer of a large sum of money to the Presbyterian Church of America for the purpose of opening a mission among the Afghans; but it was found impracticable to withdraw men from the evangelization of more accessible parts of the country for this purpose.

Work was done for some years by a Mr. Löwenthal among Afghans residing on the Indian side of the border; but on his death the way did not seem plain for the appointment of a successor. Major Conran had, however, lost none of his enthusiasm on the subject. Writing to a friend in India, he said:—"Feeling my strength failing, and as I know not the day of my death, I feel the responsibility of keeping less money idle, perhaps to fall into unworthy hands." In these circumstances he turned his attention to England with the result ot the establishment of the well-known mission to the Afghans by the Church Missionary Society.

THE NEED OF PERSONAL PIETY.

Major Conran protested openly against the evils of society in the country to which the best years of his life were given. He realised in a very high degree the duties resting on a Christian Govenment, but he ever maintained that the utmost importance was to be placed on the personal lives of the members of the European community, recognising as he did that the people discerned at once the true value of a consistent Christian life, as distinguished from official recognition of a creed. He spoke with satisfaction of the power of the Word of God in the ranks of the army on the plains of India and in hospital. Longing for the souls of his fellow-countrymen in the East, he saw great possibilities for good lying ready to their hand.

Compared by the late Daniel Wilson, of Calcutta, to the church of Philadelphia, God's people in India exemplify the blessed effect of the position they occupy in a higher life as contrasted with the church at home, and their fitness to bring a united action to bear on the heathen world. We may thus anticipate that in the day of God's power, when a revival is bestowed on our countrymen in India, it will be felt throughout the land; and that once more, in a far wider extent, "all that dwell in Asia will hear the word of the Lord Jesus;" and the result of past labours becoming manifest, it will be seen as though "the earth had been made to bring forth at once, and a nation were born in a day." To lay the foundation of such an evangelistic church, God, who bringeth the blind in a way they knew not, has guided the steps of many a reckless wanderer from his father's house to a haven of rest in the plains of India.

During the closing years of his life, Major Conran resided at Ixworth, near Bury St. Edmunds; and all his attention was given to good works, ever trying to speak the word in season which might lead some soul to the Saviour. His experience in the army led to his being a warm supporter of temperance work. The open-handedness which led his generosity in India to run at times far ahead of his means, made him in a real sense his own executor. He was a liberal distributor of Christian literature, and a generous supporter of the Salvation Army, especially in the direction of new buildings and social work.

The late Rev. Dr. Talmage.

Rev. Dr. T. de Witt Talmage passed to his rest last Lord's Day at Washington, after an illness of several weeks, the immediate cause of death being inflammation of the brain. Born at Bound Brook, N.J., in the year 1832, the distinguished preacher's first pastorate was at Bellville, N.J., where he was ordained as minister of the Reformed Dutch Church. When the civil war broke out, he was appointed chaplain of the Pennsylvanian Regiment, and with characteristic energy and enthusiasm threw himself into the work of ministering to the sick and wounded, regardless of danger or personal inconvenience. His work as chaplain is still remembered by veterans who took part in that unhappy conflict. Till a few years ago, he was chaplain of the 13th New York Regiment.

At the close of the war, he returned for a short period to his old church, and in 1869 was called to the important pastorate of the Central Presbyterian Church in Brooklyn, N.Y., after which he first began to be known as a preacher of more than ordinary ability. The congregation grew rapidly, and so crowded the building that soon a larger structure was required to accommodate them. The preaching was of a peculiar and rather sensational type. The wit, vivid picturing, and flashes of imaginative description, attracted many who were not regular church-goers. The demand for accommodation continued, and in 1870 the famous Brooklyn Tabernacle was erected. It was a huge amphitheatre, made of wood and iron, and seated for 3,400 persons. Even this, however, proved too small, and in the year following it was enlarged to seat 500 additional worshippers. A year after the enlarged tabernacle was opened it was totally destroyed by fire. Two years later another and larger building was erected, but after several years suffered the same fate as its predecessor.

Dr. Talmage became a world-wide itinerant, visiting the British Colonies, India, and the Holy Land, lecturing, preaching, and writing descriptive articles for various newspapers. During the last few years his wanderings were less extensive, his efforts being largely confined to his native state and that of New York.

The American Christian Herald attained a wide circulation under Dr. Talmage's editorship; and among his books which have become well known are—"Crumbs Swept Up," "Old Wells Dug Out," "Sports that Kill," "The Abominations of Modern Society," "Everyday Religion," "The Night Side of City Life," "The Marriage Ring," and "The Pathway of Life."

Missionaries in India recall with gratitude the two great famine funds which Dr. Talmage was the means of raising, and the vessel which reached India loaded with rice and wheat as the gift of the American people to the starving sufferers.

Dr. Talmage was distinctly Evangelical. He believed in a world-wide Gospel and a universal Saviour. His teaching, so far as a system of doctrine can be deduced from his sermons, was more of a Methodist type than Presbyterian. He was broad enough to occupy any pulpit, and to discourse to any Christian community. As a man he was lovable, tender, and affectionate. Those who have come into personal contact with him speak in the highest terms of his charm of manner, his love for all that is good and true, and his thorough detestation of all that is base and mean. He built up no great church organization, but there remains a record of a brave life well lived, and a life's battle nobly fought.

Antwerp Sailors' Rest.—Friends of English and foreign seamen will learn with pleasure of the continued usefulness of the Sailors' Rest at Antwerp. The home has been under the direction of Miss M. Smith and Miss H. Boetzmann for the last five years, and has proved a source of strength to numbers of seamen visiting the port, beset on every hand by various inducements to wrong doing. Those who know Antwerp best are satisfied as to the need for establishing a temperance refreshment house. Mr. W. C. Parkinson, L.C.C., Carleton House, Hillfield Avenue, Hornsey, N., is the honorary treasurer.

"Marred in the Hands of Men."

By the Late HENRY GROVES.

Having regard to the moral of the story of the "Brethren," recently pointed out in these columns, an esteemed correspondent sends us brief extracts from a work by the late Henry Groves. The sentiments expressed may be applied in many circles of Christian life and experience:—

The more heavenly the doctrines, the more terrible will be the delusion to which those are exposed who cease to abide in daily humble dependence on the person of Christ, and in the power of his Spirit. The path opened up in the Scriptures of truth, and entered on by many, well-nigh fifty years ago, was through much affliction and joy of the Holy Ghost, but it has led through a tempestuous sea. Thus it was, however, that Paul contemplated the history of the Church of God, purchased with Christ's own blood . . .

AN ESSENTIAL DISTINCTION.

The turmoil and confusion which have come in have not arisen from God's principles, but by man's departure from them, or by his seeking to maintain them in the power of the flesh, and not in that of the Spirit. We need, therefore, to be on our guard that God's truth be not discarded because the human medium through which it is presented proves itself unworthy of the treasure committed to its trust. Rather must it be remembered that God has put his treasure into earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God and not of his people. And what if ever and again the earthen vessel is broken to pieces? It does but show of what the vessel is made; and while, looking at the broken fragments, the people of God may mourn, they rejoice that that which is of God abideth for ever.

To some these years may appear fraught only with evil, but when looked at in the higher light of God's wisdom and mercy, and when over the havoc and the storm the guiding star of infinite love and mercy is seen, the clouds are found big with blessing, even though human pretensions have been unmasked, high sounding words sifted, and lofty claims brought down. For all this God is to be praised; though many have proved themselves guilty, the measure and degree of which we leave Him to decide who makes no mistakes, and who shows no partiality. . . .

Many need to be cautioned against casting away truth because truth is troublesome. So will it ever be, as long as we are in the body . . . Our well-springs are in Himself, and not in his Church; and if this is forgotten it is a lesson that God will find many opportunities of sorrow to teach over again. The way has not been missed because clouds darkened the sky, and the enemy has slain many in the struggle: the way is where it ever was, and what it ever was—the King's highway of holiness and peace; where none can hurt those who follow the footsteps of the Master, though thousands fall around.

FELLOWSHIP AND ITS BURDENS.

Many have dreamed of a fellowship of saints on earth that would lead calmly and smoothly heavenward. They came into church fellowship, and found to their dismay that church fellowship meant that they were called to bear, and to forbear. It was not like Christ's own fellowship, not like his holy, faithful love; and so, instead of finding rest, they found a heavy burden laid upon them. Thus their hopes were blighted because ill-founded, and some have sought a refuge elsewhere, where they might find less to bear. They mistook the character of the path they had to tread; they found they had got into a place where they had to follow the example of their Master, and bear the burdens, the weaknesses, and infirmities of others; they had not counted the cost of thus following Christ into a closer fellowship of saints, to whom they would have to minister, and not be ministered unto, and whose feet they would have to wash, and where the most difficult and most blessed lesson (taught in the life and ways of Christ) has to be learned deeply, inwardly, and practically, "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

Witnessing in Society.

By Mrs. HARVEY-JELLIE.

CARRIAGES were driving to and from the richly ornamented portico of Grasley Hall, whose new inmates were holding a grand reception. Each visitor mentally exclaimed, "How superb!" for nothing that artistic taste and money could supply had been forgotten in planning the interior of that well-situated mansion.

Alfred Carlence had been prosperous beyond all telling in foreign trading, his fair young wife, several years his junior, crowned his possessions with grace and cultured brightness, and, as far as this world's riches can satisfy, they were happy.

Titled people came and went, men and women of coveted homes. Sparkling with smiles, and in elegant attire, Helena Carlence welcomed her guests. Strangers they were with the exception of one, and she was clad in widow's garb. During the fragmentary conversations, Helena was hearing words once spoken to her by that one. It was when they had lived near and been girls together. The widow, then a young and ardent Christian, had spoken about the claims of Christ, only to be rejected by her friend.

"You will believe me some day, and I will prove to you I mean it," she had said as they parted to take different ways in life.

Why had she come uninvited on that afternoon? Yet, as an old acquaintance, she was welcomed, and asked to stay, until, after music, laughter, and cheery talk, one by one the company took their leave.

"Yes, I am a widow," said Marie Somers, as she alone sat with the merry bride, "and but for the all-sufficiency of Christ, I would be in sheer despair. Helena, once more as of old, I address you—Oh, make sure of life in Christ."

She had kept her promise to "prove she meant it." She felt God had laid it on her conscience to go that day and speak, although it cost her much, and she was sadly tempted to leave her message for another time. "Out of place, to speak about such things on a day like this, but I know you mean well," was the only response, and Marie Somers trembled as the page closed the door behind her.

A round of parties, morning drives, and concerts filled up the weeks. Helena would have said we have two selves, for she knew there was an inner self struggling to be free, and to correct the outer self.

It happened on a spring afternoon that Mrs. Somers sat alone on her garden seat arranging some early blossoms to carry to the sacred spot where lay the earthly part of him she had loved. She started at the touch of a hand. Helena Carlence had left her carriage and quietly walked along the garden to where she saw the widow sitting. Without delay, as one burdened with a message, she spoke in haste. "Marie, I want that life in Christ of which you spoke at my reception; there is an empty place everywhere, and within my soul. Tell me the first steps. Oh! how ignorant I am!"

The flowers were laid aside, and the widow gently assured her friend, speaking of repentance, and cleansing, of full surrender, and of the incoming of God's Spirit. She spoke as one who understands, and knows the importance of such experience; and when the carriage returned, Helena was reluctant to go.

"Have you returned all your calls?" asked her husband, as she alighted at the door.

Taking his arm, and walking into the library, she answered, "I have been to see that brave visitor of whom I told you; some of the others must wait."

"I can't say I believe in that sort of people; there is a time for everything; fancy religion at a reception!" he said, anxious not to seem to reproach his wife.

"Yes, I know there is a time for everything, and the only time for the soul is the present," she replied earnestly. "What a blessing she brought to Grasley Hall that afternoon! An angel might covet such a mission, to be used of God to move in and out among the spiritually ignorant rich people, and remind them that they have a soul!"

Always welcome, Marie Somers was frequently a guest at the Hall; often the carriage was seen also, waiting outside her home, and many profitable hours were thus spent.

Late in the summer the widow lay dying. Summoned to her side, Helena Carlence sat listening to her parting words:

"My joy has been to seek the unsought ones of society, and to know nothing among them but Christ. I want you now to take up the work I lay down."

"Marie, how dare I? it is the hardest work of all to speak in such society. What will they say?"

"If it can help you, think of me. I ventured to risk offending you. Above all, think of Him, who suffered the loss of all to reach ruined souls and save them. Say you will live and speak only for eternity." And the feeble hand was held out as she spoke.

The fair mistress of Grasley Hall never had looked so beautiful as when, with upturned face and tearful eyes, she said, "For Christ's sake and yours I will."

Years are passing, but not without joy among the angels over sinners brought to repentance from the rich homes of earth, and often the story is told of "that brave visitor."

God give us zeal and faith and fervour,
Make us winning, make us wise,
Single-hearted, strong, and fearless,
Thou hast called us; we will rise!
Let the might of Thy Good Spirit
Go with every loving word;
And by hearts prepared and opened
Be our message always heard.

The Word Wonderful.

By AVARY H. FORBES, M.A.

II.

HOW many Christians are there who realize the full value of the Word of God? How many realize that the Word of God is eternal, both from the past and to the future? And that it is indispensable in every stage of life, from the darkness and slavery of sin to the holiness of the saints in glory? It came from the foundations of the world; and it will abide to the endless ages of eternity. It is able to convert the soul, and raise it from the death of sin to the life of righteousness; and there is no stage of Christian experience in this world or the next where it ceases to be of paramount importance.

The Word of God is true.—The first thing we wish to ascertain about any news or information is, Is it true? Now we are not left in any doubt on this point; the Word of God is true, and it always was true. "Thy Word is true from the beginning" (Psa. cxix. 160).

It is pure.—Therefore, we need not be afraid of it, whatever it says; there is nothing noxious or harmful about it. "Every word of God is pure" (Prov. xxx. 5).

It is eternal.—It may be true and pure, but is it permanently applicable? If so, its value is greatly enhanced. Yes, it is eternal. "Forever, O Lord, thy Word is settled in heaven" (Psa. cxix. 89). And this permanence refers to the future as well as to the past. "The Word of the Lord endureth for ever" (1 Pet. i. 25).

It is creative.—It was by the Word of God that both the earth and the heavens were made. "The worlds were formed by the Word of God" (Heb. xi. 3). "By the Word of God the heavens were of old" (2 Peter iii. 5).

It is sustaining.—It not only created, but it still keeps up and sustains the whole universe. "The heavens and the earth by the same Word are kept in store" (2 Peter iii. 5-7).

It is able to save.—More important to us, the Word of God is able to create us new creatures in Christ Jesus—it is able to convert, to regenerate, to save the soul. "The engrafted Word, which is able to save your souls" (James i. 21).

It is able to guide.—Being born again we need light and leading, for the way is often narrow and shelvy, often dark and precipitous. But the Word of God is light, and it brings light, and gives light. "The entrance of thy Word giveth light" (Psa. cxix. 130); and again, "Thy Word is a lamp unto my feet and a light unto my path" (verse 105).

It is able to build up.—Food makes us grow, but cannot give us light. A lamp gives us light, but cannot make us grow. The Word of God not only gives us light and leading, but it feeds, builds up, and strengthens us. It nourishes us for our work, and strengthens us for the good fight of faith. "The Word of his grace, which is able to build you up" (Acts xx. 32). One of old valued it more than the food by which he fed his body: "I have esteemed the words of his mouth more than my necessary food" (Job xxiii. 12).

It is able to gladden.—It can do more than save and guide and feed. Bodily food is usually palatable, but God's Word gives joy to the heart, and gladness to the mind. "The statutes of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart" (Psa. xix. 8). "I rejoice at thy Word, as one that findeth great spoil" (Psa. cxix. 162).

It is able to sanctify.—No instructed Christian will stop short of sanctification; and for this he is dependent likewise on the Word of God, through which his Spirit speaks. Being clean, it makes clean. Being pure, it makes pure. Being holy, it makes holy. "Christ also loved the Church, and gave Himself for it, that He might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the Word" (Eph. v. 25, 26).

It is able to reward.—It regenerates, guides, builds up, sanctifies, and, lastly, it leads the Christian to receive the everlasting prize in the new Jerusalem. Being eternal, it will eternally bless those who love and obey it, "Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those things which are written therein" (Rev. i. 3). "Moreover by them is thy servant warned: and in keeping of them there is great reward" (Psa. xix. 11).

We have seen a Roman Catholic seriously arguing that there is no command in the Bible to read the Bible! There are many things which we are not directly told in the Word of God to do, but which its principles show us clearly that it is both our duty and interest to do. We are not told to pray for faith; we are not told to pray for the unsaved; we are not told—in the New Testament at least—to keep the Sabbath. But few will deny that these things are impliedly enjoined.

The Lord said to Joshua, "This book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth; but thou shalt meditate therein day and night" (Josh. i. 8). Christ said to the Jews, "Search [or ye search] the Scriptures" (John v. 39). St. Paul commends Timothy because "from a child" he had known the Scriptures (2 Tim. iii. 15), and (Acts xvii. 11) the Bereans are commended because they "searched the Scriptures daily."

But if there were no such palpable though indirect injunctions to read God's Word, it is plain that its truth, its purity, its everlastingness, its creative, sustaining, saving, guiding, building, gladdening, sanctifying power, of which it itself speaks so fully, constitute more than an invitation, amount to an injunction and command of the highest kind to read, mark, learn and inwardly digest its teachings. "How shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation?"

April.

A spell of sunshine, then the speeding shower,
Minding me ever of life's smiles and tears,
Its songs and sighs, its fleeting hopes and fears,
Its chariots and crosses of an hour.

But neither shine nor shower can be in vain,
Jointly they work a gracious work for earth;
And many a goodly flower is given birth
To beautify the mountain and the plain.

So where the smiles and tears of life are known,
There is a good that yet shall be revealed.
Ere long the bulb within the earth concealed
Will yield a lily to adorn the throne.

Welcome, ye clouds, and welcome, heavenly beams!
Ye both are agents of the King of love;
Your mission here to raise our hearts above,
And give fulfilment to our holiest dreams.

A Young Girl's Letters.

THIS week I give you, for a change, extracts from two letters written to a London minister by a young girl from her sick bed. They are so clear and helpful that I feel it unnecessary to add any words of mine, except to say that I hope you will all pray for her entire recovery to health and strength, and also that you and I may always be as anxious as she is to live a truly Christian life, and that Jesus may be as much "a living, bright Reality" to us as He has become to her.

Uncle Tom.

Dear Mr. ——,—I am ever so much better, except that the fever has left me weak. I have not had such a long illness since I can remember, although I have had scarlet fever twice before, when a baby.

I would rather be up and doing what I can for Jesus, but I have found that it is harder to lie in bed and serve Him by being patient, and so I have comforted myself with the thought that the thing which is hardest in the doing is the most worth doing, and that though it is so little, I could "still do all for Jesu's sake."

I miss the Sunday services very much, and I sincerely hope I shall soon be able to attend them again. I have The Messenger sent me every week. In last week's there was a paragraph headed "Focus your Prayer!" which rather puzzled me. It advised people to have one special object of prayer, and to pray for the salvation of one person at a time. It also said that "much of our prayer does not count. It is too general." I thought that all prayer which was truly sincere counted. Perhaps the first part of the paragraph meant one person outside the home circle. Neither my father nor any of my three brothers are Christians, though my mother and both sisters are; and if I were to pray for only one of them at a time, I should feel that perhaps the others were missing some blessing by my not praying for them. I should like to know what is really meant.

Isn't it wonderful when you realize for the first time that the same God that keeps the earth and the sun in their places, is ready to care for and protect every individual person who will just believe what He says, and say so? It makes me just long to go and tell someone else how easy it is.

People say it is my "first enthusiasm," and if it is, I hope God will keep me always enthusiastic, for it is so good that I am afraid to believe it will last. Sometimes, when I am tempted to believe that it's all unreal and not true, I think of the words you read to my friend and myself on that Sunday:—"And by Him all that believe are justified from all things," and I say them until all the doubt is driven out of my heart.

I am still trying to trust Him more and more, and something happened last week that showed me how much need I had to "trust Him more." I have been praying ever since I have really prayed at all for one special thing. I did think I was praying believingly, until last week, when I heard that the answer had come, I found that I was as much surprised to hear it as if I had never even asked, much less expected to be answered. I wonder if many other people feel like that. I suppose if a friend were to say to me of some earthly thing—"Ask, and it shall be given," I should not only expect to receive it on asking, but should feel very indignant if I did not; yet it seems almost as if I have been taking it as a matter of course that God would not keep his word.

I do hope that I will get out for Easter, because it will be the very first that the resurrection song has had any real meaning to me personally. I want to join your Sunday School and Christian Band when I am about again.—Yours sincerely, —— ——

Sunday-Schools in Austria.—The importance of securing religious education for the young is being recognised by those identified with the Los von Rom movement in Austria, and Sunday-schools are being rapidly organized. Till recently the children of Protestants had been grievously neglected, and allowed to come under the influence of priestly teaching, many of them thus lapsing into Romanism. This is now being changed, and in Bohemia, Moravia, and Styria, Protestant pastors are striving to educate the young in the principles of their faith. During the last two years about 200 new Sunday-schools have been founded.

PRIZE COMPETITION.

The Prize Questions to be set next week will be from

2 Samuel for Divisions I. and II. (those under ten and thirteen respectively).

2 Samuel and Epistle to Galatians for Divisions III. and IV. (those under fifteen and eighteen respectively).

THIS WEEK'S BIBLE SEARCHER (No. 326).

Word Pictures.

1. An old man desires to give his son his parting blessing, and bids him prepare some food. The young man departs, and we see entering another young man, who sets meat before the old man, and receives this promised blessing. It is not long, however, before the fraud is discovered. (a) Who was the old man? (b) Who were the young men? (c) What was the blessing? (d) How did the old man receive the news of the deception? (e) What promise did the first young man make?

2. In this picture we see some people making a very queer building, and for a rather strange reason, but before long they suddenly cease and scatter themselves. (a) What was the building? (b) Why did they build it? (c) How large was it to be? (d) Why was it stopped?

3. This picture shows us a fearful punishment sent for murmuring. A great number of people are dying. By-and-bye the people repent and are forgiven, but by strange means. (a) Who were the people? (b) Why did they murmur? (c) What was the punishment? (d) How were they restored?

ANSWER TO LAST SEARCHER (325).

(Matt. xxii. 15-46.)

1. "Took counsel how they might entangle Him in his talk" (verse 15).

2. "Is it lawful to give tribute unto Cæsar, or not?" (verse 17).

3. By asking to be shown a penny. By asking whose superscription and image it bore. "Render unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's; and unto God the things that are God's" (verses 18-21).

4. They desired to test the loyalty of Christ.

5. "They marvelled" (verse 22).

6. On the question of the Resurrection (Acts. xxiii. 8).

7. The woman who had married seven brothers in succession: "in the resurrection whose wife shall she be of the seven?" (verse 28).

8. Jesus reminded them of the old promise, "I am the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob," and said, "God is not the God of the dead, but of the living" (verses 29-32).

9. "They were astonished" (verse 33).

10. "Which is the great commandment in the law?" (verse 36).

11. "What think ye of Christ?" (verse 42).

12.

13. He repeated to them the greatest commandment, and also the second (verses 37-39).

14. "Ye lade men with burdens grievous to be born, and ye yourselves touch not the burdens with one of your fingers" (Luke xi. 46).

15. Because they contain the law of the prophets (verse 40; also 1 Tim. i. 5).

Homeless Little Ones in Ireland.—Some pathetic stories concerning the rescue of destitute children in Ireland are recorded in Miss Ellen Smyly's annual statement, entitled "Good Night." The Bird's Nest is a veritable haven for the homeless little ones, and some idea of its extensive operations may be gathered from the fact that the sum required for the maintenance of the institution last year amounted to over £3,000. The Irish Church Missions supply the teaching staff and all the educational requisites; but the remainder of the cost is collected by loving friends and helpers in different parts of the world. Copies of this deeply interesting record will be gladly forwarded to friends by Miss Smyly, 2, Lower Fitzwilliam Street, Dublin.

The Call of Samuel (1 Sam. iii. 1-14).

It is a great moment in our life-history when we first catch sight of the mountain or the ocean. Some of us will never forget when we first beheld one of these great features of natural scenery; but it is a still greater thing when first we catch sight of the infinite world that lies beyond the narrow horizon of time and sense, and become aware of the call of God.

Up to a certain moment we may have been the pupils of the beloved mother, Hannah, or of the great teacher, Eli; but these are not to be compared to the solemn revelation of God to the soul, when He stands and calls, "Samuel! Samuel!"

Has God ever called thee, young friend? Is your religion something more than hearsay? Has there been the consciousness of a personal interest between God and you, which has made you feel as though there were only two beings in the whole universe, God on the one hand and you on the other? Have you ever spoken to Him? If so, you are experiencing what Samuel knew and felt in that great moment when, as the early glimmer of the morning met the flickering light of the great sanctuary lamp, God stood and called.

Perhaps God has been calling for long, but you have not realized the true meaning of the still small voice. He speaks once, twice, thrice, and again. Even if we do not answer and obey at first, He will not turn away from us angry and disappointed; we may not know Jehovah, and his Word may not be revealed unto us; but He will come and call a third time. "Behold, He stands at the door and knocks." "Jehovah came and stood and called, as at other times, Samuel! Samuel!" Do you notice that double knock? There are eight of them in the Bible. Can you find them? When God speaks a name twice, it is a double call.

So often, when we are awakened to see our condition as sinners, we run from one to another, as Samuel ran to Eli. There are some even so foolish as to go to the priest, and think that by confession they may obtain deliverance. It is, however, a vain dream. Of course, it is quite possible that holy men and women, like Hannah or Eli, may help us by their advice, may pray with us, and may explain the way of peace, and for all this we must be very thankful; but every true adviser, at such an hour, will do what Eli did, and drive us back to God. How different the advice of Eli was from that which too many so-called priests give inquiring souls! When He comes and calls, there is but one response, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth!" And if you cannot understand his words, ask Him to explain his meaning so simply that you cannot mistake. Go to God with your questions, and be sure that He will speak to you through his Word (see verse 21). Never the word without the spirit or the spirit without the word.

It is very wonderful how the young boy Samuel rose up to take the place of Eli and his sons. God is never at a loss for workers. He always knows where to find them, and I eagerly hope that some who read these words may one day grow up to be God's anointed prophets, to tell people his will, to walk before Him in the beauty of holiness, and perhaps, like Samuel, to lead them into the new age. F. B. M.

C.E. NOTES.

Rev. George Whelpton, M.A., of the Wesleyan Methodist Mission, France, writes: "I have been rejoiced by the starting lately of several C.E. Societies among our French churches."

The annual returns from Societies, with statistics and records of work accomplished during the year, are now being received by the general secretary. One of the most vigorous Societies is connected with the Girls' Institute at Bridgwater Hall, Manchester, which has no fewer than nine committees, whose activities are directed in many channels of ministry. The Temperance Committeee has secured sixty-seven pledges; the Sunshine Committee visits regularly twenty cripple children; the Missionary Committee maintains its own leper orphan in India, and has secured admittance for a poor man into a Home for lepers; while the Lodging-House Committee holds services every Sunday in a lodging-house for women.

Services in Theatres.—A social gathering of workers in connection with the Special Religious Services Committee (3, Bridewell Place, E.C.) took place at the Y.M.C.A., Aldersgate Street, E.C., on April 11, by invitation of Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Berry. Helpful addresses were delivered by Rev. H. W. Ainley, vicar of St. Andrew's, Islington, and Mr. H. W. Maynard, and among others who took part were Messrs. T. C. Chadwick and W. H. Seagram, and Rev. T. C. Udall (secretary). Recent reports tell of much blessing at the theatre services.

Gentiles Received into the Church (Acts xi. 1-18).

Golden Text: Acts x. 43.

The Jews had been chosen of God from among the nations of the earth to receive the revelation of Himself. They were proud of this high honour, but in the exclusiveness of their pride had failed to see the great duty contained in that honour, of being the messengers for God to all the peoples. Peter had broken through the barrier—had received a Gentile household into the Church of Christ. Tongues were as ready in those days to carry ill news as now, and before Peter reached Jerusalem his action at Cesarea had been already condemned by the brethren there, who had yet to learn that "repentance toward God, and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ" (not nationality), was henceforth to be the condition of fellowship.

Mistake made. (a) Judgment formed on Peter's action from hearsay only. Reports are unsafe ground on which to form an opinion about another person's actions. Each sees through his own glass, and all look at an object from different standpoints. A straight pencil in a glass of water looks crooked, viewed through a medium. Wait for facts, and hear both sides. We may see a good man or woman in an action we think wrong; but we may not judge another—God may have given them fuller light about it (like Peter) than we enjoy.

(b) The difficulty in the minds of the brethren at Jerusalem was exactly the same which would have prevented Peter from going to the house of Cornelius, had the Spirit of God not enlightened him by means of the vision.

(c) The brethren reproved where they ought to have commended, and complained where they would have rejoiced, had they known as much as they did afterwards.

Explanation.—There is much to admire in the spirit that controlled both parties in the controversy. The brethren opened the attack with strong feeling and some hostility. Peter met them in an entirely different spirit. With gentle consideration, patience, self-control, and a marked graciousness—for he was probably at that time the chief leader in the Church—Peter recounted facts, and they vindicated him more effectually than any opinions he could have expressed. Not what he thought, but what God did: arguments could have been opposed, facts not.

Misunderstanding removed.—The Church listened patiently to Peter's whole story without interruption or contradiction. They were open-minded, willing to be shown what they had not seen before, and it is to such minds that God reveals his purposes; hence they accepted the truth brought to them by Peter, and unhesitatingly made glad declaration of their newly-found conviction on behalf of the Gentiles (John xvii. 21-23) demonstrated.

Questions.—(1) Where should we stand to-day if God also to the Gentiles had "not granted repentance unto life?"

(2) Do we obey God's command, as Peter did, when He bids us do something we do not like?

(3) Peter said, "What am I?" An unworthy, sinful man, but chosen by One who loved him, forgave him, cleansed him, and bade him do his Master's work, whatever it might be, and where (John xxi. 15-18). Perhaps Peter thought, "What must I do?" If he feared the condemnation of the other brethren, he obeyed God at all risks, and that gave him courage when he faced them not to excuse himself.

(4) The youngest scholar may ask, "What am I?" Only a child; but I can learn and understand what God teaches me, and I am old enough and strong enough to ask Him to help me by his Holy Spirit to do what He has bidden me do, for my Saviour's sake.

A boy at school who is told to do a sum for examination, and chooses to do a copy instead, will not find his good writing, however well done, will pass him for ciphering. We must obey God, whether we understand the reason or not, for God knows best.

Bible-School at Cheshunt College.—Arrangements have been made for the holding of a summer school for Bible study at Cheshunt College, August 27 to September 6. Courses of morning lectures have been arranged on "Old Testament History and Literature," by Rev. Principal Whitehouse, D.D.; "The Life and Times of the Apostle Paul," by Rev. Professor Andrews; "Moral Ideals in the Old and New Testaments," by Rev. Professor Wm. Johnston, B.D.; and "Modern English Literature and Religious Thought," by Professor Ernest W. Johnson. On some of the evenings there will be lectures on subjects of special interest to Sunday-school teachers. A charge of two guineas is made, to include board, lodging, and lectures. Communications should be addressed to Mrs. Ernest W. Johnson, 1, Pengelly Villas, Cheshunt, Herts.

Cambridge Notes.

[From our correspondent.]

It is announced that Rev. C. Lisle Carr, Burser and Lecturer of Ridley Hall, and Vicar of St. Sepulchre (the Round Church), has accepted the living of St. Nicholas, Blundellsands, Liverpool. Mr. Carr will not leave Cambridge before June. He is undertaking most of the arrangements in connection with the Ridley Hall Triennial Reunion, which is fixed for June 23, 24, and 25, when the Bishop of Durham hopes to be able to be present.

Gipsy Smith has been conducting a ten days' mission in the Guildhall. Large numbers flocked to hear him, and a great many passed into the inquiry rooms. The mission concluded on Monday, April 7.

Fourteen Cambridge parishes have united for a mission to be held at the end of Lent, 1903. Each vicar will, of course, make his own arrangements, but it is proposed that the mission shall commence with a special service for the workers from each parish.

Welsh Notes.

At the Cardiff Sunday-school Teachers' Conference, on Wednesday, April 9, twenty-six veteran teachers were awarded medals for twenty-five years' continuous service in Sunday-Schoo work.

On Monday, April 7, the Baptists of North Wales and Cheshire held a Sunday-school Conference at Wrexham, the chief feature of which was the reading of a valuable paper by Mr. P. Stephen, Mollington, on the best method to promote a revival amongst our older Sunday-school scholars.

The annual meetings of the Welsh Baptist Union, to be held in the autumn at Merthyr, will have a new feature, namely the recognition in the programme of the English Baptists of the Principality. These latter are an active and increasing body, and at present number 20,000 members.

In a lecture on "The Genius of the Welsh Pulpit," at Pontypridd, on Thursday, April 10, Rev. John Thomas, of Liverpool, said that while the peculiar genius of the English nation was political and governmental, that of the Welsh nation was religious, and the genius of the Welsh pulpit had its source in the mental, moral, and spiritual character of the people. It was necessary that modern Welsh preachers, instead of imitating, should strive to be as original as the old Welsh preachers were.

Owing to the increase of Sunday pleasuring, the Bishop of Bangor, through Archdeacon Morgan, called a meeting of clergymen and ministers at Llandudno on Tuesday, April 8. His Lordship presided, and in the course of his opening address said that the tendency in England was in the direction of the Continental Sunday. This was not so noticeable in Wales, but still it was showing itself decidedly. Eventually a committee was appointed to draw up an appeal to visitors and residents.

Y.M.C.A. Notes.

The new Association which has been formed at Luton held its inaugural meetings on the 9th inst. The Committee have taken a house in King Street, which was formally opened by the Mayoress, Mrs. Low Giddings. The Association commences its work under favourable auspices, having the cordial support of many prominent business men in the town, and the hearty sympathy of the clergy and ministers.

The annual public meeting of the Northampton Association was held on Friday last. The President (Mr. Jas. Barry, J.P.), occupied the chair, and there was a good audience. Mr. W. Cleaver (hon. sec.) gave an interesting and encouraging account of the work, which shows increasing vitality. Mr. Robinson Souttar, M.A., B.C.L., followed with a stirring address, the earlier part of which he devoted to some account of the work the Y.M.C.A. is doing as he had seen and known it in various places, while in the second part he gave what he aptly called a straight talk to young men. The Marquis of Northampton (Honorary President of the Association) followed with an earnest and thoughtful speech.

The annual conversazione in connection with the Belfast Y.M.C.A. took place on the 10th inst. The Postmaster-General, Lord Londonderry, K.G., presided, and delivered a speech, in the course of which he warmly eulogised the Y.M.C.A. organization, referred to its world-wide ramifications, and complimented the Belfast Association on its great prosperity. Mr. D. A. Black, general secretary, reported a year which was described as "the best in the history of the Belfast work." Addresses were delivered by Rev. Dr. Robertson and Rev. Henry Montgomery. Medals to the gymnasium members were distributed by Major-Gen. Leach, V.C. The Lady Mayoress presented each young man with a bouquet on entering the building.

Home Missions.

Among the Jews.

THE BRITISH SOCIETY.

On Saturday last I attended an evangelistic service in the Mission Hall, Fournier Street, Spitalfields, the East London centre of the British Society for the Propagation of the Gospel Among the Jews. While waiting for the meeting to begin, I allowed my thoughts to go back sixty years, recalling with peculiar pleasure the origin of the Society, as an outcome of the prayers and labours of Robert Murray McCheyne, and the Bonars (Horatius and Andrew), Dr. Keith, and the Herschells. From the formation of the Society, in 1842, when friends of Israel in various sections of the Church combined to give effect to an earnest purpose in the Gospel, the mind readily travelled onward, finding delight in memories of Benjamin Davidson, Paul Hershon, and Isaac Salkinson, whose literary performances will not soon be forgotten by students of the Hebrew language and Jewish thought.

THE CONGREGATION.

The audience assembled slowly, but it was soon clear that it included some interesting material—men who had heard the Gospel before, and now wished to know more. Unlike the folk of Athens in the days of the Apostles, who "spent their time in nothing else but either to tell or hear some new thing," these Jews showed a desire to hear more of "the old, old story." They have found no satisfaction in Judaism; in thought and heart they have advanced to the doctrine of Christ. They attend the evangelistic service in the hope of learning more; and in what he says the preacher has them in mind as well as other hearers.

It was evident that the audience, taken as a whole, was sympathetic; this was shown by the careful attention throughout—to singing and prayer, reading and preaching. After the meeting, I heard a story which bore striking testimony to this as a general feature of the gathering. One Saturday afternoon, when intimating his purpose to attend the Zionist Congress, which was then approaching, Rev. A. Sternberg, mission deputy, asked the congregation to pray for God's blessing upon his evangelistic labours at Basle. In token of their sincere interest in this enterprise, the entire audience rose, and undertook to remember the missionary at the throne of grace!

THE PREACHER.

The service was conducted by Rev. M. Nachim, who preached from Matt. ix. 10-13. By way of illustration he referred to the Mosaic writings and the teaching of the Prophets; but for the most part he dealt, and without any apology, with New Testament story, depicting its incidents in realistic fashion, and interpreting them with telling force. After claiming power to forgive sins, Christ chose a publican as his disciple! He even went beyond that; He sat at meat with a company that included "many publicans and sinners!" What could the Pharisees make of these things? They had no sense of personal sin—they were "not as other men . . . nor as this publican"—and their religion consisted of a system of sacrifices, and a round of ceremonial observance.

Christ explained his action, and justified it at the same time—"They that be whole need not a physician, but they that are sick; . . . Learn what this meaneth, I will have mercy and not sacrifice; for I am not come to call the righteous, but sinners." What a difference between the Pharisees' conception of the Messiah and Christ in his true character and conduct! Having wandered from the ways of God—not realizing their estrangement and the consequent need for reconciliation—Israel did not recognise the Messiah. Scribes and Pharisees, however, must approach Him with penitence equally with despised publicans and sinners. This point was driven home by the preacher in loving and earnest words. Gershom.

Dublin Medical Mission.

The ministry of healing has been long exercised with fruitful results by the Dublin Medical Mission. At the annual meeting recently held at the Mission premises, Chancery Place, Dublin, encouraging accounts of the past year's work were given.

The attendances at the dispensary amounted to over 14,000, and the clergy speak in the highest terms of the Mission, and the service it renders to the people. As to the spiritual side, the one aim is to point sinners to the Lord Jesus Christ. An important department, too, is the training which the institution gives to those who are working, or intend to work, in missions abroad.

These are not a few instances of blessing for which a vote of praise is sounded:—

Ulcers on the legs brought one man to the Mission. Accustomed to drink freely for twenty-two years, it was scarcely to be wondered that he was seldom quite sober when seeing the doctors. Nor was it wonderful that long months passed before he was aware that anything but the gracious influence of the Mission could keep him sober, But the glad hope of the Saviour of men dawned on him at length. The drink spell has now been broken for a year, and he is at regular work.

A man and his wife had come to Dublin seeking work, but failed to find it. The man's foot becoming injured, he came to the Mission. Objecting to the remark that "Christ is the power of God," he sought to discuss the matter. Discussion was gently refused, but frankness begat frankness in the man. He became willing to take a Marked Testament. That man now exemplifies the text he disputed, His testimony has since led his wife to become a humble Christian.

Among the speakers at the meeting were Rev. J. C. Irwin, Dr. S. P. Barton, and Dr. Barnes. The chairman, Dr. J. Magee Finny, in the course of his address referred to the resignation of Mrs. Figgis, who, with her enthusiasm, has been "the mainspring of the Mission." Dr. Barnes has succeeded to the secretaryship, but Mrs. Figgis will still remain on the Council and throw her energy into the work.

Factory Helpers' Union.

For several years past much good work has been done by the Factory Helpers' Union, in connection with the Y.W.C.A., on behalf of the women and girls employed in the various factories, laundries, and mills. Amongst the many agencies attached to it, perhaps one of the most useful is, "Our Total Abstinence Union," which seeks to band together, by establishing clubs, &c., those factory girls who have signed the total abstinence pledge, and encourages them to keep the pledge faithfully, and to bring those who have not yet signed the pledge into the Union.

There was an interesting gathering at Morley Hall, George Street, Hanover Square, on Saturday afternoon, when about 350 factory girls, all total abstainers, were entertained to tea, each guest being presented with a bunch of flowers. A meeting was subsequently held, under the presidency of Mrs. Boldero, amongst those present being Lady Macnaghton, the Hon. Mrs. Macnaghton, Mrs. Barkworth, Miss Morley, and the Misses Dashwood. Several factory girls' clubs were represented.

The secretary, Miss Edith Dashwood, announced that the total membership of the Union was 972, of whom 336 joined during the past year. She also read a letter from the foreman of a very large factory testifying to the value of the clubs in connection with the Union. Mrs. Maynard gave a stirring temperance address to the girls. She expressed her pleasure at addressing so many total abstainers, and bade them be true to their pledge, and to try to get their fellow work-girls to become abstainers. The expenses of the gathering were defrayed by Mr. Alfred Ames.

Birmingham City Mission.

The problem of Birmingham's slums has always been a source of grave anxiety to the workers of the City Mission—an organization which has to be thanked for much useful and quiet effort in the past. The secretary, Mr. A. H. Barker, is seeking to readjust the existing arrangements as to the visiting and aid of the poor, and proposes that a City Mission Slum Sisterhood should be founded. The plan is to open two houses in the heart of slumdom, in one of which two Sisters—a Churchwoman and a Nonconformist—who would gather around them honorary workers, and under proper direction the alleviation of distress and suffering would be carried on. In the second house a man and his wife would reside, to shelter and attend to the needs of girls who might be suddenly faced with trouble, and in need of a refuge.

The scheme is the outcome of experience, and is well devised to gain the confidence of those whom it is desired to benefit. The Mission has agencies for the benefit of the deaf and dumb, midnight services among tramway men, rescue work, the support of Bible-women, a special missioner to cabmen, the maintenance of twenty-two cabmen's shelters, &c. In view of developments, efforts are being made by the committee to meet the present financial deficit. The secretary may be addressed 34, Ruskin Chambers, Corporation Street, Birmingham.

"One by One" Praise Meeting.

At the "One by One Working Band" monthly praise meeting, held at the "Welcome Mission," Portsmouth, a few days ago, notes of praise were read from many, telling of souls saved in answer to prayer. Several teachers praised God for the conversion of children. One member rejoiced that, after much earnest prayer, an elderly gentleman, who had been a Unitarian since boyhood, has been led to trust Christ simply, saying, though he had lived an upright life, it was lived for self alone. Also for the conversion of a lady formerly a member of a church at Birmingham. Several sailors from H.M. ships of war praised God for the salvation of shipmates.

A naval lieutenant writes: "Will you praise God with me for the salvation of a lady in New Zealand whose name had been just twelve months in my "Throne of Grace" book. A Boer prisoner wrote telling of the conversion of several since the formation of the "One by One" Band in a camp in Ceylon, and that in his camp there are sixty young men who, when free, have dedicated their lives to God for work among the heathen. The secretary of a branch in Dunedin, New Zealand, sent a report of the conversion of forty souls, for whom the members have been praying. Much joy was also expressed for answered prayer in the return of several backsliders.

These monthly meetings demonstrate that when definite prayer and personal effort are made to save sinners, answers always come. The April quarterly magazine (1d. Morgan & Scott) gives many cases of answered prayer. Full particulars of the "Band" may be had on application to Mr. Thomas Hogben, Welcome Mission, Portsmouth.

Miss de Broen's Bellville Mission.

We hope to have a stall in aid of our work at the Bazaar in connection with the Society for Promoting Female Welfare, to be held under Royal patronage in the Royal Albert Hall, Kensington Gore, April 24 and 25. The proceeds will be devoted to the profit of our Sewing Classes, which, to the loss of some hundreds of poor old women, had to be suspended this winter from want of funds. It is very little that we give them for a short afternoon's work—a bread or meat ticket worth fifty centimes—yet this means for me at least £6 or £8 a week.

There is something which cheers their hearts more than the kindness they receive, the reading of the Word of God, and the singing of hymns, in which they heartily join. Friends who have visited the classes have often testified that they never saw a happier group of women, though we knew how poor and destitute they are. Friends are asked to send useful and fancy articles, or subscriptions, before April 24, to me, or to the honorary secretary, Miss M. Douglas, 4, Horbury Crescent, Notting Hill Gate, London, W. I hope (D.V.) to be present at the sale myself, and would be grateful to be encouraged by those who love the Lord.—Yours, &c., J. de Broen.

The Christian Temperance Campaign.

REDHILL.

THE meetings recently conducted by Rev. Dr. J. Q. A. Henry, at Redhill, have proved effective in arousing public opinion, and creating a sense of responsibility among Christians with regard to the drink traffic. The committee worked indefatigably to secure the gratifying measure of success achieved, and are labouring indefatigably to maintain the campaign by meetings and the distribution of suitable literature. Dr. Henry's concluding meeting was of a remarkable character. A local paper says:—"There was a crowded and enthusiastic audience, every available inch of room in the large hall and on the platform was occupied, standing room was at a premium, and hundreds were unable to obtain admission. Dr. Henry adduced a great amount of evidence as to the physical evils arising from the use of alcoholic liquor, and with great force and eloquence made stirring appeals for total abstinence. Apart from the pledges secured, the mission has undoubtedly given a great impetus to temperance work."

HELENSBURGH.

An esteemed correspondent writes: "Dr. Henry visited Helensburgh on April 8, and addressed two meetings in the Victoria Hall. At the first, held in the afternoon, and presided over by Rev. J. G. Christie, Dr. Henry mainly addressed himself to women's work in connection with the temperance movement. At the evening meeting the large hall was filled, and the chair was occupied by Bailie Bryden. Dr. Henry gave an address of over an hour's duration, and the meeting was very enthusiastic as with great cogency the speaker demonstrated that the Christian Church and the public-house are radically antagonistic. He was heartily applauded when he declared that the public-house, and not the Church, must go down. The audience also listened with manifest approval to his contention that the Church of Christ is face to face with urgent responsibilities in connection with the drink traffic. The enormous extent of the national drink bill was demonstrated with most striking illustrations. The speaker carried his audience with him as he vindicated the lines of united action on which temperance reformers should move, and made a forcible appeal in favour of 'the most potent of all reforms—total abstinence.' At the close of the address some eighty persons signed the pledge. It was felt by many temperance workers that Dr. Henry's address was one of the most convincing delivered here, and the only regret was that his visit only extended to one day."

RUTHERGLEN.

A splendid impression was made at Rutherglen at the three-days mission which Dr. Henry conducted on April 9, 10, and 11. The meetings were held in the large hall of the Evangelistic Institute. On each occasion one or another of the ministers of the town presided, and others supported the cause by their presence on the platform. Choirs and soloists also rendered assistance. Dr. Henry's addresses were most forcible and telling, and produced a profound impression. His absorbing earnestness, and deep conviction of the evils of strong drink and the power of the Gospel of Christ, were apparent to all, while his clear statements of fact and his moving appeals awakened the enthusiasm and evolved the spontaneous applause of all who were privileged to hear him. No fewer than 466 pledges were taken in all, from old and young, at the meetings. General regret was expressed at the shortness of the visit, and Dr. Henry was assured of a hearty reception should he again visit Rutherglen.

FUTURE MEETINGS.

April 17, 18, Dumbarton; 19-25, Airdrie; 26-29, Edinburgh; 30, Metropolitan Tabernacle (Baptist Union); May 17, Manchester (Christian Endeavour Convention); 18-23, Dr. Barnardo's "Edinburgh Castle," Limehouse, E.; 25, 11 a.m., Rev. Dr. Wells' Church, Pollokshields, Glasgow; 27, Church of Scotland Temperance Breakfast, The Café, Edinburgh; 28, 11 a.m., Mildmay Conference Hall; 8 p.m., East London Tabernacle, Burdett Road, E.; May 31-June 6, Belfast; 8, Sheffield; 10, Maryport.

Obituary.

MR. LUTHER HINTON.

THOSE who have attended the well-known Crystal Palace festivals of the London Sunday School Union, will learn with regret that Mr. Luther Hinton, who has been the conductor for twenty-four years, passed to his eternal rest on Thursday last. In 1871, he and Mr. Jonathan Barnard founded the Sunday-school choir; and very many singers will lovingly remember the boundless enthusiasm, genial personality, and the whole-hearted devotion which pervaded his work. The loss in Sunday-school and musical circles will be severely felt.

MR. DANIEL MATTHEWS, AUSTRALIA.

Many of our readers will recall the name of Mr. Matthews, who visited this country some years ago, with his wife and two Aboriginal girls. Owing to the progress made by Government in caring for the Aborigines, the work of Mr. Matthews was curtailed, but he always found a few natives who were glad of his care, and to whom his ministry was blessed. The last three months of his life were spent at the new mission station, "Manunka," near Forster, South Australia. Mr. Matthews entered into rest on February 17.

MR. T. ALEX. IBBETSON.

A wide Christian circle is mourning the death of Mr. T. Alex. Ibbetson, which occurred on Wednesday last week at his residence, 82, Larkhall Rise, Clapham. Mr. Ibbetson was a journalist, and joined the Parliamentary staff of The Standard about 1868, and down to the end of last session was a member of the corps of that paper. He will be particularly missed in the Press Gallery, where he was a favourite on account of his genial manners and sterling character. He had been in failing health for about two years; but it was not till the opening of the present session that he was compelled, to the great regret of his colleagues, to resign his position. He was well known to the frequenters of outside meetings, having for years produced the official reports of the annual gatherings of various religious bodies. Mr. Ibbetson was a warm-hearted Methodist, and busied himself in local missionary effort, and as an earnest temperance advocate. We hold his memory in sincere regard.

A SOUTH AFRICAN MISSIONARY.

Intelligence from Natal conveyed the news of the death of one of our most promising missionaries. Mr. Lindfield has been killed by a crocodile at St. Lucia Lake, Zululand. Last year he joined Mr. Waters in British Amatongaland to assist him in opening up that untouched country. When I paid a visit there the year before I found the king most friendly. Since then he has built small schools and welcomed our missionaries. A blessed work of God has been going on there, and British Amatongaland is a most promising field.

Through the kindness of a friend, money was given to build our second station on land granted by the Government. Mr. Lindfield was preparing to build during the coming winter. On his way to Durban to get married, this tragic affair happened, which has come as a great shock to us. His last letters to me were particularly bright, asking for much prayer for this opening, which he always described as remarkable. Will your readers remember the broken-hearted sister who was to have been his wife, and also ask the Lord of the harvest to thrust forth more labourers into this needy district. W. Spencer Walton.

REV. PRINCIPAL CALEB SCOTT.

The removal by death on Monday last of Rev. Dr. Caleb Scott leaves vacant the chairmanship of the Congregational Union of England and Wales, and the Principalship of Lancashire Independent College. Educated at Airedale College, he graduated at London University as B.A. and LL.B., and entered the ministry in 1854, at Newland, in Lincolnshire, where he laboured till, in 1865, he accepted an invitation to become tutor at the College, in connection with which he has ever since rendered excellent service. The recognition of his valuable and successful labours by election to the chair of the Union came too late for him to fulfil any of the high expectations that had been aroused throughout the country. Illness prevented him from entering upon his duties in January, and a week ago his condition became so critical that a serious operation was deemed necessary, but with no beneficial result. Dr. Scott was highly appreciated as a preacher, and deeply loved by the students, on whose lives he left a deep impression.

REV. W. J. AND MRS. TOMKINS.

Widespread sorrow has been occasioned by the strangely pathetic circumstances under which Rev. W. J. and Mrs. Tomkins, of Whitstable Baptist Church, Kent, have recently entered into their heavenly rest. On Thursday, April 3, Mrs. Tomkins, who had been in an enfeebled state of health for several months, passed triumphantly into the presence of the King, thus closing an earthly life which had been distinguished by a pure and vigorous faith in God, a beautiful Christian consistency in her walk and conversation, and a whole-hearted devotion to the service of Christ. Just before her spirit took its flight, her husband leaned over the prostrate form, and tenderly said, "Good-bye, darling, it will not be long before we see one another again." Little did he, or the members of his family standing around that deathbed, dream how soon those words were to be fulfilled. The day before his wife's interment, Mr. Tomkins was seized with a paralytic fit, and on Thursday, April 10—just one week after the "home-going" of his wife—he, too, was called up higher.

For nearly thirty years, Mr. Tomkins had exercised a very fruitful ministry, labouring in several spheres. Beloved by a wide circle of friends throughout the denomination to which he belonged, and by many beyond, he was held in great regard for his high Christian character and varied gifts. He was graciously permitted to see his eldest son happily settled in his first pastorate at Yalding, in Kent. At both interments much public sympathy was manifested, most of the neighbouring Nonconformist ministers, as well as the rector of Swalecliffe, being present, and giving expression to their loving respect for the deceased. F. J. F.

Call to Prayer for Israel.—Rev. Thomas M. Chalmers, superintendent of the Messiah Mission to Israel, Chicago, has issued a call to prayer on behalf of Israel in America. There are many signs that the Church of Christ in America has not carefully considered the cause of Jewish missions, and the utter inadequacy of present efforts is more and more apparent. It is distressing to learn that, after eighty years of spasmodic effort, there exists in America to-day no properly equipped mission to the Jews. In view of this solemn fact, friends of Israel will agree with Mr. Chalmers, that the present crisis calls for more prayer, faith, earnest thought, and diligent effort.

Village Evangelization.—A circular issued by Mr. James A. Vicary gives particulars of the extensive evangelistic work carried on under his direction in the villages surrounding the busy centre of Bristol. For forty-seven years this devoted servant of God has laboured incessantly as a preacher of the Word, and during the last twenty-eight years his Gospel Tent services have caused his name to be a household word in a wide locality. The work last year was attended by many signs of encouragement. The three Bible carriages, as well as the tents, were turned to the best account, and both in the children's meetings and the services for adults the interest of villagers was aroused and a deep impression was made, while many a wayside cottage and isolated farmstead was visited, and the inmates cheered by words of Christian sympathy and counsel. Address: 63, Ashley Road, Bristol.

Evangelistic.

Miss Glover at Langholm, N.B.

A THREE-WEEKS' mission has been held at Langholm by Miss Glover, of Edinburgh. A number of drawbacks had an adverse influence on the attendances, but the meetings, nevertheless, aroused much interest. There were a number of cases of blessing, and very many Christians were quickened, some taking such a stand likely to exercise a helpful influence in the town. The pointed and powerful addresses of this young lady evangelist have left an impression for good.

John A. Byers, Secretary,
Langholm Home Mission.

Mr. W. R. Lane at Christ Church, S.W.

An eight days' mission has been held by Mr. W. R. Lane at Christ Church, Westminster Road, S.W., with marked blessing. Though this is the third mission that he has held during my pastorate, he was welcomed with unabated affection, and in spite of the adverse conditions of Easter time met with gratifying success. Mr. Lane has a burden on his heart for London, and it would be a judicious expenditure of time and money if in some way his services could be procured for an unbroken run of say twelve months in the Metropolis, during which the effects of his work might be expected to culminate. I greatly appreciate his worth, and commend him to all my brethren in the ministry who desire to secure a thoroughly Scriptural evangelist. F. B. Meyer.

Rev. J. Sprunt at Northampton.

The services at Artizan Road Church, conducted by Rev. James Sprunt, are attracting considerable attention. "The meetings during the past week," says the Northampton Reporter, "have been well attended, and the interest is increasing. On Sunday last Mr. Sprunt preached earnest sermons, in the morning from Hebrews x. 11-14, and in the evening on 'Zaccheus,' Luke xix. 1-10. In the afternoon there was a meeting for men, when Mr. Sprunt delivered a very helpful address on 'Christ necessary, Christ sufficient, Christ for all.' There was a good attendance at all the meetings, the evening congregation being unusually large. Mr. Sprunt sings Gospel solos at nearly all the meetings, many being his own composition. The choir also rendered excellent service."

Mr. Newton Jones at Liverpool.

A five-days' mission to young men and women has just been completed in the Brunswick Wesleyan Chapel, Liverpool, in connection with the National Mission to Young People. The services, which were conducted by Mr. Newton Jones, were attended each night by about 300 young people, all of whom were deeply impressed with the addresses delivered, and many giving public testimony to blessing received, while twenty-seven signed decision cards. On the Thursday night the meeting was for boys and youths only, up to twenty-one years of age, and quite 300 were present. After the service seventy-five signed the pledge of the Anti-Cigarette Smoking League.

In Buckinghamshire Villages.

"Just outside the noted chair-manufacturing town of High Wycombe," writes Mr. Albert Richings, "are three villages in close proximity to one another, known as Lane End, Moor End, and Wheeler End. During the past six weeks special revival services have been held at each of these places in turn, with the result that numbers, old and young, have been gathered into the fold. The whole neighbourhood has been stirred.

"At Lane End, at the Wesleyan Chapel, Rev. W. Cuthbert (circuit minister) conducted the services. Next came Moor End, where a number of zealous workers came over night after night to declare the good tidings at the Gospel Mission Hall. Immediately after, Wheeler End Primitive Methodists took up the work. I had the privilege of being the missioner, and had the assistance of enthusiastic workers. One place benefited another, and the chapels were filled each night, the throngs on Sunday nights being particularly large. Great blessing was given at each mission. These places have not been in a flourishing condition of late, and, indeed, sometimes it has seemed like a struggle for existence. 'This land, that was desolate, is become like the garden of Eden, and the waste and desolate and ruined cities are become fenced and are inhabited. Then the heathen that are left round about you shall know that I, the Lord, build the ruined places, and plant that that was desolate' (Ezekiel xxxvi. 35, 36). Let this encourage other weak and struggling causes."

Mr. Charrington's Work.

Five weeks' services have just been completed by Mr. H. C. Barton, of the Evangelization Society, in the Great Assembly Hall, Mile End Road, London, E. The great hall was filled on Sunday night, and the week-night gatherings were well attended. It was evident from the beginning that Mr. Barton's efforts were being owned of God to the blessing of precious souls. He has a characteristic way of presenting the truth, his homely way and pithy talk holding the attention of his audience. His addresses were so interesting that his hearers were sorry when he concluded. The evidence of the power of God in the work was seen as night after night men and women sought the help of workers in the inquiry room. Some very interesting cases can be recorded and it must have been most encouraging to Mr. Barton, on the Wednesday he closed his mission, to find the area of the great hall filled with anxious listeners to hear his last address. Many will be the prayers that will ascend on his behalf that God will abundantly bless his future efforts.

Yorkshire Congregational Union.

The report on special missions in connection with the Yorkshire Congregational Union pays a high tribute to the work of the missioner, Rev. John Jameson. Many believers have been led to fuller consecration of heart and means to the extension of his Kingdom.

Testimony from those who speak with confidence shows that the mark of the Holy Spirit's work has been manifest in all the relations of life. Husbands that were cruel have been influenced to tenderness. Wives that were regardless and provoking have become earnest and affectionate. Fathers that were a terror to their children have inspired them with filial confidence. The promise has been made good,—"He shall turn the heart of the children to their fathers." The personal character of many has undergone a thorough revolution. Drunkards have become sober, dishonesty has given place to integrity. Sabbath breakers have become devout, and the profane have learned to pray. Mr. Jameson is thankful for an interest in the prayers of readers of The Christian.

The Boy Preacher.

During the past week Mr. Jack Cooke, the boy preacher, has continued his mission at Westbourne Grove Baptist Chapel. Very large congregations have assembled. On the week-nights 1,200 to 1,400 people have been present, while on Lord's Day last remarkable scenes have been witnessed, hundreds being unable to obtain admission. Indeed, so large was the crowd at night that the people were admitted in batches of forty to fifty at a time. The building was filled in every part half an hour before the time for commencing the service. An overflow meeting, held in the schoolroom, was also largely attended.

In the morning Mr. Cooke spoke to Christians, and in the evening gave an evangelistic address, which was received with earnest attention, and a number of inquirers were helped in the inquiry room by Rev. George Freeman (pastor), and Rev. J. R. Coutts. There were also many seekers on the week nights. Not merely by numbers and human interest is the mission characterized, but by a spirit of fervour and inquiry. The addresses have been impressive and awakening exhortations to repentance and faith. Mr. Cooke has dwelt solemnly upon the responsibilities of the unconverted, and many of a class who seldom attend a religious gathering have paid marked attention to the message.

Mr. Cooke was present at the Saturday night church prayer meeting, which is made a special feature of the regular work at Westbourne Grove, and gave an encouraging address to a full audience. On Lord's Day afternoon he was at Christ Church, Westminster Bridge Road, where he spoke to a vast assembly of men. The mission at Westbourne Grove continues nightly (except Saturdays) until May 2 at 8 p.m., and on Sunday at 11 and 7.

Mr. Tennyson Smith has conducted fruitful missions at Cwmaman, near Aberdare, and at Treorky. At each place great interest was aroused, and many signed the temperance pledge.

Messrs. Bewley and Frank Weaver are holding a twelve days' mission at Vernon Chapel, King's Cross Road, W.C. Large numbers have attended so far, and there have been many signs of blessing. H. A. S.

Rev. M. Cuthbert writes from the Manse, Ashington:—"We have had a very gracious work of God here with Mr. and Mrs. Harrison. The whole district is moved, and 260 persons have come out for Christ."

Mr. Thomas Payne conducted meetings in the Gay Street Mission, Liverpool, every evening from Thursday, March 27, until Easter Monday. Mr. Payne was also an acceptable speaker at the recent Convention at Hope Hall, which was a time of great blessing, The meetings at Gay Street were very helpful, and several professed to find salvation.

A short mission has been held at the Hope Mission Hall, Merton, by Mr. W. Collard. From the first the presence of the Lord was manifest. The "Black Board Talk" to the Christian Endeavourers was a great help to the young people.

Communications from Melbourne tell of a deep spirit of expectation regarding the simultaneous Gospel mission which had been arranged in that city. A notable feature of the preliminary arrangements was the family prayer-meetings of which some 4,000 were being held.

As an inauguration to a new aggressive effort at Stepney Meeting, E., to reach the irreligious in a neighbourhood difficult to influence, where Jews and foreigners abound, a mission to the young was commenced on April 5 by Mr. R. S. Bradbrook. A large number of children have decided for Christ; a company of the Boys' Brigade has increased threefold; and Christian work by young men has commenced in the public-houses of the locality.

Mr. F. A. Glover ("Glaisdale," French Weir, Taunton), writes regarding his Pioneer Gospel work in Somerset villages: "We hope to erect the camp early in May, going from village to village as the Lord may lead. We have found that the best antidote to ritualism (to which, alas! so many villages are in bondage) is the Gospel preached in the power of the Holy Spirit. Intending missionaries, or friends on holiday, willing to co-operate, are invited to correspond."

Miss Marie Futty, of Scarborough, who is evangelizing in Ireland with the Irish Christian Workers Union, has just conducted another mission in Drumgor, Lurgan. The hall, which was lent by the Society of Friends, was crowded each night, and hundreds were unable to get a seat. A pleasing feature of the mission was that many of the young converts from Bleary and Donachoney sought night by night to return willing assistance in various ways.

T. J.

Mr. John T. Vine has been conducting the evening Gospel services for the past four Sundays at the Christian Assembly Hall, Junction Road, N., with much appreciation and marked success. Although, in the first instance, Mr. Vine only came for two Sundays, the numbers increased so considerably that he was prevailed upon to complete the month. His address on the "Great White Throne" was felt by all present to be a message of great power and conviction.

About Books.

A GREAT DICTIONARY.

Of the making of dictionaries there is no end, and it is significant that this industry should have developed so remarkably in the New World. Already many lexical works of great value have come from the press in America, but none have had features of such practical worth and universal importance as the Standard Dictionary, in the production of which international scholarship was engaged, and in the admiration of which experts all the world over have for the last few years vied with one another in searching out terms of eulogy and delight. From the time when the earliest copies reached England, now eight or nine years ago, we have steadily used this comprehensive compilation both in the office and the study. We have rarely turned to it without satisfaction, and, in a sense that is special and peculiar, we have come to regard "The Standard" as a faithful friend.

On the title-page this work is thus described:—A Standard Dictionary of the English Language, upon Original Plans, designed to give, in complete and accurate statement, in the light of the most recent advances in knowledge, and in the readiest form for popular use, the orthography, pronunciation, meaning, and etymology of all the words, and the meaning of idiomatic phrases in the speech and literature of the English-speaking peoples. Prepared by more than two hundred specialists and other scholars, under the supervision of Isaac K. Funk, D.D., LL.D., editor in chief; Francis A. March, LL.D., L.H.D., consulting editor; Daniel S. Gregory, D.D., LL.D., managing editor: associate editors, John Denison Champlin, M.A., Rossiter Johnson, Ph.D., LL.D., Arthur E. Bostwick, Ph.D. (Publishers: Funk & Wagnalls Co., 44, Fleet Street, London.)

The Twentieth Century edition of this great work has just appeared. It is in two volumes, massive but not clumsy, and is offered to the world on subscription terms (full leather, £5). Built upon large and inclusive principles, this book has not ceased to grow since the day when it was first issued. The editors have steadily worked upon a list of Additional Words, which now assumes a substantial form, extending to thirty-three columns, containing many words of recent development, including autocar, dum-dum, Uitlander, Boxer, Dreyfusite, hansardise, gastrograph, Zionism. It is not surprising to learn that this work of reference has found its way into all the large libraries, and that it has been secured by rulers and Governments as a wordbook representative of England and the English.

It is easy to become enthusiastic over such a great work as this. We have spoken of it as American; it is more. The scholarship of the world was at the command of the editors, and right well did they lay it under tribute. As a result, though reflecting high honour upon American enterprise, the book has received worldwide praise. We must wait for some years for the later sections of Dr. Murray's magnificent "Oxford Dictionary on Historical Principles." With this work at hand, full beyond precedent in its vocabulary, we can wait with reasonable patience. By-and-by we shall decide all questions by consulting our Murray; to-day we can do no better than consult our "Standard"; and experience enables us to do so with ever-growing confidence and pleasure. In all, some 304,000 terms are dealt with, the definitions numbering nearly 1,200,000 in their mighty total!

As usual in such works, there are some Appendixes. These include an Atlas of the World and a condensed cyclopædia of geographical, national, and political information; a list of Proper Names in Bibliography, Bibliology, Fiction, Geography, History, and Mythology, together with Pennames, Prænomens, &c., arranged in single alphabetical order (forming a rich mine of information, admirably compacted); a full Glossary of Foreign Words and Phrases appearing in English literature; sections on Faulty Diction, with examples (both entertaining and instructive); Disputed Spellings and Pronunciations, set forth in such a manner as to help individual judgment, the views of an advisory committee of scholars being given as well as the preferences of the editors of other dictionaries—a department that represents a large amount of conscientious labour.

A dictionary that is at once so complete and thorough, cannot but prove of great service to students and scholars, and also to the more "ordinary" English reader. All of us have language questions to-day; let them be brought to this court of appeal, and in many thousands of cases they will be answered with the slightest possible circumlocution, with fulness and accuracy, and to the great satisfaction of thoughtful inquirers.

The Churches.

 The Editor will be glad to receive "post-card" notes for this page, of* spiritual progress and effort in the Churches. They must be prompt, reliable, and not trivialities; and be accompanied by sender's name and address.

Church of England.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, accompanied by Mrs. Temple, has returned to Lambeth Palace from Canterbury, and will remain in town till after the Coronation. Dr. Temple is in good health and spirits, notwithstanding his years and recent illness.

At Harlesden parish church, the substitution, some eighteen months since, of an Evangelical (Rev. W. P. Cromie) for a Ritualist, gave rise to some objections, but the church is now more prosperous than ever, owing largely to the strenuous labours of the vicar.

Rev. J. H. W. Hughes-Games, who has been in indifferent health for the past two years, has resigned the vicarage of St. Mary's, Birkenhead. At the Easter vestry, Mr. J. E. S. Ollive said that no clergyman ever had a greater desire for the spiritual welfare of the congregation than Mr. Hughes-Games had. He has filled an empty church, established many outside agencies, and appeared determined that every person in the parish should hear the Gospel.

Rev. Dr. Porter, vicar of All Saints' parish, Southport, recently invited all the Nonconformist ministers of the town to tea at his vicarage to meet the Bishop of Liverpool. Brief addresses were subsequently given by Revs. Adam Scott (Secretary, Southport Free Church Council), James Mellis (Presbyterian) and J. C. Somerbutts (Wesleyan). Dr. Chavasse followed with a felicitous speech, in which he acknowledged his great indebtedness to Nonconformist authors.

Rev. Henry Must, senior curate of St. John's, Upper Holloway, describing the work among men, says: "Last year we commenced an evangelical service on Thursday evenings, the object being to lead men to their Lord and Saviour, and in this we have met with marked success. Every week we are increasing in numbers, and very soon hope to use our large gymnasium for our meetings. Our expenses are great. The members are working men, and although they contribute a little, yet they cannot do much, so we are obliged to ask the help of kind friends."

The Bishop of Manchester, addressing the clergy and church officers of Ardwick Green rural deanery, said he found that one complaint is almost universal in that district—namely, increasing indifference to public worship. That indifference manifests itself in two forms—in the total forsaking of public worship and in irregular or partial attendance at church. Many persons, as one clergyman reported, are "half-timers," satisfying themselves with a single attendance at church on Sundays, generally Sunday evenings. They look upon public worship not as a Christian privilege, but as a religious duty, which is grudgingly and reluctantly done. They go to church not to worship God, but to see their neighbours or to conform to a custom which it is not yet respectable to neglect. The Bishop advised the clergy to "make the house of God more homelike, have shorter and brighter services, better and shorter sermons; to prepare their sermons more carefully, construct them more logically, and deliver them more distinctly and heartily."

Congregational.

The pastor of Bexley Church (Rev. J. Clement Angel) has resigned, and will terminate his ministry on the first Sunday in May.

Mr. George Spicer, of Enfield, has accepted the presidency of the London Congregational Union for 1903 in succession to Rev. C. Silvester Horne.

The mission work among poor children which is carried on in connection with Westminster Road Church, Liverpool (Rev. Stanley Rogers, pastor), has so largely developed that a new hall is shortly to be opened.

Rev. F. W. Newland, of Sandford, Grimsby, has accepted the oversight of the mission which the London Congregational Union is about to inaugurate at Claremont Church, Pentonville. Before his settlement at Grimsby, Mr. Newland laboured for eleven years at Canning Town, E.

In the Cliff Town (Southend-on-Sea) Church Manual the pastor, Rev. Edward Hamilton, expresses his profound gratitude to all the members for their co-operation and Christian sympathy. The Chelmsford Avenue branch church has now a membership of sixty-nine, and the membership of Cliff Town stands at 507.

In the year-book of Park Chapel, Crouch End, the pastor, Rev. Alfred Rowland, alludes to the losses caused by the fluctuations of suburban life, in spite of which the membership shows a slight increase, 1,051 names being at present on the church roll. The subscription list to the Twentieth Century Fund was completed by the addition of £371, making a total of £1,249. It was agreed from the first that none of these contributions should be applied to the work carried on by the church itself, so that a debt of £2,776 on the last enlargement was removed before the fund was started. A sum of £790 went to the Central Fund, and most of the balance was allocated to three new churches. In addition to this, collections and subscriptions were devoted to the London Congregational Union, the Church Aid Society, and selected village churches. The London Missionary Society received £774.

Baptist.

The total amount received by Rev. J. H. Shakespeare, M.A., for the Twentieth Century Fund, is £172,418 12s. 11d.

On Thursday evenings, during April, at 8 p.m., Pastor Percy J. Smart is giving a series of addresses on the "Second Coming of Christ."

Owing to ill-health, Rev. David Tait has been compelled to resign the pastorate of Clarendon Chapel, Camberwell Road, S.E. Mr. Tait's services were cordially recognized at a gathering held on April 9, when Mr. J. T. Dunn, of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, and ministers and other representatives of various churches took part.

Acting on the report of Rev. J. G. Greenhough, the directors of the Missionary Society propose to send two more missionaries to Ceylon when suitable candidates are secured. For other fields they have accepted Rev. John A. Ewing, of Rawdon College, Leeds, and Mr. John D. Raw, of Bristol College. Miss Edith L. Young, M.B., B.Sc., has been accepted for medical work in India.

At St. Budeaux, Devonport, the cause is showing gratifying signs of healthy progress. Although a very modest room, in reality a superior kind of loft, has been their only meeting place, quite an enthusiastic church has already been created. A flourishing Sunday school numbers more than 150 children, and the other signs of prosperity have been such that it has now been decided to build a new church. An excellent site has been secured fronting on the main road.

Owing to alterations and renovation of the church buildings at Stourbridge, the congregation has for some time worshipped in the Town Hall, a capacious building seating 1,200. The church has now been reopened, the services being conducted by Rev. Benwell Bird (Plymouth), a former pastor. Mr. Bird preached two discourses, from 2 Sam. xxiv. 24, and Luke vii. 41, 42, and gave an address on "Cheerfulness" to a large afternoon gathering, at the same time expressing his delight with this branch of the church's work.

Methodist.

Rev. Dr. Rigg has recovered from his recent illness, and was able to be present last week at the meeting of the Wesleyan Missionary Committee.

Rev. S. F. Collier has accepted the unanimous and warm invitation of the Wesleyan Manchester and Salford Mission Committee to remain for the eighteenth year.

When, next year, Rev. William Johnson enters upon the Principalship of the Primitive Methodist College, Manchester, he will be succeeded in circuit work at Hartlepool by Rev. Charles Humble.

The Town Council of Blackpool has, by a small majority, resolved to prohibit preaching on the sands, and the appeals for help by blind people. The proposal was vigorously opposed by Alderman Heap, a well-known Wesleyan.

A new Wesleyan church has been erected at Platt Bridge, Wigan. Rev. B. T. Bowker, curate of St. Nathanael's Church, took part in the opening meeting, and urged that they "must not be satisfied with nominal membership, but must seek and labour for conversions." Rev. J. L. Jackson brought a message of goodwill from the Primitive Methodists.

It is feared that the deficiency in the balance-sheet of the Wesleyan Missionary Society for the past year will amount to £8,000. A half of this deficiency is caused by a falling off in the home income, the result of the special efforts put forth during the last six months in connection with the Twentieth Century Fund; the other half is caused by increased expenditure necessitated by the growth of the work. Unless a generous response is made to the appeal of the committee at the May meetings, at the spring provincial anniversaries, and at the coming Conference it will be impossible for the Society to make any forward movement, or to take any advantage of the many openings now presenting themselves in India, China, and Africa.

Presbyterian.

The building fund for the extensions at Marylebone Church (Rev. Dr. Hanson's) amounts to £9,500, so that only £2,000 more remains to be raised. Building operations will not be commenced until all the needed money is subscribed.

The minister (Rev. J. McCrum, B.A.) and session of the church at Walsall, had the pleasure of admitting fourteen young men and women to church membership at the communion on Sunday week. The work among the young continues to prosper, so much so that there is a proposal to greatly enlarge the school accommodation.

The annual meeting of the Newcastle (Benwell) congregation has just been held. Rev. Robert Stewart, who presided, congratulated the meeting on the steady progress they had made. During the past year the congregation has added ninety-one to its membership. The various organizations are in a prosperous condition. The Sunday school has 608 scholars. From the Bible classes twenty-three have joined the church. The Mission at Boundary Street continues to do splendid work, and through the generosity of friends a permanent missionary has been engaged.

Salvation Army.

Midnight efforts to reach fallen women and drunkards have been commenced by the Army in Brighton.

The Lord Mayor of Bristol says that the twenty years' work of the Army in that city has done more to raise the moral tone of the people there than that of any other organization.

Eight men, formerly belonging to the "submerged" classes, and who have been rescued and trained at the Hadleigh Land Colony, have been sent to Canada by the Army authorities.

No fewer than 10,000 letters have been written by the officers in connection with the Women's Social Work, during the past twelve months, to girls who have passed through the Women's Rescue Homes, and are now in situations.

A Bristol man who was charged with stealing, and who had already spent twenty-two years in prison, was recently remanded by the Judge in order to hear the opinion of the officer in charge of the Army's local Social Establishment, where the man had recently slept. Finding that the Army was prepared to help the man to regain his lost character, the Judge informed him that instead of sentencing him to ten years' penal servitude, the punishment would be reduced to six months' hard labour, conditional upon his entering the Army's Refuge upon his discharge. The officer visited the man in prison several times, and met him at the prison gates. He is now earning an honest living, and gives every evidence of a sincere change of life.

A day of prayer and humiliation is to be observed at Earlham Hall, Earlham Grove, near Forest Gate Station (G.E.R.), on Sunday, April 20, from 11 a.m. till 9 p.m. Christians of all denominations are invited to attend throughout the day.—H. Champness (Convener).

The arrival of the Church Association "Rowland Taylor" Protestant Van at Stanstead, Essex, proved to be most opportune, an Evangelical minister having recently been succeeded by Ritualists. Mr. C. J. Francis, the evangelist in charge, conducted a series of well-attended meetings. Considerable excitement was created in the parish, with the result that the police ordered the removal of the Van. A subsequent meeting, however, was held in a room, which was well attended and enthusiastic. A large quantity of literature was distributed.

Pastor R. Howton, of the "Beacon Light" Village Missions, Glossop, Derbyshire, has issued the nineteenth annual report of his work. It tells of fruitful evangelistic labours, and of spiritual prosperity in connection with the Beth-Rapha Home of Rest. Many useful agencies of a religious and philanthropic character are maintained. Mr. Howton writes:—"Our correspondence is filled with evidences of deep spiritual impressions, and is full of testimonies to the blessing which attends the operations of the mission in all its branches."

Resuming Work in South Africa.

It is gratifying to know that, in those parts of South Africa where regular Christian work had to be suspended on account of the war, it is possible now, to a very large extent, to resume operations. In many places, however, a heavy financial strain will be felt for some time to come. Congregations have been scattered, organizations have been broken up, and many of the supporters of missionary and other work have been so crippled financially that, unless help is forthcoming from home, many agencies cannot be resumed.

A case in point is the Baptist Church at Troyeville, Johannesburg, where Rev. Thos. Chapman has been minister since 1898. Before the war, in addition to carrying on work in Troyeville, his church, though only a small one, supported a missionary to the natives and carried on evangelistic work among the miners. After the outbreak of the war the church had to be closed, and Mr. Chapman eventually came home. He is now anxious to go back and resume his labours. His people at Johannesburg are waiting for him; but financial difficulties stand in the way. The Baptist South African Colonial and Missionary Aid Society, which has been formed to help such cases, is anxious to make a grant to Mr. Chapman's church of £100, towards which a sum of £50 is in hand. The hon. secretary of the society is Mr. R. H. Henson, 19, Furnival Street, Holborn, E.C.

Personalia.

Mr. Bewley Weaver's address is now Springfield House, Hanley, Staffs., where all communications for the Weaver Brothers should be sent.

Mr. Spencer Walton, after a fruitful two months' work in America, has arrived in England. He hopes to sail for South Africa with Mrs. Walton on May 31.

Rev. Wm. Lawrence Tweedie, organizing missioner of the Open-Air Mission has been appointed Organizing Secretary to "Help for Brazil" Mission, and enters upon his duties on May 1.

In his last letter to the Board of the London Missionary Society, Rev. Dr. Griffith John, of Hankow, China, reports that he has had a bad attack of dysentery, which has left him very weak.

The retirement of Dr. Colin S. Valentine from the Principalship of the Medical Training College at Agra, has been followed by the appointment to the position of Dr. W. Huntly, who since 1886 has laboured in connection with the Rajputana United Presbyterian (now United Free Church) Mission.

Rev. Geo. Whelpton, of the Wesleyan Mission in Paris, has been granted a year's rest from September 1 on account of Mrs. Whelpton's breakdown in health. Mr. Whelpton writes that the movement in the villages in the centre of France continues. He also speaks of further conversions among priests, and of the opening up of work among the Bretons.

Work amongst Anarchists.

To work for Christ amongst criminals and Anarchists; to present Christianity to those who only know it as dominant in Italy; to preach a Gospel to those who believe that religion is a barrier to progress; to speak a message of peace to those who are at war with society—may not seem an easy or attractive enterprise, but it is one that needs to be undertaken by those who believe that Christ and the Gospel are the world's greatest need.

A little known but very blessed work on the above lines is being carried on amongst the Italian population in Switzerland, and especially in Geneva, under the direction of Rev. O. Golia-Mauro. He has just published a pamphlet containing an account of the work, and some very interesting particulars of interviews he has had with leading Anarchists and others. As hon. secretary for England, I shall be very glad to send a copy to interested readers, and to welcome any assistance in making the work known in this country.

(Rev.) H. S. Mercer.

Blenheim Park Rd., South Croydon.

Fallen Asleep.

At Aldersley, near Wolverhampton, Mr. George Thompson Carr, a member of the Society of Friends. By his death many philanthropic societies have lost an earnest supporter.—On March 20, Rev. Frederick Edmunds, a highly-esteemed Wesleyan minister.—By the death of Rev. William Jessop in his eighty-eighth year, an old and well-known Wesleyan minister has fallen from the ranks. He was formerly Governor of Wesley College, Sheffield.—On April 5, after many months of great suffering, Mr. George Williams, through whose efforts Stone Hill Mission Hall, near Chertsey, was erected in 1892, and who has since superintended the Gospel work there.

Cheques and Post Orders to be made payable to Messrs. John Haddon and Co. at that address. (For Subscription rates, see Page 1 of Cover.) Postcard or stamped envelope should be enclosed if receipt is desired.

Notes & Comments

A Lesson in Soul-Seeking. The thrilling story that comes from Wales, of an entire community turning out to search for a missing boy, will undoubtedly appeal to many preachers as a fine illustration of seeking the lost. There is something deeply moving in the spectacle of five thousand men volunteering to search wood and mountain for one little child. It is an instinct of the heart that is at work here. It will be a happy day when men are as anxious about the recovery of lost souls as they are concerning the recovery of a lost body. Why should not a whole neighbourhood arise to recover the drunkards and the sinful in their midst? Fraternal neighbourliness in healthy action could accomplish wonders. But the Church which holds most of fraternity, has not yet put into full practice the doctrine of salvation she professes.

A Long-standing Debt. In the tendency to look at Ireland as a country largely under the domination of Romanism, the debt we owe to the Protestantism of that country is too frequently overlooked. In a recent biographical sketch of the late Rev. William Arthur as "student, missionary, advocate, educator, and preacher, and the author of 'The Tongue of Fire,'" Rev. Dr. Meredith, of Boston, U.S., says:—

> The early Wesleyans complained to John Wesley that he spent too much time in evangelizing Ireland. He bade them have patience and Ireland would repay for the work done there. It did well repay. The pioneers of Methodism in America were Irish immigrants. Barbara Heck, the mother of American Methodism; Philip Embury and Robert Stranbridge, the first preachers, were Irish Methodists. Ireland gave to English Methodism Adam Clarke, the great Bible commentator, and many of her early preachers. Had Ireland only produced William Arthur, then John Wesley's labours would have been well repaid.

The Atonement—Theory or Fact? A well-known Unitarian, Dr. G. Vance Smith, reviewing a recent volume of essays, entitled, "The Atonement in Modern Thought," claims that the differences of the writers form a conclusive reason why a "doctrine so vague and dark" cannot be an essential part of Christianity. The fallacy of this judgment is a very simple one. The atoning work of Christ is not merely a question of theory; it is a question of fact. It is what Christ has done for us, not what we think of it, that has purchased our redemption. St. Paul puts this into a sentence in 1 Cor. xv. 3, 4, "For I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures; and that he was buried, that he rose again the third day according to the Scriptures." At the same time, we must not slur over the last words—"according to the Scriptures." Here only can we inform our minds and base our judgments, with regard to the death of Christ no less than with regard to his resurrection. And here comes in Old Testament prediction, and New Testament explanation regarding the putting away of sin. Christ was "delivered for our transgressions"; He "put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself"; He "tasted death for every man." Nothing short of these truths must satisfy the mind that accepts Divine revelation.

The Powers from Beneath. During late years there has been an unmistakable tendency on the part of higher critics and others to eliminate the supernatural element from the Gospels, not only on the higher, but also on the lower side. The cases of demonic possession recorded in the Gospels have been reduced to cases of epilepsy, and the whole subject has been relegated to the domain of pathology. The consequence of this "naturalism" is obvious—it is a direct challenge of the work of the Redeemer, who came "to destroy the works of the Devil." We are glad to see that a formidable antagonist, who is in every way qualified to write upon the subject, being a scholar and a physician of high repute, has boldly taken up the subject in a recently-issued volume, and shown that when medical science has said its last word upon the cases of possession in the Gospels, there is a serious element of the supernatural left. Dr. Alexander's book, Demonic Possession (T. & T. Clark), is needed. Men too glibly assume that there are no evil forces but those open to visual inspection. Experience shows that our most serious battle is with the invisible powers "from beneath." And he who does not understand his foe will not come off victor in the fight.

The Judgment of Experience. It is well that the Church is called upon continually to consider the vital foundations of her life and work. We are all apt to get into ruts and to take things for granted, and it is a good thing therefore when friendly workers direct us afresh to the sources. Dr. Forsyth, in a contemporary, writes in a luminous and forceful manner concerning the place which experience occupies in the Church's life. The Church's real life is experimental or it is nothing; it is far more than an intellectual repose in doctrines; it is a glowing experience of a living Redeemer. Dr. Forsyth's timely word about the judgment which experience gives, deserves earnest pondering. He says, with truth:—

> The decay of an evangelical experience affects the Church's inner freedom in the form of its Christian instinct and tact. It fails to discern the right members to have, or the right ministers to choose; the right manner of common life, or the right manner of common Gospel. In such a decay the Church loses the standard which makes it a trier of spirits. It parts with the kind of saintship which judges the world.

There is much in these words which helps to explain certain things at present current amongst us.

The Imperfectly Instructed. There are many teachers to-day like Apollos of old, eloquent, fervent, and diligent, who like him also, teach the truth imperfectly. But it is not always that an Aquila and a Priscilla are ready to "expound" to such the "way of God more perfectly." It is a very delicate ministry, this, and not everyone is competent to undertake it. But when it can be done, it is worth doing, for it means the conquest of a new force for the Gospel. A sincere Apollos is open to a ministry of this kind, but he will not be driven, whilst unkind criticism will probably confirm him in his errors. Gentleness will accomplish far more than harshness. Verbum sapienti, &c.

A Dangerous Departure. The recent Budget will be historical because of its frank return to a Protectionist policy in this country. The traditions of sixty years have been cast to the winds, and the people's bread, sacred for this period from the touch of the State monopolist, is now to be taxed. With the political aspects of this fact we have here nothing to do, but its bearing on the hardships of the poor must appeal to every thoughtful and sympathetic person. The cost of living is rising steadily in our great cities, in spite of many alleviations and privileges in particular directions. We have greatly thriven as a people during the era of Free Trade; are we likely to continue in our progress under this return to the policy of our grandparents? The amount of the present duty on corn will be insignificant compared with what it was after the Napoleonic wars. Its significance lies in the new departure which it inaugurates. The possibilities are disquieting in the extreme.

The Bible and the Schools. The battle is raging around the Government Education Bill, and the strongest resolutions have been passed on both sides. We notice that sceptics, agnostics, and others of that class are joining in the fray, and are taking occasion to vent their spleen upon the Bible, and to demand its suppression altogether in the schools. Free Churchmen and others who are vigorously opposing the Bill must be very careful that they do not play into the hands of those who are striving, might and main, to banish every vestige of religious instruction. To protest against sacerdotal interference is one thing, but to banish the Bible is quite another. The status quo must be maintained at all costs. It may be well to recall, in the present crisis, the action of Professor Huxley in 1870, when the School Board system was introduced. The redoubtable agnostic fought for the retention of the Bible in the schools on the ground that English education could not be complete without it. There is a via media between sectarian and wholly secular teaching, and this must be insisted upon.

A Striking Parallel. Gambling by means of "penny-in-the-slot" machines has recently become prevalent among boys, and a salutary magisterial sentence was passed in one of our police-courts on a proprietor of one of these fresh "traps." Persons who find these machines in sweets shops, &c., will do well to write to the police on the subject. These nefarious efforts to contaminate the young and foolish are a painful revelation of the depths of depravity to which the love of money plunges men, and the prophet's warning sounds strangely à propos:—

> For among my people are found wicked men; they watch, as fowlers lie in wait; they set a trap, they catch men. As a cage is full of birds, so are their houses full of deceit; therefore they are become great and waxen rich. They are waxen fat, they shine; yea, they overpass in deeds of wickedness. . . . Shall I not visit for these things? saith the Lord. Shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this? (Jer. v. 26-29.)

The Abuse of Moving Pictures. The note of warning sounded last year regarding the unsavoury uses to which "moving picture" machines are sometimes put on piers, in street exhibitions, and at railway stations, needs to be repeated. The evil possibilities of this apparatus (instructive as it may be made, and harmlessly amusing), have been quickly discovered by those who would make haste to be rich at the expense of the morality of the young and thoughtless; and, where possible, they are made the means of exhibiting obscene and suggestive pictures in the hope of greater gain. Much good was done last season by unfailing vigilance and the wise importunity which is often needful to get the police and magistrates to work effectually against this kind of evil; but any relaxation of watchfulness and perseverance will certainly bring a recrudescence of the trouble in an aggravated form. It seems strange that while a physical nuisance is immediately followed by condign punishment, it is so hard to get the authorities to deal with moral nuisance with a firm hand.

The Cure of Inebriety. The experiments lately made in the "Bi-chloride of Gold Cure for Inebriety" have so far shown some encouraging results. Mr. Tennyson Smith gives the following account of the results:—

> We have ascertained that these were extremely bad cases, and that the moral nature appeared to be not merely dormant, but destroyed, as the result of years of excessive drinking. In two other cases the "graduates," while cured of the desire for excessive indulgence, are found to be tampering with the old enemy. In one respect it is a testimony to the efficacy of the remedy that they can indulge moderately without at once going to excess. This reduces the number of "graduates" to be reported upon to thirty-seven. In regard to thirty-five of these, we have evidence from meeting them, or from reading their letters written up to date, and of other satisfactory kinds, that they are teetotalers, and are wholly free from the craving for drink which at one time mastered them.

A National Committee is being formed for the further investigation of this difficult but promising problem.

Bringing Rich and Poor Together. In the formation last week of a Mutual Social Union for Glasgow, Lord Provost Chisholm, of that city, has seen a worthy crown put to many beneficent efforts during his term of office. With an intimate knowledge of the actual conditions of life among the poor such as was possessed by none of his immediate predecessors in the chief magistracy, his heart had long been set on bringing the poorer and richer sections of the community into closer relations. The basis of the Union is a belief that the poor really need sympathy and stimulus more often than charity, while the rich have quite as much to gain as to give by such a coming together. All the poorer districts will be mapped out among visitors, whose first object will be to cultivate mutual friendly feeling. They will, however, also be in close touch with Evangelical congregations, into whose fellowship it will be their ultimate aim to guide such families as are found to be non-churchgoing. In the hands of men like Mr. Chisholm, the possibilities for good underlying such a scheme are incalculable; and the working out of the experiment deserves the closest attention of every other Christian community.

National Health. The health of a nation—physical, mental, and moral—is the true wealth of a nation, for upon it everything else really depends. The vulgar opinion that masses of bullion represent the riches of a people is as false as it is common. Health and weakness are terms which mutually exclude each other. The prime necessity, therefore, for any people is to carefully attend to its health—health which affects its entire nature, and not one part of it alone. Experience shows that unhealthy bodies affect the health of mind and heart; indeed, any part of our nature lacking health will infect the other parts. A scientist of great reputation has once more drawn attention to the scandal, so long tolerated, of men and women herded together in unsanitary dwellings, and he pertinently says we cannot expect men to possess healthy minds and hearts whilst their bodies are a perpetual prey to filth and disease. Unhappily we know all this too well, but when is the thorough clean sweep to begin? No greater blunder can be made than for legislators to shelve the questions of domestic reform.

The Power of Public Men. There can be no reasonable doubt that when good men occupy places of authority upon city and county councils, many of the moral problems which confront communities are rendered more easy of solution. It is largely a question of having the right men to administer the laws, and to exercise a healthy discretion in dubious matters. We are profoundly thankful to see that certain provincial councils are employing their powers in reducing, wherever possible, the number of drink licences. We all know how splendidly Liverpool has acted, and now Sheffield follows the lead in demolishing twelve out of fourteen licences which have fallen into the hands of the corporation. It has meant a sacrifice of £20,000, but this is not dear when the moral result is considered. These object lessons of what can be done by determined councils should encourage other councils in similar work, and also make electors determine to send into power only those men who will give the first place to justice and public morality. Magistrates, too, are waking up to their opportunities, as illustrated by the Farnham Bench a week or two ago.

The Morals of Workshops. The letters which have appeared in the daily Press upon the moral tone prevailing in many workshops call for serious reflection. Employés who have had considerable experience, agree in declaring that in many workrooms and factories the conversation indulged in by both sexes is degrading to the last degree. The subject is by no means new—attention has often been called to it, and quite recently a canon of the English Church raised a storm by publicly exposing the matter. The only thing to be done is for the healthy minority bravely to protest against the conversation taking an unclean turn. Usually people guilty of this kind of thing are ashamed when publicly rebuked. We are afraid, from much evidence variously gathered, that the veil of modesty is rudely torn from the eyes of even children in large centres of industry. It is not difficult to understand why so many youths and maidens go astray—the way of the passions is rendered easy by immodest talk.

A Manx Lesson. The House of Keys some little time ago passed an Act prohibiting the sale in the Isle of Man of tobacco in any form to young persons under fourteen years of age, and a Bill is now to be introduced forbidding the employment of barmaids in public-houses throughout the island. Unhappily most social questions affecting the well-being and real prosperity of the nation at home are shelved by the House of Commons just now, and many pressing reforms are therefore set aside. Yet the example set by the Manx legislators is one that might be followed with advantage to England.

A Plea for Emigration. Dr. Barnardo, in answer to the criticism embodied in the question, "Why send so many emigrants away from England when labour is so hard to obtain in this country and land is going out of cultivation?" says, in the current issue of the National Waifs Magazine:—

> For every boy or girl we emigrate, we place out two in England or at sea. But apart from that, our Association, while it promotes emigration on the one hand, is even more actively promoting on the other the return of child population to the country. In 1901 we emigrated 1,013 boys and girls to Canada; but we in the same year boarded out in the English counties no fewer than 2,300 children.

Dr. Barnardo further justifies the sending of a certain class of his protégés out of the country on the ground that many of them would otherwise be exposed to the seductions of designing and immoral relatives, who make a point when they can by reasserting their influence on the young folk for nefarious purposes. The only way of perfecting the rescue work in such cases is to take the children altogether out of their reach.

Playing at Forgiveness. A curious and most significant correspondence is proceeding in the columns of the Church Times upon the subject of confession and absolution. Canon Hay Aitken's addresses at the Fulham Conference have provoked this discussion, in which "Catholic" clergy contravene the truth of direct forgiveness from Jesus Himself. The saddest thing of all is to find how cheaply the notion of forgiveness is held. The Irish tippler who suffers "from frequent relapses" into sin is still forgiven, because he has made his confession to the priest, and has received an official absolution. It seems to us sacrilege to speak of such cases as evidences of the liberality of the Divine forgiveness. Forgiveness, as depicted in the Bible, leads, not to "frequent lapses," but to the fear of God and to a holy life; but sacerdotal forgiveness tends to chloroform the conscience and to minimize the sense of sin. Canon Aitken is courageous enough to insist upon the bad effects of this horrible system in the case of the Irish in many of our great cities who "remain in their lives a disgrace to their faith and to modern civilization."

The Fight against Slavery. Lord Cromer's report of the year's progress in Egypt includes cheering news as to the repression of slavery in the Khedive's dominions. In Egypt proper it may be said that, for all practical purposes, the institution of slavery no longer exists. All that is required is a certain amount of care and watchfulness to maintain the position already acquired. The main interest of anti-slavery operations has now been shifted to the Soudan, where we are only at the beginning of the campaign. Lord Cromer does not despair of ultimate success there also; but the difficulties are considerable, owing to the vast territory to be controlled and the wildness of the tribes in the South and East. The "open sore" of Africa is slowly healing, and the part that Britain has taken in the remedy will be one of the brightest passages in our chequered history in Africa. Having put our hand to the plough we must not look back.

Practical Papers.

On "CAREFUL WALKING."

LAST week we considered the perils of "Furious Driving," emphasizing more particularly the moral danger to the driver himself, as well as to those who get in his way. Turn now to the man in the street, exposed to the impetuosity or recklessness of the driver, and incurring risk of injury thereby.

"Wherewithal," asks the Psalmist, "shall a young man cleanse his way?" Here is a practical question that concerns us all, and the answer is concise and equally to the point—"by taking heed thereto!" (Ps. cxix. 9).

Want of thought on the part of the driver is no excuse for lack of forethought on the part of the pedestrian; nay, the latter has all the greater need to care for himself. Little consideration on the part of the one calls for greater foresight on the part of the other. Mutual recrimination, such as we often hear in the London streets, does not meet the case. "Why don't you look where you're driving?" asks the one. "Why don't you look where you're going?" retorts the other! No-thought has its antidote in fore-thought—thinking beforehand, i.e., anticipating the danger, providing against it by "taking heed."

No doubt the most agreeable method of "cleansing our way" would be to clear from it everything that impedes our progress or imperils our comfort; but that is impossible, life being what it is. The only alternative is to exercise forethought and foresight, to avoid the obstacles that are inevitable, and to "take heed" to our way. "Enter not into the path of the wicked, and go not in the way of evil men. Avoid it, pass not by it, turn from it and pass away" (Prov. iv. 14, 15).

We speak of some persons as being "born lucky," and without discussing the orthodoxy of the phrase, we may at least recall cases of some who, despite their recklessness or want of care, seem to go through life with little or no injury, and whose frequent risks culminate in hair-breadth escapes. But such are not true "ensamples to the flock," nor can we safely ignore the inspired counsel of "taking heed."

There is, perhaps, no more practical book in the Bible than the Book of Proverbs, written by one who evidently had a wide knowledge of life, with its perils and its possibilities. How similar human nature was in his days to what we find it to be in our own! And the Wise Man's counsels are all summed up in the phrase, "taking heed."

Any of us who have travelled in Eastern lands, shrouded in the gloom of imperfect civilization, have realized this necessity to the full. What ceaseless vigilance is required to avoid the pitfalls and the pools, the pack-laden beasts, the accumulated refuse, and the sleeping dogs, with which the ill-kept streets abound! How ardently have we longed for the much-abused County Council to be there to cleanse our way! But in its absence we had to take things as they were, and cleanse our own way, not by removing the offences, but by "taking heed thereto," and avoiding that which would injure or soil our person or our clothes.

Is it not so in all spheres of life? "It is impossible but that offences will come," said our Lord, "but woe unto him through whom they come" (Luke xvii. 1)—the Jehus who upset or stumble others by their want of thought or heart, or by their inconsistency. Be on your guard against such; but forget not to see to the cleansing of your own way.

Oh, the catastrophes that occur from lack of a careful walk! How many bright young lives have been spoiled, for want of taking heed—heed to the admonition of conscience, or the faithful counsels of parent, teacher, friend! "Be not wise in your own conceit," nor afraid of "grandmotherly legislation," if it will save you from splashing and floundering in sin's foul mire. Too many are like "mudlarks," disporting themselves thus. "The time past," says St. Peter, "may suffice to have wrought the desire of the Gentiles"—"that ye no longer should live the rest of your time to the lusts of men, but to the will of God" (1 Pet. iv. 3, 2).

I like the expression, to "thread one's way"; it is so suggestive of intent desire and earnestness of purpose. When a child, my mother gave me a needle to thread; it took me half an hour in the light of the window to accomplish the task; and when I turned triumphantly to hand it to her, I found that she had threaded one for herself, finished her work and put it away, congratulating herself on having found a means of keeping me quiet for so long. But what concentrated energy I had exercised meanwhile!

Few of us attain to the "expert" stage in life; some may thread their way with more deftness than others, but seldom if ever comes the time when we can afford to throw discretion to the winds, or abandon an exceeding care as to how we tread our path. Surrounded by snares and wiles on every side, it is not safe to adopt a happy-go-lucky mood, nor to rely upon our 'cute knowledge or deftness of movement, at the cost of "taking heed." We need to keep our eyes open, and ourselves very much awake.

St. Paul bids us "walk circumspectly" i.e., "looking around" for sources of danger—as a country cousin does when crossing a crowded street. From many directions may come the perils of the way, and the all-round glance is as much needed as the chariot-driver's centred look. Zeal is needed—granted; but circumspection even more. The man who endangers your spiritual way has his own responsibility to bear, but this does not lessen yours. He is answerable to God for his furious driving, but you equally so for your careful walk.

"What cannot be cured must be endured!" and what cannot be removed must be avoided. It may or may not be your lot in life to drive; assuredly you will have to walk. Remember that, "Fools rush in, where angels fear to tread." See rather, that you cleanse your way by "taking heed thereto."

But how may this be done? "According to THY WORD." Thus alone can we direct our steps. If circumstances compel you to go out into an Eastern street at night, it is customary for a man to walk before you bearing a lantern, which he holds as near the ground as possible; hence the appropriateness of the inspired description of the Word of God, as "a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path."

And notice its adaptation to circumstances: it is applied where it is most needed. There are no circumstances in life in which this Divine light may not be summoned to our aid. More potent than all the magic charms of Aladdin's lamp is its wondrous power. Neither zeal nor discretion can compensate for its neglect. Oh, the pity of it, that so many give it so little heed! We presume to lead where we ought to follow; we criticise it when we should bow to its criticism of ourselves. No wonder we stumble and go astray. What folly to despise its counsel and reproof, its warning and its aid! How else can we hope to thread our way through the dark and dangerous spots of life, except in the light of its kindly beams? It not only sheds light upon the heaven above, but upon the earth beneath. It not only illuminates the head, the intellect, the mind; it descends to the level of the feet, to guide them into the way of peace. It not only treats, in general terms, of sin and heaven and reward; it exposes in detail the dangers of the way, and helps us to avoid what it is impossible to remove.

Above all, it points us to Him who is alike the Eternal Word and "the Light that is come into the world" for our salvation; who has trodden our difficult way, "tempted in all points like as we are, yet without sin;" "in whom is no darkness at all." O blessed Light! help us to follow Thee, keeping ourselves unspotted from the world, until we walk with Thee in white!

Christian, walk carefully; danger is near!
On in thy journey with trembling and fear;
Snares from without, and temptations within,
Seek to entice thee once more into sin.

Christian, walk prayerfully; oft wilt thou fall,
If thou forget on thy Saviour to call;
Safe thou shalt walk thro' each trial and care,
If thou art clad in the armour of prayer.

DREAMS AND REALITIES. Fourteen "Practical Papers," with preface by Rev. F. B. Meyer, B.A. (Cloth, 1s. Morgan & Scott.)

The King's Coronation.

AMID the gorgeous pageant and general acclamations by which the Royal Coronation will be marked, it is highly desirable that the Church of Christ should arise and take advantage of the occasion to testify to the world of its essential oneness, and its sense of gratitude to God for the material prosperity of the State.

This has been so impressively laid upon the hearts of a number of earnest Christians, that it has been decided to engage the Queen's Hall for a day of prayer and praise on June 25. No doubt this date may appear to some undesirable, as being the day preceding the Coronation; but it is the only one during that week on which the hall can be secured. All the more need, therefore, for the Christian public to exert itself to make the meetings known, and to secure attendances worthy of so exalted an occasion.

Full particulars will be announced in due course, but meantime we are able to state that a prayer meeting will be held from 7 to 8 a.m., followed by another in All Souls' Church, Langham Place, at 9 a.m., and sessions for prayer and conference in the Queen's Hall at 11, 3, and 7.

Of course, Churchmen and Nonconformists will meet upon equal terms, and leaders of various Evangelical communities will take part.

Friends are requested to engage themselves for these gatherings as a most important part of the week's celebrations, and to make them as widely known as possible. It is also hoped that similar meetings will be arranged for in other cities and towns.

The secretaries are Revs. F. S. Webster and F. B. Meyer.

"His Judgments." *

(Psa. cxlvii. 20.)

God is not man—that in the day
Of his appearing He should say
To us, concerning each mistake
Which we through helpless blindness make,
"Ye should have better understood,
And known the evil from the good;
Ye should have traced the guiding light,
And not have wandered from the right."
He reads, and very truly reads,
Our motives underneath our deeds;
And if with purpose pure to-day
I seek, but seem to miss, my way,
Yet am I in the courts above
Judged by the perfect law of love.

Samuel and Saul.

"Two Putting Ten Thousand to Flight."

(1 Sam. xiv.)

By Rev. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

JUST two young men, with the glow of patriotism in their hearts, and trust in God as their guiding-star, what may they not effect?

Jonathan was a true knight of God, who anticipated some of the noblest traits of Christian chivalry. We may almost say of him that he was the Hebrew Bayard, a soldier without fear and without reproach. He lived pure, spoke true, righted wrong, was faithful to the high claims of human love, and followed the Christ, though as yet he knew Him not. His character serves as a bright background on which that of his father is but a sorry contrast.

Conceive of a very narrow gorge protected on either side by steep walls of chalky formation on which only the wild goats could find a footing, and deemed unscalable by man. The ridge on the north, which rises above an almost perpendicular crag into three knolls, was called Bozez, or "shining," because it reflects all day the full light of the Eastern sun, whilst that on the south, ten paces distant, was known as Seneh, "the acacia," being as constantly in the shade. Michmash crowned the former, and there the Philistines were encamped, whilst the little village of Geba lay above the latter, and thither Saul had removed his army, such as it was, withdrawing from the plains of the Jordan to watch the movements of Israel's foes.

Jonathan chafed at the inaction and the disgrace which the whole situation attached to his countrymen. He was animated also by a profound faith in God, and was prompted by the Divine Spirit to an act which issued in a glorious victory and deliverance.

I. Jonathan entered into the Divine Purpose. It seemed to him impossible to suppose that God had forsaken the people of his choice or withdrawn from his ancient covenant. Had He promised, and could He not perform? Were not the people of Israel his chosen heritage? Had He not chosen them out of all the world, that they might be the custodians and purveyors of Divine truth to the nations? Was not the land of Canaan made over to them by an irrevocable deed of gift? Did not all the miraculous leadings and interpositions of the past confirm such an interpretation of the Divine purpose? Surely the purpose of the Almighty was in conflict with the invasion of the land by these Philistine hordes, and only waited for some believing soul to enter into full communion with its mighty current, and deliverance would be secured.

Saul, on the other hand, had no perception of these things. The great past failed to speak to him. Discouraged by what met his eye and ear from morning to night, he had no power to rouse himself to lay hold on the Divine promise of deliverance. The sentence of deposition, which Samuel had so recently pronounced, like a stone on the mouth of a tomb, seemed to shut him up to despair.

It is of the utmost importance in this mortal life, when heart and flesh fail before the giant wrongs that assert themselves against the well-being of mankind—such as the drink-traffic, the mania for betting and gambling, impurity, and the insensate absorption in pleasure, which are the Philistines of our time—to look away to the Divine purpose, as disclosed in the redemption achieved on the Cross by the blood of the world's Redeemer. Surely that cannot have been shed in vain. The power and potency of the Divine might are pledged to realize and accomplish that full deliverance of which the Cross is the prophecy. The Son of Man has been manifested that He might destroy the works of the devil, and He will not fail nor be discouraged until that purpose is realized. Happy are they who, like Jonathan, raise themselves above the depression of the moment in living fellowship with these eternal facts, and ally their weakness and helplessness with the march of God.

II. He yielded himself as an instrument. Jonathan was one of those blessed souls, who are as sensitive to God as the retina of the eye to light, or the healthy muscle to the nerve; and "it fell upon a day that he said unto the young man that bore his armour, Come, let us go over to the Philistines' garrison, that is on the other side." With a beautiful modesty "he told not his father"; and in all probability the two slipped away silently in the grey dawn, whilst their comrades were still wrapped in slumber. The intimation of a Divine purpose thrilled the ardent spirit of the young prince, of which he gave some clue in the words, "It may be that the Lord will work for us, for there is no restraint to the Lord to save by many or by few."

Notice where Jonathan laid the emphasis. He had the smallest possible faith in himself, and the greatest faith in God. His soul waited for the Lord; in Him was centred all his hope, and from his gracious help he expected great things. All that he aspired to was to be the humble vehicle through which the delivering grace of God might work. This is what God wants—not our strength, but our weakness, which in absolute despair turns to Him; not our armies, but two or three elect souls, who expect great things and dare them. It is false to say that the Almighty is on the side of great battalions. All history goes to show that the movements which have transformed the face of the world have been achieved by the going forth of God through individuals, who have not been specially distinguished by outstanding talents, but have been led to surrender themselves absolutely to the Divine impulse. What shall I more say?—for time would fail to tell of Carey, and Wilberforce, and Livingstone, and George Müller, and hundreds more.

An Appeal to Young Men.

Yield yourselves to God—and I specially appeal to the young men who may read these words. There are wrongs that God wants to right, tyrannies He is about to break, foes of human peace and happiness that He wants to quell; but He must have agents and instruments, clean and pure, true and faithful, delivered from the domination of the flesh, and absolutely resigned to his disposal. It matters not if they be high-born as Jonathan, or obscure as his armour-bearer; through them He will achieve a great deliverance.

Saul, the chosen king, had no such vision, and no such faith. He was not sensible to the Divine voice speaking in his soul, but had to depend on the interposition of the priest (vv. 19 and 36); he spoke and acted as though the victory depended wholly on the efforts that he and his men might put forth, and in forbidding the use of such simple refreshment as the wild honey of the woods might yield, he forfeited the full results of God's interposition. Could it be supposed that God's deliverance of his people would fall short because they put forth the ends of the rods that might be in their hands to convey the wild honey to their lips? Throughout the whole day, and especially in the senseless adjuration, which was meant to save time, but really hindered the full result, Saul showed himself oblivious of the one thought that animated the heart of his noble son—that God was working through human instruments to inflict his own judgment on the invading hosts.

III. Jonathan reckoned on God, and God did not fail him. Faith is the indomitable power by which we call unto our help a whole range of laws and forces which are outside the lives of ordinary men. They have two keyboards to their organ, we have three. They employ the physical and intellectual, whilst we, in addition, may call in the aid of the spiritual and eternal. Thus we are able to accomplish the same results, and better, by the assistance of energies which are as much greater than those ordinarily employed, as electricity is greater than horse-power, or steam than hand. This was the secret of Jonathan's success.

As they ascended the steep cliff-side, the young men agreed on the sign which should indicate that they were indeed in the line of the Divine will, and that God would not fail them. The heart of man, in its first venture on the way of faith, eagerly longs for some sign that it is not following a will-o'-the-wisp, or being misled by wreckers' lights. This was graciously granted in the mocking voices of the advanced outposts, which ridiculed the idea that the Hebrews were to be feared (xiv. 11).

This was the heaven-given sign, and conveyed the assurance that the Lord had already delivered them into the hand of Israel (10). By faith the soul appropriates the Divine answer. "Whatsoever we ask, we receive of Him." Thus we fulfil the one all-important condition of successful prayer, which is so often overlooked, "All things whatsoever ye pray and ask for, believe that ye have receeived them, and ye shall have them" (Mark xi. 24).

The Vindication of Faith.

When they reached the top, the two young Benjaminites used their slings with such precision that twenty men measured their length on the ground, and a trembling from God, a heaven-sent panic, spread from them back on the main army behind, and to the bands of spoilers returning from their night raids. The Philistines could not know that the two who faced them were absolutely alone. It seemed as though they were precursors of a host of resolute and desperate men, and, behold, in the panic each man suspected his neighbour of being in league against him. The foreign mercenaries and strangers, of whom there was a large admixture, became the objects of special terror; "and every man's sword was against his fellow, so that there was a very great discomfiture." And the Hebrews that had been allied to the Philistines, or silent acquiescent in their rule, even they also turned against them, and all that had hid themselves in the hill country of Ephraim, when they heard that the Philistines fled, even they also followed hard after them in battle.

From his outlook at Gibeah, Saul beheld the wild confusion, and how the multitude swayed to and fro, and melted away; and hurled himself with his soldiers on the flying foe, who fled in headlong precipitancy, down the long valley past Bethaven, past the Upper and then the Lower Beth-horon, in order to gain the Philistine frontier by the valley of Aijalon. Every town through which the fugitives passed rose in their rear, and joined the pursuit, so that the flying host was greatly reduced, and thousands of warriors dyed the highways of the land they had so grievously oppressed with their heart's blood. Thus did God work on behalf of his chosen people in answer to Jonathan's faith.

The unwise prohibition of the king against food had a terrible sequel, first in the exhaustion of the troops, and, secondly, in the famished eating of the spoils of the day, without the proper separation of the blood. Still worse, when the day closed in, and Saul asked counsel of God, the Divine Oracle was dumb. Some sin had silenced it, and the monarch, already touched with the dark suspicions and fears by which his soul became so densely enveloped, realized that some sin was crying for discovery and expiation. Finally he and Jonathan stood before the people as the objects of the Divine displeasure, and Saul was prepared even to sacrifice his son in his moody wrath.

But the people saved him. They cried indignantly, "Shall Jonathan die, who hath wrought this great salvation in Israel? God forbid! As the Lord liveth, there shall not one hair of his head fall to the ground, for he hath wrought with God this day." Ah, the cause of discomfiture most surely lay between those two men; but it was not due to aught in Jonathan. Saul was alone to blame. He had not only missed the greatest opportunity of his life, but he was already enwrapping himself in the unbelief, the jealousy, and moroseness of temper in which his sun was to be enshrouded while it was yet day.

"Our Daily Bread."

SUNDAY, April 27. Leviticus ii.

THIS offering sets forth the holy character of our Lord in his earthly and heavenly life. We are not accosted so much with his atoning death as with his incorruptible and perfect loveliness of disposition, though of course the bruising of the corn which is necessary for the production of fine flour, the baking of cakes, the scorching of green ears, remind us of the perpetual suffering of his heart. How truly do the Gospels correspond with this description. In Him there was no defect, nothing to mar his absolute perfectness. He was as fine flour unleavened. May we not also take this to be our own model? Let there be an elimination from our nature of all grit, all coarseness, all roughness, and seek after the evenness of fine flour. The first-fruits were evidently typical of the Pentecostal Church (v. 14; 1 Cor. xv. 20; Col. i. 18).

Salt characterized the Meal-offering, but no honey. Honey may stand for the sweetness of flattery, of luxurious self-indulgence; it soon corrupts; but salt preserves from decay, and is an emblem of purity, perfection, and perpetuity (Matt. v. 13; Col. iv. 6). No leaven, which is an emblem of moral corruption, insincerity, and hypocrisy, but oil and frankincense—oil as representing the anointing of the Holy Spirit; frankincense as the token of purity, the fragrance of a holy life.

MONDAY, April 28. Leviticus iii.

Peace-offerings generally followed the Burnt-offering, and indicated that when reconciliation had been made and the offerer accepted, he might then feast with God at his table. There must ever be atonement and consecration (v. 2), but after these there should be gladness and festivity. The feelings of the pious Israelite, in presenting the sacrifices and offerings of this and the preceding chapters, are beautifully described in various passages, as Psa. xxii. 25, 26; lxvi. 13-20; Heb. xiii. 15. In our case, do we not feed on the perfect beauty and loveliness of Christ?

Notice that the parts burnt on the altar include all the internal organs of the victim, which in life are hidden from view, but after death are revealed. In the Peace sacrifice we have thus an inside view of our Lord, in the secret motives of his life, which were always patent to God, but were imperfectly understood by those who accompanied Him during his earthly life. Let us consider and meditate upon these aspects of our Blessed Lord's life, as they are set forth specially in the Fourth Gospel, and in the Psalms, which were evidently perpetually in his thought.

The sacred feast was to be eaten "before the Lord," in the near neighbourhood of the altar (Deut. xii. 17, 18), because we can never, even in our gladdest moments, get far away from the thought of our redemption by the blood and tears of the Son of God. Our supreme joy must always be that He made peace through the blood of his cross, and that we may have fellowship with God. O soul, rise above thy depression, and enter into the joy of thy God!

TUESDAY, April 29. Leviticus iv.

This and the next are not sweet savour offerings; they set forth, not so much what we are to God, but what the Lord Jesus suffered for us when He went without the gate, charged and burdened with the sin of the world. "Behold the Lamb of God!" In these offerings, also, we learn what is meant by our Lord becoming "sin for us" (2 Cor. v. 21). After the fat and certain inward portions had been placed upon the Altar of Burnt-offering, the whole carcase was carried forth without the camp to a clean place, where the ashes of the Burnt-offering had been poured, and there it was burnt (12). How vividly all this sets forth the precious death of Him who "suffered without the gate" (see Heb. xiii. 11, 12).

Another peculiarity of the Sin-offering was that in the case of the anointed priest, or of the whole congregation, some of the blood was brought within the Tabernacle, and sprinkled seven times before the vail (6, 7, 17, 18); the remainder was poured round about the altar (see also Lev. xvi. 14, 15). The sin of the priest was not like that of any ordinary man. When he sinned, he defiled the whole congregation; and since he had to do with the sanctuary and its ministry, his sin affected the entire sphere of his service. The whole of the worship of God seemed to be contaminated, until an atonement was made, i.e., until there had been confession of sin, and an acknowledgment that it deserved death, and a plea that the death of the innocent victim might be accepted in the place of the sinner.

The Sin-offering was specially intended for those who sinned through ignorance (2, 3). An Israelite might act up to the full light of his knowledge, and yet be adjudged a sinner in God's sight. We may say with Paul, "I know nothing against myself," yet we are not justified in the sight of God; and at the end of the best day we ever spent, we still need to say, "Forgive me for my sins which Thou hast seen, though they have escaped my notice." The greater our light, the more heinous is our sin; therefore the offering for the priest was much greater than that of an ordinary man.

WEDNESDAY, April 30. Leviticus v.

The Trespass-offering closely resembled the Sin-offering; but they differ in this, that the Sin-offering was intended to fix the thought of the penitent on the evil of his character in the sight of God, while the Trespass-offering dealt with the acts of transgression to which his evil character gave rise, and more especially with the harm they had wrought on others. We need to ask that God would forgive us our trespasses, as often as we need to ask for our daily bread, and it is a sweet thought that through the blood of Jesus, God forgives us all our trespasses (Col. ii. 13). But none of us can look on them without deep sorrow, that we are so constantly running against the love of God, or the interests of men.

Well might one of the foremost preachers of the Gospel assure me recently, that he was always preaching to those who had sinned, and missed the mark, and were broken-hearted; and that he believed that the preacher of the Divine forgiveness would never lack a congregation.

Let us search our hearts by the suggestions of this chapter, for it is almost certain that we are not sufficiently sensitive to the various shades of sin, of which we are constantly becoming guilty in God's sight. We contract defilement when we refuse to give evidence against wrong-doing (1); when we touch either in conversation or in scanning the newspapers on impure things, and conceive a momentary pleasure in considering them (2); when we speak idly and inconsiderately (4); when we withhold what we ought to have offered to God through carelessness or ignorance (15, 17). How often the loss of the sense of God's love and presence may be traced to some trespass, which must be confessed and put away ere we can renew our fellowship with Him.

THURSDAY, May 1. Leviticus vi.

Where a trespass concerned friend or neighbour, the Levitical law insisted on restitution or reparation. Then the offering might be brought to the priest, and atonement made. This law was also enforced by the Master in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. v. 23).

There is, in this day, a sad lack of consideration for one another, even among the Lord's people. Debts are incurred, and breaches of trust committed, little or no regard being paid to the loss and wrong thereby entailed. The late Dr. Andrew Bonar, commenting on these verses, says: "A lent book or borrowed umbrella would come under this law; and how few have the sincere honesty of that son of the prophets, more vexed at the loss of his axe-head, because it was borrowed, than if it had been his own (2 Kings vi. 5). The Lord expects entire disinterestedness; the man is to do to others as he would have others do to him. Any denial of having received a thing, any appropriation of it to himself, any carelessness in the keeping of it, is a trespass in the eye of God. You have wronged God in wronging your neighbour." But how good it is to hear the perpetual reiteration of those reassuring words, "It shall be forgiven."

From the eighth verse certain additional regulations are made for the various offerings which we have been considering; each is full of teaching. The fire of the altar was never to go out (13). So may our love and devotion to our God be unceasing. . . . To touch an offering was to be accounted holy (18). So contact with God's truth and service insensibly elevates and refines. . . . When the blood of the sin-offering was not taken into the Holy Place (as was the case when a ruler or one of the common people had sinned, compare iv. 17 and 30), instead of the flesh being consumed without the camp, it became the food of the priests (28, 29). So all God's priests must appropriate the blessed propitiation of Christ; but note the successive demands that are made for our personal holiness (25-29).

FRIDAY, May 2. Leviticus vii.

In this chapter there is a continuation of the laws respecting the Trespass and the Peace-offering, and especially with regard to the perquisites of the priests. In the case of the Burnt-offering the priest had the skin, all the flesh and the fat having been consumed (8). It has been thought that this represents the imputed righteousness of Christ, with which the soul stands arrayed in the presence of God (Gen. iii. 21). In the Trespass-offering the priestly order ate of certain parts reserved for them, and they probably lived at a common table, the meeting at which would promote brotherly harmony and fellowship (6, ; vi. 29). In the Peace-offering the breast was Aaron's, the right shoulder being given to the officiating priest (33, 34).

It was evidently intended that those who served the altar should live by the altar (1 Cor. ix. 13). We, too, have an altar, and a Divine Victim, of which we may eat (Heb. xiii. 10). See Num. xviii. 8-11. Let us see to it that we do not miss our portion in the Person and Work of our Saviour; and there is no need for us to reserve it, since it is always possible to eat and drink and be satisfied. Live not on stale thoughts of Jesus Christ, but feed on fresh and living conceptions of his unfailing love (17, &c.).

> Man, earthy of the earth, an-hungered feeds
> On earth's dark poison tree—
> Wild gourds, and deadly roots, and bitter weeds,
> And as his food is he.
>
> And hungry souls there are, that find and eat
> God's manna day by day;
> And glad they are, their life is fresh and sweet,
> For as their food are they.

SATURDAY, May 3. Leviticus viii.

The consecration of Aaron and his sons had been ordered long before (Ex. xxix), but it is now described with all the details of the ceremonial, after the Tabernacle was set up. We need, not only an all-sufficient Sacrifice, as typified in those we have been considering, but we need a Priest, who shall for ever represent us in the Heavenly Sanctuary (Heb. ix. 11, 12, 24). In Him, also, our great Aaron, all we are priests (1 Peter ii. 5; Heb. xiii. 15, 16).

In these solemn rites there was first, the prevalence of the Divine Word—all must be done as the Lord commands (5, 29, 36). The glory of the Lord will never appear, unless we reverently and carefully obey. There was, also, the efficacy of the blood—ear, hand, and foot needed to be touched with it, and many a victim had to shed forth its life. There was, also, the grace of the Holy Spirit—this was symbolized in the anointing oil (7-12). When Jesus was sanctified, we were also sanctified in Him (John xvii. 19); and just as Aaron and his sons were hidden for seven days within the precincts of the Tabernacle, we too are hidden with Christ in God, awaiting the manifestation of the brighter day—the day of resurrection (Rom. viii. 19; Col. iii. 1-4). The "May" Meetings.

Christian Policemen.

EXETER HALL on Thursday was the scene of a remarkable demonstration of enthusiasm, the occasion being the ninth annual festival of the International Christian Police Association. The proceedings commenced with a conference and gathering for prayer at half-past nine in the morning, and meetings followed with slight intermission until the same hour in the evening. Delegates from all parts of the kingdom were present. Two large gatherings were held in the Great Hall, one at five for the night-duty men, and another at 7.45.

Sir Robert Anderson, K.C.B., presided at the first meeting, and addressed some earnest words of counsel and encouragement on the Apostle's admonition to the Corinthians—"Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit you like men, be strong." He urged the men not to be content with "scuttling away to some prayer-meeting," but to be Christians on duty, remembering they were under authority to a higher Power than that of Scotland Yard.

A review of the year was given by Mr. A. A. Head, who pointed out that the Association now has branches connected with most of the forces in the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Dependencies, as well as the United States. Japan has 40,000 native constables, and the Police Missionary Union send workers among them; while the Royal Irish Constabulary support a missionary in West Africa. The primary object of the Christian Police Association is to promote the highest interests of all members of the force, with their families, by providing classes and meetings, social gatherings, and by establishing homes, institutes, and orphanages. One of the first permanent results of the work was the establishment of the Central Police Institute at Adelphi Terrace, with its restaurant, reading-room, class-room, cubicles, &c., and a friendly welcome to every policeman. There is also an institute in the city, and others have been opened at Leeds, Cardiff, and Birmingham.

The Association has its seaside Convalescent Home at Hove, and a northern Home at Harrogate, as well as orphanages at Redhill and Harrogate. The need for these institutions is obvious to all who have perused the report of the Chief Commissioner, which states that during 1900 no fewer than 3,099 members of the force suffered injury while in the execution of their duty. It is to be feared that comparatively few people realize how often the representatives of law and order suffer martyrdom through their devotion and faithfulness.

After Mr. J. H. Tritton had heartily welcomed the country delegates in the name of the Council, Rev. C. J. Procter, vicar of St. Mary's, Islington, gave a timely and deeply spiritual address, acknowledging the joy it gave him to speak to so many men whose lives were being given to the glory of God, and fighting manfully against sin and the devil. Dealing with the life of an ideal police officer, the speaker pointed out that his duties demanded (1) constant watching, (2) standing alone against a crowd, and (3) faithfulness when no eye is upon him. In the Christian life these duties must be observed in a higher sense, which could only be done through the power of Christ. No one could carry out life to its highest development, or experience life in its most satisfying joys, without Christ.

Mr. W. Spencer Walton, of the South Africa General Mission, followed with some practical words on Rev. i. 5, after which a number of the workers and delegates added their testimony.

The later meeting was under the presidency of Mr. W. F. Archibald, Master of the Supreme Court, who, in a happy address, recalled the days of his boyhood, when the idea prevailed that all Christian work must be done by the clergyman or the minister. He thought that the responsibility laid upon the whole Church had not then been awakened. Now it is recognised as absolutely necessary for the Christian to have some work to do. It was the object of the Association to unite Christian policemen in prayer and effort to make the Gospel message echo throughout the world.

Rev. J. Gregory Mantle and others addressed the audiences, which on each occasion filled every part of the building. The gatherings were of an impressive and inspiring order, for which many must have raised a note of thanksgiving to God.

The Evangelical Alliance.

ON Tuesday of last week the annual reunion of members of the Evangelical Alliance was held at Exeter Hall under the presidency of Lord Kinnaird. The chairman was supported by a number of leading clergymen and ministers, and there was a large attendance of friends of the Alliance. The first speaker was Canon Fleming, who in the course of a vigorous address said he believed there had never been a time when men were being moved toward unity more than now. Some good men were aiming at a Church which should be the growth of decrees and of Œcumenical councils; but there was only one true Catholic unity—that which drew men to Christ and to one another. A living Church is bound to show diversity. A grower might plant apple trees, all of the same kind and size, in the same kind of soil and under the same sunny aspect. The vigorous trees, however, would be marked by diversity in their growth, and in the same way freedom of thought and life caused diversity instead of uniformity in the church. Canon Henson had gone so far as to advocate the interchange of pulpits. He (the speaker) should be glad to welcome that interchange.

Prebendary Webb-Peploe urged that all censoriousness between the various denominations should be put away. Could they not bargain with one another that they would no longer split straws, but unite on the basis of the nine-fold "fruit of the Spirit." Christians are coming nearer to each other than was thought possible thirty or forty years ago. Some people said the obstacle to unity was in the Church of England; but the 19th Article set forth the definition of the Church in almost the same words as the Westminster Confession. The speaker urged that attention should be given to points of resemblance rather than matters of divergence.

Reference was made by Dr. Monro Gibson to the attitude of Nonconformists towards the Education Bill. They would have to do some fighting, but he trusted the controversy would be conducted in a right spirit. He did not love his conscientious brethren any the less because he differed from them.

Sir Robert Anderson, K.C.B., in the course of an able address, said it was discreditable that Christians should have to be scolded or coerced into unity. He was not too sanguine about the immediate future. Things might right themselves in the generation after ours, but meanwhile there would be a struggle against false religion and infidelity. Christians should endeavour to come together to a common centre, not aiming at unity of organization, which was the creation of Pagan emperors, but at the unity of spirit which Christians enjoyed before that irretrievable disaster, the "Conversion of Constantine," befel the Church.

Others who took part in the proceedings were Rev. J. B. Figgis (Brighton), Charles Spurgeon (Greenwich), F. S. Webster, and Dr. MacEwan.

Students' Summer Conference.—Arrangements have been made by the British College Christian Union for the holding of the usual summer conference at Matlock, July 22-31; and a cordial invitation is extended to all missionaries on furlough who are members of the S.V.M.U. Particulars may be obtained from the General Secretary, 22, Warwick Lane, E.C.

Children's Scripture Union.

THE large attendance at the annual meeting on Tuesday of last week gave fresh evidence of the widespread interest in the Children's Scripture Union. When presenting the report, Mr. T. B. Bishop mentioned as a source of great encouragement the fact that recently several small services had been begun on Sunday afternoons in different parts of the country, with a view to interesting and instructing children in God's Word. He hoped these small efforts would be largely multiplied, and emphasized the need of widely distributing Gospel literature among young people, one of the great problems of the present day being how to bring the Gospel in the clearest and most striking way to both young and old by the printed page, as a counterblast to the frivolous and vulgar literature so often purchased by boys and girls at bookstalls. A special effort is now being made to extend the work of the Scripture Union in Scotland.

From the chair, Rev. E. A. Stuart gave an interesting and profitable address, specially intended for the secretaries present, on "Our Wilderness Work, our Wilderness Priest, and our Wilderness Guide," as set forth in the Book of Numbers. Encouraging tidings were brought from Japan by Dr. W. N. Whitney, who said there are now nearly 11,000 members of the Union. In a great many schools the Scripture Union daily reading formed a part of the curriculum. The Railway Mission had adopted it, and the same was true of the prisons. The Scripture Union leaflets were a source of great help. From the headquarters in London about 80,000 of these, in the native tongue, were sent to Japan every year, and spread broadcast throughout the land. The best way of reaching the Japanese with the Gospel was through the travelling secretary who talked to people, held meetings wherever possible, and exerted himself with the one object of bringing people to Christ.

Rev. A. G. Dodderidge enlarged on the miracle of the feeding of the five thousand as furnishing an example of how God can use one boy or girl for his own glory, and for the good of other people. Rev. W. S. Standen held that activity is in too great a measure usurping the place of reflection, excitement taking the place of repose; and that one of the most difficult tasks of the present day was to lead people out of the newspaper right into the Word of God. Captain Tottenham stated that every year the Society published 133,000 magazines, as well as 110,000 English and 20,000 foreign letters. Rev. George Asker described the work of the Union as an undercurrent making for the unity of Christian people of all sections. Mr. A. E. W. Gwyn maintained that no boy's kit was complete without the Bible, which, moreover, it was necessary that he should study and utilize properly. Mr. Percy Shaw gave an interesting account of the work accomplished through the Scripture Union in Bengal, where he has been labouring on its behalf for some years. Mr. Arthur Govan, representing Scotland, spoke hopefully with regard to the opening up of Union work there, and expressed his love for the society because of its cosmopolitan character. Mr. H. Hutchinson (travelling secretary) spoke of the great need for the work in various parts of the country.

Strangers in Liverpool.—Friends of the Strangers' Rest, Paradise Street, Liverpool, will learn with pleasure of the continued progress being made at the New Buildings. Emigrants and foreign sailors for whom the institution was established twenty-five years ago are availing themselves in large numbers of the advantages offered. Altogether 791 meetings have been held, conducted mostly in foreign tongues. An increase in the number of Spanish meetings is recorded, while among Italians, Scandinavians, Chinese, Jews, and Germans there is much cause for encouragement. Boarding-houses have been regularly visited, and thousands of tracts and Gospels given to the men. Copies of the annual report may be had from Mr. T. A. Leigh, 19, James Street, Liverpool.

A Jubilee Breakfast.

THE completion of fifty years' work among women and girls in India is a record which is necessarily fraught with special interest; and in honour of the occasion the Zenana Bible and Medical Mission invited friends and supporters to a breakfast last week in the Skinners' Hall, kindly lent by the officials of the Worshipful Company of Skinners.

Lord Kinnaird, as treasurer, added to his many tokens of interest in this excellent work by presiding, supported by his sisters, the Hon. Emily and Gertrude Kinnaird, and other distinguished visitors.

Dr. C. F. Harford-Battersby laid down the lines of successful medical mission work as necessitating highly qualified helpers, by whom the spiritual interest should ever be regarded as paramount. He insisted that it was no use to send "home failures," but only those who are "specialists in every department."

Some idea of the magnitude of the Society's influence may be gathered from the fact that in 1901, 21,575 out-patients were treated by the lady doctors, 1,762 in-patients were received into the hospitals, and 65,205 attendances were made at dispensaries and the homes of patients.

Miss Edge, herself a Fellow of Bombay University, spoke of work of normal education done in the High School of Bombay, in which she has laboured for many years with the best educational and spiritual results; and Lord Kinnaird testified enthusiastically to her energy as a keen educationalist, but no less earnest in spiritual work. The key to the evangelization of India is in the future mothers, and no words can exaggerate the importance of this branch of Christian service. It was gratifying to learn the extent to which Government endorsed and, in part, supported the work.

It was a thankless but necessary task that the Chairman had to undertake in announcing that, owing to the alteration in exchange, and consequent depreciation of the rupee, the committee had been faced at the close of 1901 with a deficit of £4,189; and an increase of £2,000 a year in the ordinary income is required for the maintenance of the work. A sum of £5,000 was asked for, towards which £1,190 has been received; and it is hoped that the remainder will be given without delay. Indeed, if the work is to go on unimpeded, a Jubilee Fund of £20,000 is necessary, and we believe that our readers who have the welfare of our great dependency at heart will respond warmly and speedily to its appeal. It is a splendid work, worthy of generous support.

The annual meeting of the mission will be held at Exeter Hall, on Tuesday, April 29, when Miss Edge and Rev. Dr. Cuthbert Hall are expected to be among the speakers.

The Anti-Opium Society.

A GRATIFYING report of the work of the Society for the Suppression of the Opium Trade was presented at the annual meeting on Thursday. At last, stated Mr. J. G. Alexander, the hon. secretary, the principle for which the society had so long contended—namely, the total suppression of the opium trade except for legitimate medical use—had found expression in a legislative enactment in New Zealand.

In consequence of the great increase of poppy cultivation in India, the figures for 1899-1900 being the largest ever reported, the Society had called the attention of the Government to this deliberate infringement by the Indian Government of the policy first announced by the Marquis of Salisbury in 1876, and repeated by Sir James Fergusson and the late Mr. W. H. Smith in 1891, and a resolution of the House of Commons in 1893, urging the diminution of the production and sale of opium. A reply to this memorial had been received, wherein the Secretary of State appeared to maintain that the resolution had been over-ridden by the report of the Opium Commission, and that it was not binding on the Indian Government, having been based on a misunderstanding of its policy by the Home Government. To this the Society had prepared a rejoinder, which was about to be forwarded to Lord George Hamilton, showing how untenable were both these arguments.

Reference was also made by the secretary to the act of the United States Congress, rendering it penal for citizens of the States to give or sell to Pacific Islands natives opium or intoxicants. The Society had also conducted a large amount of organizing work during the year, holding 149 meetings.

Speaking from the chair, Sir Joseph Pease, M.P., remarked that from the first those who deemed the opium trade immoral and antagonistic to the principles of true Christianity, had had to fight the Indian Government. Reviewing what had been done, he contended that the report of the Opium Commission was absolutely worthless, and that their fight had been successful so far; outpost after outpost had been carried, and they meant to capture the citadel before long. With better treatment of the natives and economical government, India would be made into a most loyal adjunct to the British Crown.

Sir Horace Tozer, Agent-General for Queensland, described the efforts made in that colony to restrict the trade when in 1897 he was acting Prime Minister; and among others who spoke were Rev. George Wilson (secretary), Rev. G. T. Candlin (Tientsin), and Mr. H. J. Wilson, M.P.

Christian Telegraph Messengers.

ABUNDANT evidence was given at the annual meetings last week of the vitality and vigour of the Telegraph Messengers' Christian Association. At the afternoon meeting held on Wednesday at Exeter Hall, Mr. T. A. Denny presided, and after a few hearty words expressive of his increasing interest in the Association, called upon Telegraph Boy delegates from far and near to tell of the work in the branches to which they are attached. One by one these lads gave their varied accounts, all testifying that the T.M.C.A. is the best thing for telegraph messengers, and many giving testimony of having enlisted in the service of King Jesus.

In the evening the area of the large hall was thronged with more than 1,000 boys all wearing the King's uniform. The chairman, Dr. A. T. Schofield, reminded the boys of their past, pointed out the opportunities of the present, and urged the claims of the future.

After some physical drill and ambulance display, Rev. W. R. Mowll spoke some plain, straight words to the boys, fastening their attention on, "Shew thyself a man." Rev. and Hon. Talbot Rice followed with an earnest address.

Rev. Norman Bennet, who received a great ovation, invited any boys who desired to make a fresh start, taking Christ as their Saviour, to go with him to the Lower Hall. There, in a quiet, solemn gathering, not a few lads stood up and, repeating the words, "Jesus, I do trust Thee, trust without doubt," accepted God's offer of salvation.

Particulars of the work can be had of the founder and hon. general secretary, Miss A. F. Synge, 26, Ivy Lane, E.C.

Soldiers' Christian Association.

IN the absence of General Sir Robert Biddulph through official duties, Sir George Williams occupied the chair at the annual meeting of the Soldiers' Christian Association on Monday. Another disappointment was the non-appearance of Bishop Taylor Smith, Chaplain-General, owing to other engagements. Naturally the speeches were largely occupied with the nation's engagement in South Africa, and their tendency seemed to indicate that the war, with its terrible loss by death, had steadied the minds of the men, and led them to think of spiritual things. One of the agents of the Society, said Rev. Owen Watkins, had been awakened in the dead of night by a soldier, when the army was before Biggarsberg, asking, "What must I do to be saved? I dare not go into another fight without being prepared for the next world."

In the course of a brief review of the Association's efforts Mr. S. E. Burrow, the secretary, reported that thirty-three workers had been engaged in South Africa erecting eight large marquees, ten tents, and four iron buildings; tons of literature had been distributed, and a sum of £7,000 had been spent in the interests of soldiers at the front by the Society. There are nearly 500 branches of the S.C.A.

Sir George Williams, who was warmly welcomed, declared his belief that God was overruling everything for the good of this beloved land. We wanted humbling as a nation, and He had humbled us.

Major Treeby said that some years ago when a man went to the Army it was thought he went to the dogs. Now it was being realized that the Army was a place where a man was helped and elevated and there were many men who could say, "Thank God I joined the Army."

Among others who took part in the proceedings were Rev. Owen Watkins, Colonel Phillips, Mr. T. A. Denny, and Colonel Douglas Jones.

Scripture Readers in Ireland.

AN excellent year of work by the Scripture Readers' Society for Ireland was reported at the annual meeting held in Dublin on Monday of last week. Rev. J. Sandys Bird showed that 1901 had closed with a staff of thirty-five readers, to whose usefulness as soul-winners the reports of their superintendents testified in terms of the highest appreciation. The income had been £2,153 19s. 8d., and the expenditure £2,419 19s. 3d., showing an adverse balance of £337 19s. 7d., the deficit being accounted for generally speaking by deaths.

The Bishop of Ossory, who presided, said there could be no room for debate as to the aims and objects of the Society, which were to encourage the study of the Word of God, to increase the circulation of the Bible, and to try and get people to take an intelligent interest in the Scriptures. He knew of one parish in his diocese where the work could not be overtaken were it not for the help of the Scripture reader supplied by the Society. The Society had shown a desire to advance with the necessities of the time, and to increase and improve its organization and its work. It was bringing the power of the Bible to bear upon the people through the native Irish language.

As reasons why the Society should be supported, Rev. J. Lindsay Darling named: (1) the weapons which it used—the Word of God, even the sword of the Spirit; (2) that it works among the poor of all denominations—he could not keep pace with the work amongst the poorer classes in his neighbourhood but for the assistance he received from the readers; (3) the kind of agents it employs—they are most carefully chosen, and every precaution taken to see that they are spiritually-minded men, who long to tell others of the Saviour, whom they have themselves found.

Rev. J. O. Gage Dougherty (secretary) said his experience of the readers was that they are thoroughly godly men, who know and love the Lord, and go out to work not because they are paid the small stipend of £50 or £60 a year, but because they have the love of God in their hearts, and are seeking to extend his kingdom. Rev. Canon Day said the work of the Society was sorely needed, alike among the thousands of Protestant people in the North and the scattered Protestants in the South.

Troops at Lydd.—Another year of useful activity has been experienced at the Soldiers' Home, Lydd, under the earnest direction of Mr. F. E. Wootton. From time to time the thoughts of soldiers in distant countries turn to the home land, and from their letters it is easy to see with what gratitude they recall the kindly interest of Christian workers on their behalf. Many such communications have been received by the secretary of the Lydd Soldiers' Home, indicating the deep and abiding influence that is exercised upon the troops encamped in the locality. Mr. Wootton's annual report is interesting reading, and he will be glad to forward copies to friends of soldiers. Address: North View, Lydd, Kent.

The Open-Air Mission.

FIFTIETH YEAR OF FRUITFUL TOIL.

THE story of the Open-Air Mission, replete as it is with striking incident, and rich with revival blessing, constitutes a record of evangelistic labour among the masses outside the regular operations of the churches, which must be of absorbing interest to all who recognise the spirit of obedience to the great "marching orders" of the Master: "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature."

"ROB ROY" MACGREGOR.

As many readers will recall, the Mission owes its origin to the devotion and energy of the late Mr. John MacGregor ("Rob Roy"), who, writing of the first committee meeting, held on June 3, 1853 (after the work had been in progress for some time), said: "I see in this a small beginning of what may, nay, will be, a great, a noble, a blessed undertaking." Open-air preaching became a passion with this remarkable and unconventional moral reformer, who was a pioneer and co-worker with the great Earl of Shaftesbury in so many admirable undertakings that aimed to raise and bless the poor, the suffering, and the ignorant. It was said of him, with reference to his canoeing voyages and his love for disseminating the "good news" by means of pithy and appealing Gospel literature, that "he went through Europe with a fiddle in one hand and a bundle of tracts in the other." Mr. MacGregor's famous and fervent pamphlet, entitled, "Go Out Quickly," stimulated interest in open-air work; its circulation ran well over 100,000 copies.

GAWIN KIRKHAM.

Under the skilful direction of this Great-Heart, and of the first secretary, Mr. John Wilde Taylor, the Open-Air Mission made good progress. In 1860, the beloved Gawin Kirkham accepted the secretariat, and opportunities of preaching to the crowds that frequented racecourses and fairs were increasingly taken advantage of. The work continued to develop, to the joy of its friends.

At this period, sensuality and brutality were regularly associated with some of the more popular agricultural and pleasure fairs, and the missioner who dared to take his stand and proclaim the Gospel amid a pandemonium of tipsy revelry did so at the risk of his life. In that vividly written biography, "Gawin Kirkham, the Open-air Evangelist,"* by Mr. Frank Cockrem, which gives a comprehensive account of Mr. Kirkham and the operations of the Mission throughout the country, we read:—

> Sunday before the Derby, popularly styled "Show-out Sunday," then presented perhaps the saddest spectacle of unabashed godlessness to be found within the United Kindom. Mr. Kirkham, followed by his faithful band, took his stand amid the crowd gathered on the course. The inner circle of the crowd is composed of poor gipsy children, some of whom are accompanied by their parents. Then the next two or three circles will be working people, and young men and women. Beyond these you may see a mixture of stable boys, jockeys, and betting men; and further still, the dandies, with their silver-mounted sticks, eye-glasses, and cigars, who imagine they honour the poor preacher if they listen to him for a few minutes. Half-drunken men make their senseless observations, and witty infidels seek to create amusement at the preacher's expense.

SCENES OUTSIDE NEWGATE.

Amid crowds of out-of-works during the Lancashire Cotton Famine, also at the vast gatherings of British rascality assembled to witness public executions, Mr. Kirkham and his energetic band of helpers laboured assiduously. Describing a typical scene on the occasion of an execution outside Newgate Gaol, Mr. Kirkham wrote: "There could not have been fewer than thirty addresses given on the Sabbath evening and Monday morning. (It should be remembered that the crowd began to assemble on the night previous to the execution, which took place at 8 a.m). On Monday there was continuous preaching at four stations for nearly two hours. The principal one was in front of the drop, and consequently in the centre of the vast crowd, which numbered at least 15,000 persons. Many were under the influence of drink, and some laughed and joked while the most solemn things were being spoken, uttering mock "amens" while prayer was being offered for the poor culprit; but the majority lent at least the outward ear, and some were moved to tears."

In "The Open-Air Preacher's Handbook,"† Mr. Kirkham gathered up the lessons of his long and rich experience for the encouragement and guidance of younger brethren. He toiled incessantly to the last, almost his last words, prior to his departure to be with Christ, on May 8, 1892, being: "Won't you go and tell the heathen of Jesus?"

THE MISSION AS IT IS.

"God buries his workmen, but carries on his work." Mr. Kirkham's manifold duties were taken up by his close friend and coadjutor, Mr. Frank Cockrem, and the work has steadily gone forward, in spite of occasional limitations caused by an insufficiency of financial support. Like his esteemed predecessor, Mr. Cockrem has made valuable contributions to the literature of evangelism. His "Highway Witnessing"‡ is, in the words of Rev. F. B. Meyer, "an admirable compendium of valuable suggestions for open-air preaching." A summary of the Mission's operations for the year 1901 shows that vast numbers of people heard the Gospel at such gatherings as race meetings, athletic sports, fairs, and the like, while considerably over a million books and tracts were distributed. At Great Yarmouth, the Corporation lend the "Singers' Ring"—an open-air concert arena holding 1,500 people—year after year. Here audiences aggregating 2,500 gathered each Lord's Day, and at these services scarcely a day passed without definite spiritual blessing being vouchsafed. The number of converts gathered in at seaside resorts during the season was very large. The "Village Evangelization Tours," organized some years ago, have been wonderfully helpful. Four or six evangelists are sent out in company; they make a central village or small town their headquarters, and visit "all the region round about," day after day, by conveyance or on foot, speaking and singing, visiting the people in their homes, and distributing religious literature.

JUBILEE YEAR.

Ever eager to utilize fresh opportunities, and to meet new demands, Mr. Cockrem, the energetic secretary of the Mission, arranged, at the outbreak of the war, for the regular visitation of troopships sailing from the port of London. By personal dealing and the distribution of Gospel literature, many of the soldiery have been impressed.

In these and all other operations the committee (of which Lieut.-Colonel Mackinley is honorary secretary) employ a small regular staff of evangelists, while many others are occasionally used as opportunity offers and as funds permit, and a number of friends give their services voluntarily. As "the handmaid of the churches," the Society gladly responds to applications from the clergy, ministers, and superintendents of missions, by sending qualified evangelists into their districts to conduct missions and hold special services.

The Society is about to commence its jubilee year of work, and it is, therefore, specially fitting, while we contemplate its useful career, that Christian people should be reminded of its spiritual vigour, its high aim, the wisdom of its direction, and the far-reaching character of its operations. Well may the Bishop of Durham say that: "The Open-Air Mission is doing a wisely-planned and devoted work. Its evangelists, chosen for their spiritual reality and their practical capacity, and trained for the specialities of their enterprise, visit all accessible places of resort where the eternal truth of Christ for sinners may be proclaimed by living messengers and witnesses. Never was there so great a need of the work of the Mission, a work carried on in full fidelity to its first traditions of pure, simple, living Gospel truth." The address of the Mission is, 11, Adam Street, Strand, W.C.

The Monro Medical Mission, Bengal, India.

I AM not sure that the unique Mission here described, carried on by the members of one devoted family, has previously been designated as above, but I can think of no fitter name.

In a sub-division of the district of Nuddea, in the Lower Provinces of Bengal, about forty-five miles from Calcutta, lies the little town of Ranaghat. In it are the headquarters of the Medical Mission, established in 1893 by Mr. James Monro, C.B., a retired member of the Bengal Civil Service, and whom many of our readers will remember as Chief Commissioner of Police in 1889—90.

While Mr. Monro was in the service of the Government during more than a quarter of a century, both he and Mrs. Monro were deeply impressed with the need for mission work among the dense population of Bengal (seventy-four millions), and gradually the members of their family resolved to join their parents in carrying the message of salvation to as many people as could be reached by them every year.

Others have joined since, but not all were able to stand the climate. This involved a decrease of the staff, the more to be regretted, as the opportunities are vast and increasing.

The object of the Mission is to carry out, so far as within the power of the missionaries, the last command of the Lord Jesus Christ, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature." The method is that adopted by our Lord Himself, who "went about all the cities and villages, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the Gospel of the Kingdom, and healing all manner of sickness, and all manner of disease;" and who, in sending forth his disciples, commanded them "to preach the Kingdom of God, and to heal the sick."

With this object in view, a dispensary was established at Ranaghat, followed by the opening of three branch stations. Up to the end of 1901 the attendances at all these places exceeded 390,000 persons, and the number of villages from which patients had been received amounted to 2,906.

In addition to the systematic evangelizing of the town of Ranaghat and its immediate neighbourhood at all seasons of the year, as many villages as can be reached within the four months of cooler weather are visited by members of the staff. Medical work is carried on in camp, and nearly 50,000 had been reached in this way, as well as by visits in the villages, magic lanterns, &c.

During our stay at Darjeeling we called upon Mrs. Monro, to whom for some time past has been allotted the ministry of suffering and prayer. We were agreeably surprised to find Mr. Monro also at home. What he told us about the marvellous progress of his mission, only handicapped by want of workers and funds adequate to the need, made us desire to see something of it ourselves.

As through the building of new hospital premises at Ranaghat the work there was brought to a comparative standstill, for the time being, it was arranged that we should visit one of the branch dispensaries, Kaligunge. We reached the little village close to the Ganges one Thursday afternoon.

The Mission compound contains several buildings of the simplest structure, as can be seen from the accompanying pictures. One of them shows the dispensary and the women's shed. A similar shed for men is on the other side of the dispensary. Two small bungalows for the staff, with canvas ceilings and canvas partition walls, and a few tents, serve the purpose required.

Though on our arrival it was but four o'clock in the afternoon, a number of men and women had already assembled for the following day. Patients come sometimes from a distance of fifty miles. Some of them had never seen a European before, and in their minds a white face and a sun-topee are closely associated with a doctor. Those who come the day before, sleep on the premises, and are preached to in the evening. After the meeting they receive tickets entitling them to be among the first received by the doctors. To preserve order and to teach the people some notions of time, no patient is admitted after a certain hour in the morning.

As a very small proportion of the village population can read (only four women in a thousand), pictures are a great help in conveying the Gospel truth to a people who in many respects resemble children. As soon as it was sufficiently dark, Dr. (Miss) M. H. Simson and Miss R. A. Brown preached alternately to a gathering of over 300 people, illustrating what they said by means of good lantern slides. Dr. Simson has a particularly musical voice, and speaks Bengali with the fluency of her own language. When she began to sing, every noise and murmur ceased, and under the starlit sky was a most attentive audience. Now and then a groan was heard, maybe from some little patient, or the hush or whisper of a mother's voice broke into the stillness while the glad tidings were proclaimed. "Which do you think is the better Gospel method, this or Divine healing?" asked a friend afterwards of Dr. Simson. Without a moment's hesitation, she replied: "Why, this is Divine healing. We know that God alone can convert a sinner, but it is generally through means, such as a book, a word spoken in due season, the sermon of some preacher, or a living example, that the conscience is stirred and brought into exercise. The same is the case with the doctor in relation to the sick. We are but the instruments, God alone is the Healer."

Early the next morning Miss Monro, with her brother, Dr. Charles G. Monro, came over from Ranaghat, a distance of twelve miles, and the work began at 6 a.m. At breakfast we were joined by Rev. W. D. Monro, coming from some other direction. More than three hours of arduous work required some relaxation, and the talk ran upon a civilized leopard, living in close proximity to the "Padre's" tent, and apparently so familiar with mankind's tricks that nothing would induce him to fall into a pit or to be caught in a trap set for him. To show his contempt he would retaliate by carrying off the Padre's dog from a near enclosure. Means and ways were devised how to get the better of the cunning four-footer. We hope that by this time man has proved the victor.

THE MEN'S VERANDAH.

DISTRIBUTING TICKETS.

Duty calls, and the staff disperses. The clergyman is to preach to the men who arrived during the night. I accompany Miss Monro to the verandah, adjoining the dispensary, where a few hundreds of women are closely packed together. Miss Monro sings and speaks to them for a whole hour, and from the pictures shown I know that it is about the Serpent in the Wilderness and Christ on the cross. The faces of the audience show keen attention. Some make assenting movements with their chin or knit their brows; others ejaculate or repeat the last word of a sentence, as little ones do when they are beginning to speak. Others again sit motionless, with their eyes riveted upon the speaker.

At the close, Miss Monro offers various little booklets for sale, such as the Story of the Life of Jesus, Gospel songs, and religious tracts; several avail themselves of the opportunity. The price is simply nominal. At first this literature used to be given away; but it was found that things purchased had much more value for the recipients than free gifts. Several thousands of such booklets have been thus disposed of.

Those who have heard the Gospel are now free to see the doctor, while the latest arrivals are addressed last by one of the native Bible women who help in the Mission.

A thousand patients and upwards on a dispensing day is not an abnormal number at Kaligunge. How can two doctors and a few helpers manage so many?

Firstly, because most of the diseases are malarial cases, all requiring the same treatment. In others the doctor does not need to make long inquiries as to the history of the patients. They all live in surroundings and circumstances analogous to each other, and what applies to one generally applies to another. Besides, every provision is made beforehand to simplify the work, and to have it done quickly. Each prescription paper, handed to the patient, must be kept in a little piece of bamboo reed, and brought back with the medicine bottle, otherwise a fine of one pice (a farthing) must be paid. This seems little, but is enough to make the natives, Mohammedans as well as Hindus, careful. Each prescription has on its back page a tract to the effect that the doctor often heals the body, but that he is unable to free the soul from sin.

Cases requiring operation or lengthened treatment, are admitted, as far as space permits, into the hospitals at Ranaghat. At present, however, no in-patients can be taken until the new buildings are completed. While the dispensaries are supported almost entirely by the Mission staff, the number of hospital beds kept open depends upon the support of the friends of the Mission. During three years, ending with 1900, treatment was given to above 1,800 in-patients.

The Gospel is making its way slowly but surely. There is a small community of Christians at Ranaghat, whose children are carefully taught in the Word of God. A school has been opened for them and others.

To give an instance of the far-reaching influence of the spoken Word, a child on one occasion was brought to the dispensary bearing the extraordinary name of Jesu-bála, bála being a feminine affix, and meaning Jesu's-girl. On the mother being asked why she had given to the child a name which indicated that she belonged to Jesus, she said that they had heard of the blessed work done at Ranaghat in the name of Jesus and had named the child after Him.

One striking feature of this Mission is that it was a private enterprise which almost against the will of its initiators, grew so rapidly, and into such dimensions, that the founders are no longer able to carry it on fully without outside help. Another is the uncommon fact of a whole family spontaneously and unitedly devoting their various gifts to the Lord's work. This is an object-lesson to us all, and an appeal to young men and women, full of energy, and, perhaps, ambitious dreams for the future, to whom the voice of Jesus is saying: "Come, follow Me." Riots in Belgium.—The age-long conflict between Clericalism and popular government has resulted in terrible and fatal riots in Belgium, where the alternatives appear to be superstition on the one hand, and Atheism on the other. The via media of the Evangelical faith seems almost unknown. And yet what Belgium needs is the Gospel of the Evangelists and the Epistles. It is the salvation of peoples as well as individuals—the one sure path of peace, contentment, and progress. Romanism always awakens its natural antagonist, unbelief, and out of the fierce strife between these two almost every great social revolution has been born.

Colportage in Hungary.

"THE reception of Christianity by the Servian people took place 1,042 years ago. I mention this with pain," says Colporteur Pavkov, "when I look at the people, and see how little true Christianity is to be found among them. I have often thought—Why is this? After working among the people, for ten years I have come to the conclusion, that the people have little religion among them, not so much because of indifference and an undervaluing of their own spiritual welfare, but because they know not Jesus Christ, nor his Holy Gospel.

"The Bible Society gives attention to the people in spiritual things, distributing Bibles, New Testaments, and portions of Scripture. It is no uncommon thing to find two copies in a house, in a drawer or in the garret, and so covered with dust as to show that they had not been in the hands of people for years. On my putting the question, 'It is a long time, is it not, since you read a portion from the Bible?' I receive such answers as the following: 'I bought the book some years ago, and then I read some parts of it'; or 'I have read through the whole book, and why should I read it again?' When I hear this, I reply, 'No, friend, no, that is not the way, to read through the Bible and then to leave it. You must read some verses or a chapter every day, and learn what need you have of Christ."

The writer of the above lines, being engaged in colportage work, has seen the ruinous consequences of unbelief, as regards both soul and body; and, being himself a Servian by birth, he has endeavoured to get into close contact with the people, and, as far as his duties as colporteur permitted it, to preach to the people Christ crucified. His first concern was to exhibit by example to those around—acquaintances and friends—something of what the life of a true Christian should be. It was then his endeavour, by Bible-readings and religious meetings, to lead the people to the knowledge of Jesus.

The Servian Mission was thus begun, and for ten years now its work has progressed, with the assistance of several Christian friends. The Lord has blessed these efforts. Conversions have taken place, and many have begun to inquire about the Lord Jesus Christ. This Mission requires now much more work than the colporteur can devote to it. Preachers of the Word are wanted to go from village to village and proclaim the Gospel to the people.

A Modern Shadrach.

A TELEGRAM from Madrid, published in the Barcelona daily, El Diluvio (March 29), reads as follows:—"In Santiago (North Spain) proceedings have been instituted against a soldier of the regiment of Zaragoza for a strange act.

"During the celebration of Mass on St. Joseph's Day (March 19, 1902), and at the moment when the music and drums sounded forth the 'Marcha Real' (the Spanish National Anthem, and signal for the adoration of the wafer-god), the soldier in question refused to kneel, paying no heed to the voice of command of his officer. When questioned as to his reasons for such conduct, he replied that he was a Protestant.

"It appears that signatures are being collected for a petition to the Government on behalf of this soldier, whom it was attempted to compel to perform an act contrary to his religion."

We have been informed by a Spanish ex-army-priest that, according to the regulations of the service in this unfortunate country, none but the Roman Catholic religion is tolerated in the army, and all soldiers are forced to conform to it. In the regimental register the usual vacant spaces are left for items relating to age, height, ability to read and write, and so forth, but in the matter of religion the conscript has no option; the words Roman Catholic are already filled in in printed characters! Thanks to the retrograde influence of that religion the majority of the soldiers will have to reply negatively to the queries as to ability to read and write. But that matters not—the one indispensable point is that they shall be Roman Catholics. The officer in command of a regiment would, therefore, be compelled to enforce obedience in such a case as the one in point, whatever his own feelings or inclinations in the matter. E. L.

Morocco and its Reforms.

FOR the past three months we have had His Shereefian Majesty the Sultan of Morocco and his court at Rabat. Much has been written regarding the young Emperor; and from all we have seen and heard, I believe he has the welfare of his subjects and country at heart. Reforms, however, are not so easy after hundreds of years of misrule and oppression; but efforts are being made.

In the new Shereefian order for a regular system of taxation among the tribes (instead of as in former years, when there was only a system of robbery by the local governors) many see the inauguration of a better state of things.

The Sultan has made all his ministers swear on the Koran that they will act justly towards their fellow-subjects, and loyally to His Majesty. Striking reforms have been made in the army. The soldiers are now better paid, and very well clad, and instead of a disorderly rabble, you have now a well-disciplined army; much credit being due to the Minister of War and an English officer, who is in charge of the troops.

At present Morocco is marvellously open for presenting the claims of the Gospel, and no direct opposition from the government to the work which is here carried on. Yet, alas! we have to cry, like the prophet of old, "Who hath believed our report, and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?" We feel it needs great wisdom and more earnest devotion in the Master's service, not knowing how long such favourable opportunities may last. Among the soldiers and those following the Sultan's court we have had a delightful time; when much good seed has been sown and God's word circulated. Oh, that Ishmael might live before Thee!

Our hon. sec., Mr. Grahame Wilson, 191, Meadow Park Street, Glasgow, will be pleased to communcate with any interested in Morocco.

Fire at an Armenian Orphanage.

FRIENDS of Miss Salmond's work in Armenia will learn with sorrowful interest that the news of the sudden death of Mrs. Lee, the American missionary, who started the orphan and industrial work at Marash, has been followed by tidings of another serious loss which has befallen the Mission.

On January 31, the workers were startled by the cry, "Ebenezer is on fire!" and it was found that the largest orphanage at Marash, which housed 129 boys, was in flames. Turkish officers, native pastors, the French Consul, merchants, and neighbours made strenuous efforts to save the building, which, fortunately, was only partially destroyed. The loss, however, is great, as all the looms and thread of the boys have gone, as well as the boots and shoes which they had been making during the preceding months. From the bakery, where the fire originated, and which was totally destroyed, all the orphanages and mission houses were supplied with bread.

Miss Salmond writes:—"My heart is nigh breaking as I write all this, and coming on the top of our other loss it is hard. Only God's grace can sustain at such a time. The sympathy and help has been sweet." The loss is estimated at £200. Miss Salmond is cheered and encouraged by the hearty way in which the lads are undertaking the work of rebuilding—digging, carrying stones, &c., showing how dearly they love the house. Communications relating to the work in Armenia may be addressed to Miss E. Cantlow, secretary of "Friends of Armenia," 47, Victoria Street, Westminster, S.W.

Health Lectures for Missionaries.—Missionaries who are anxious to obtain information as to the preservation of health in tropical countries cannot do better than attend a special course of eight lectures, to be given by Dr. Harford-Battersby (principal) at Livingstone College, May 13-16. The subjects are:—"Clothing. The Prevention of Malaria. Food. Malaria. Water. Bowel Complaints. Medicines. Notes on other Tropical Diseases." Further particulars may be learned on application.—Address Livingstone College, Leyton, E.

"Catholic Evidences."

A COURSE of "Catholic Evidence" lectures was delivered recently at the Assembly Rooms, Balham. The last was given by Rev. Basil W. Maturin, on "Some Misunderstandings about Rome," when the hall was well filled with people, and much interest was manifested.

For the first twenty minutes Mr. Maturin (a seceder from the Church of England) dealt in generalities, and in a way that commanded general assent; his manner was vivacious and witty, and it is no exaggeration to say that he kept his audience in roars of laughter.

The purport of the argumentative part (during which the audience were more sober) was that ignorance is at the bottom of the opposition to, and condemnation of the Church of Rome; that those who denounce Rome know nothing whatever about her creeds and their working.

ROMISH IGNORANCE.

This "argument" must have amused those who have heard (or read) Miss Cusack, Miss O'Gorman, Pastor Chiniquy, Rev. Thos. Connellan, Pastor Sylva, or some other of the numerous seceders from Rome, some of whom had the experience of a lifetime in the Church of Rome. It is not many weeks since Pastor Sylva, once a priest in the Church of Rome, now a pastor in the Waldensian Church of Italy, preached at St. Peter's Church in this neighbourhood, and told us of the appalling ignorance of Roman Catholic priests in Italy. One of these ridiculed Pastor Sylva for reading an Italian Bible, "because," he argued, "the only Bible of great authority was the Latin one, which Christ himself wrote!" Another told Mr. Sylva that he could not understand how Protestants could believe in the Trinity and not worship the Virgin Mary, "for the Holy Trinity," said he, "consists of the Father, the Son, and the Virgin Mary!"

Nor is such appalling ignorance confined to Italy. Within the last month or two I myself was talking to a young Englishman, a Roman Catholic of good social rank. This young man had never heard of the Vulgate, the only translation of the Scriptures which Rome regards as authoritative. He also told me of some arguments which he had heard Freethinkers urge. "For instance," he said, "they say that Job could not have been swallowed by a whale." "Job?" I exclaimed. "Yes," he said. "Doesn't the Bible say that Job was swallowed by a whale?" "Jonah, you mean," I said. "Well," he replied, "Jonah or Job, I don't know which."

"LEARNED" ERRORS.

Mr. Maturin was introduced to the audience as "a learned man," and doubtless he is so; but one might be pardoned for thinking that (like Chaucer's clerk, of Oxford), "his studie was but littel on the Bible," for he told us that Scripture said, "Except ye be baptized of water and the Spirit ye cannot enter into the kingdom of God." Again, speaking of the Apostles, he said the people of Athens exclaimed, "These that have turned the world upside down are come hither." And he wound up with the following misquotation: "I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that He is able to present you faultless before the presence of his glory." If Mr. Maturin had known his Bible a little better, he would probably never have joined the Church of Rome.

QUESTION AND ANSWER.

The most interesting part of the evening was, perhaps, the answering of questions, which were invited to be sent up (in writing). The replies of the chairman (Rev. J. V. Warwick) were, however, so exceedingly diffuse and redundant that there was only time to answer a small proportion of the whole. I sent up six, but none of them were noticed.

The nature of the answers may be judged from the following: St. Paul, writing to Timothy, said that in the latter days some would depart from the faith, "forbidding to marry," and commanding "to abstain from meats." Mr. Maturin smiled as he replied. that our Lord fasted, and said, moreover, that the days would come when the Bridegroom should be taken away, and "then should they fast in those days." Of course, it was pointed out to Mr. Maturin that it was not a question of fasting (or abstaining from all food), but of commanding to abstain from meats—just what the Church of Rome does. To this the lecturer's answer was that he "could not see any difficulty;" in fact, he thought the objection was "an absurd one."

To the question of transubstantiation the usual answer was given: "Christ (in St. John vi.) told the Jews that in order to have everlasting life, they must eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood. When they heard that they said, 'This is an hard saying,' and, moreover, 'many went back and walked no more with Him.' If Christ meant it figuratively, would He not have disabused their minds of their delusion?" Mr. Warwick (the chairman) did not refer to v. 63 in the same chapter: "It is the Spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing. The WORDS that I speak unto you, THEY are Spirit and they are life."

Mr. Maturin said that Rome had "chapter and verse for every one of her creeds and practices." But he did not give us the chapter or verse for purgatory, the adoration of saints, auricular confession, prayers for the dead, or the "daily sacrifice of our Lord's body in the Mass."

What do the People Read?

OF all the questions needing to be dealt with at the present time, probably none appeals to the Christian conscience with more urgency than the one—What are the people reading? or, What can be done to encourage and meet an appetite for pure and helpful literature? The Pure Literature Society seeks to deal with these questions in an eminently practical manner. It endeavours to supplant injurious literature, and to promote the issue of that which is sound and wholesome.

The extent and progress of the Society's work in this direction are shown by the fact that it has granted books to the value of £75,884 to 9,495 libraries throughout the United Kingdom; 33,823 newsvendors' shops have been visited in the lowest parts of all our great cities and towns, with encouraging success in procuring the substitution of wholesome publications for those which are trashy and injurious.

Free grants to sailors' libraries have been made to the extent of £1,038, and upwards of one hundred magazine associations are being worked efficiently in town and country. In these and other directions the Society has distinguished itself for forty-eight years in a vigorous crusade against injurious reading, at the same time recognising that the most effective way to overcome the evil of pernicious literature is to place in the hands of the rising generation healthy periodicals which combine literary ability and artistic illustration.

While so much has been done to combat one of the greatest evils of our time, there is abundant scope for further development of the Society's work, commending itself as it does to all who have at heart the interests of the Kingdom of God and the upbuilding of the national character. The secretary is Mr. Richard Turner, 11, Buckingham Street, Adelphi, Strand, W.C.

Wandsbek Conference.—The annual Whitsun Convention for the deepening of spiritual life will take place on May 20-24, here in Wandsbek. Rev. F. S. Webster has again consented to attend as a deputation from the Keswick Committee. On Tuesday, May 20, there will be a gathering of the members of the Christian Endeavour Societies, and on the three following days there will be three meetings daily. The subject that will be treated is—"What Christ is to his own people" (1 Cor. i. 30)—Justification, Sanctification, Redemption. We are very grateful for the blessings the Lord has given us in past conventions. He will, however, be entreated by his people, and therefore we ask the prayers of all those who are waiting and preparing for the coming King.—(Rev.) D. H. DOLMAN, Wandsbek, Bärenallee, 5 and 6.

"Wanted—Men."

THE paper by Mr. Horsburgh in a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN was of much interest. There are doubtless many churches which have liberally supplied funds for mission work, but which have sadly failed in sending forth workers from their midst. It would be very interesting if you could publish lists of churches from time to time setting forth a few details of each, such as the following:—

1. The average number of members for ten years.
2. The number of workers, men and women, who have gone forth from the church into the regions beyond during the past ten years.
3. Also the number of those who went forth the previous ten years.
4. The average annual number of meetings in connection with foreign missions during the past ten years.

Such and similar statistics might provoke to zeal and energy some individuals, as well as a few churches which hitherto have been negligent in thrusting out labourers.

There are churches which place in a prominent position in the building they occupy the names and addresses of those who have become their representatives in the mission field, and thus the members are reminded of them, and are stimulated to pray and care for them.

SUBJECTS FOR PRAYER.

Earnest prayers should be made that the Holy Spirit may call many unto the work, and that He and the churches may send forth such labourers. The Holy Spirit will not call novices. He is greatly hindered in training workers under the present system of deputing all the work of evangelization, ministry of the Word, &c., to one, or at most three or four persons in a congregation. Ever church should be a school of the prophets, and at least one-twelfth of the members, and not, as at present is the case, less than one-hundredth, should be active winners of souls for the Master.

I think I could name some assemblies of God's people where recently a tithe, and in some instances more than a tithe, are engaged in various forms of evangelistic ministry. On the other hand, are there not congregations where, if the minister should be unable to take his usual place, a difficulty would be found in filling it for even one Sunday from those whose names are on the roll of membership? The minister has preached for years to those who have been truly termed sponges, whose capacities for absorption are great, but who never give out anything unless they are well squeezed. Faults probably lie equally in the pews and in the pulpits. Let both zealously and harmoniously work together in the power of the Holy Spirit, with a view to train and thrust forth servants fit for the Master's use.

AN ENCOURAGING VIEW.

We have to thank God that during the past century He has raised up various agencies, whereby workers have been encouraged and trained. Amongst them may be mentioned the Y.M.C.A., Y.W.C.A., the Children's Special Service Mission, the so-called "Brethren," the Salvation and Church Armies, some of the Methodist bodies, &c.

The true education and training of the servants of God is sadly neglected. Much reformation is needed in the teaching at our schools of divinity. Our universities are sending forth many Pharisees and Sadducees, but where are the successors of the Apostles of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ? May you and others provoke many unto love and good works.

Let at least one out of the twelve tribes be wholly given to the service of the Lord, and let all his people bring every one of the tithes (R.V. the whole tithe), as well as the first fruits of all the increase into the storehouse, and then we may be sure that the Lord of Hosts will be as true as his word; He will pour us out a blessing that there shall not be room enough to receive it. Then we shall not hear the bitter cry of many a true missionary, "We need more help and helpers; the labourers are all too few."

A Little Convert's Victory.

By Miss A. M. Case.

"I BELIEVE Menana does really love Jesus," said a missionary to me the other day. "Suppose you ask her some questions this evening; her mother and the other people in the house want to see you. Let us pay them a visit, and then you will have an opportunity of talking to her."

Naturally, these words made me quite eager to see Menana. God loves 150,000 people in Tunis, but I am afraid there are not many of them who truly love Him back again. Thousands pretend to respect and obey Him, and they often "say their prayers," but secretly they act very wickedly, which shows that there is no love in their hearts. Besides, they displease God in the most important thing of all, which is, the way they treat the Lord Jesus Christ. He says, "I am the Way; no man cometh unto the Father but by Me," but these poor deceived people make Him a liar, for some say they can go to God through Mohammed; others say Moses is good enough for them; and the rest either try to get to heaven through the Virgin Mary, or else they declare that they are so good they don't need anyone's help at all.

You see, therefore, that when we hear of a man, woman, or child who loves Jesus, it is very natural that we few Christians should be greatly delighted, and should wish to see our brother or sister in Christ.

Menana lives quite close to us, in the narrow, winding lane which the Arabs call an Impasse. After tea we ran along to her house and knocked; and in a minute or two we were seated in a room, lighted by a wick in oil, placed in a tall, thin lamp-stand. Two or three women soon gathered around us, and Menana's mother insisted upon making us a cup of black coffee, which was sweet and rather nice, though it was without milk, and contained all the grains.

In the midst of the talk I spoke to Menana.

"Do you know why we come here, Menana?"

"Yes" she replied, "to tell us about the Lord Jesus."

"Do you love Jesus?" Yes, she said she did, like ourselves.

"Why do you love Him? Has He done anything for you?" "He died for me!"

A few months ago this Arab girl had never heard of Jesus. She had not been taught much religion at all, because the Mohammedans say that women have no souls, so they need not learn even to read; but the few ideas she had picked up from hearing people talk were all about the false prophet Mohammed, who lived in Arabia 1,300 years ago. She did not know that God was the Father of the Lord Jesus; nor that Christ had died and risen again; and she had never been told that Jesus says to poor sinners, "Come unto Me, and I will give you rest."

All this and many beautiful New Testament stories the missionary lady has taught her during the short time since she came to live near Menana in the Impasse. Now the girl of fourteen knows more than her mother.

Menana has to be married soon, poor child! She has never seen her future husband—a boy of about her own age; but in a couple of days there is to be a feast at her home, when money is to be paid for her as though she were a cow or a horse; and then for the first time she will see her mother-in-law.

Yesterday, Miss G—— heard Menana asking her mother to get tables for the grand feast next Monday. "No," said the lady; "if we have tables we must get chairs, and it will be far better to sit on the ground, as we always do, to eat."

But Menana had set her heart on having a change for her visitors, and she grew angry. Her hot spirit forgot the lowly meekness of Jesus, and she spoke rudely to her mother. "Oh, Menana," said Miss G., "I thought Jesus was ruling in your heart, but this is Satan getting the victory; don't let him reign over you. Please Jesus again by going and telling your mother that you are sorry."

At first Menana would not. There was evidently a struggle going on in her heart between the One whom we want her to follow as Lord, and his enemy, the old master. Her breast heaved; her face grew dark and light by turns. At last, what joy! Jesus conquered!

"Mother, pardon me," said Menana, with her arms around her neck.

A few minutes before the mother had felt so troubled and so vexed with her daughter that she said to Miss G., "I don't mind how soon Menana leaves me. I wish she were married already." But now she turned to God's servant, the peacemaker, and exclaimed, "How good you are! Oh, I do love my child!"

Menana has had the joy of gaining this one victory, at least, over Satan. Oh, that it may not be this one only! May she go on to greater triumphs still, and may you and I, dear little friends, learn from this child (who, compared with ourselves, has been taught so little of Jesus) daily, hourly, to gain the victory.

25th Prize Competition.

January to April.

RULES.

☞ Will parents and teachers kindly see that each of the following rules is strictly observed, especially Nos. 5, 7 and 10? The only help permitted is to explain the meaning of the rules or questions, if necessary.

1. Only those may enter whose names appear in the list below as having been right twelve times out of sixteen.
2. Competitors will be divided into Four Divisions:—
   I. Those under ten years of age.
   II. Those over ten and under thirteen.
   III. Those over thirteen and under fifteen.
   IV. Those between fifteen and eighteen.
3. Write outside your envelope in large letters the words "Prize Competition," and the Number of the Division to which you belong; and address it to "Uncle Tom," as usual.
4. At the top of your paper write very clearly your Division, your Full Name and Address, and Age last birthday.
5. The questions must be answered in the Right Order. The answers must be written on either Foolscap or Quarto size sheets, and on one side of the paper only. Number your Answers exactly to correspond with the questions.
6. Every paper must be signed by a parent or teacher to testify that Rule 7 has been observed.
7. No Concordance and no help allowed; only the use of a Reference Bible. ☞ Competitors must not help each other.
8. The last day for answers to reach the office is Wednesday, May 7. The results will be announced on May 15.
9. Marks will be given for accuracy, neatness, writing, spelling, &c., the rewards being: First Prize, Second Prize, First Certificate, and Second Certificate.
10. Chapter and Verse must be given wherever possible.
11. Those who cannot do all the questions set for their division must do as many as they can, and will receive marks accordingly. No papers can be re-examined. And don't forget Rule 5!

☞ Any seniors who are over Eighteen years of age may do the Competition, and have their names included in the lists, but will not be eligible for the prizes.

Personalia.

Mr. John Elliott, the well-known evangelist, of Torquay, continues in a low condition of health. In addition to the painful malady from which he has been suffering, he is now afflicted with influenza and an ulcerated throat.

Abbe Corneloup, of the Work among Converted French Priests, hopes to visit England in June. After addressing meetings which Rev. J. J. Luce, of Gloucester, is arranging for him at Malvern, Cheltenham, Hereford, Birmingham, and elsewhere, he will be in and near London from June 11 till about the 21st. The hon. secretary for England is Mr. W. F. Hathaway, Pewsey, Marlborough, Wiltshire, who will be glad to correspond with friends who may wish to arrange meetings in aid.

The Bishop of Durham, writing from Cannes, on April 14, says:—"I have just seen your issue of April 10, and find a kind notice of my absence from home for a short stay on the Riviera. I venture to trouble you with a correction of the statement that 'overstrain' has anything to do with my journey south. I am here solely in order to spend a short time with invalids very dear to me, and possibly to escort them back to England. By God's goodness my own health is sound, though I suffered somewhat from cold a fortnight ago." We are glad to insert this correction of a report which "went the round of the press" before we gave it currency.

The Church at Antioch in Syria (Acts xi. 19-30).
Golden Text: Acts xi. 21.

DEVELOPMENT, advancement, are the key words to the book of the Acts of the Apostles, and specially to the subject of to-day's lesson. The glorious Gospel of Christ had rolled onward like a mountain torrent, filling and overflowing the channel-bed of Jewry till it reached Antioch; and there, where the floodgate of the Gentiles was thrown open wide before it, Christendom came into being, and took name, and the command, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature," echoed forth with renewed power.

God works out his purposes not only in spite of, but even by means of, the opposition of the powers of evil. Persecution at the time of Stephen had driven the disciples as far even as Antioch in Syria. Thus and then the Gospel was introduced into that great centre of heathendom.

Antioch in Syria.—"The Queen of the East," the third city of the Roman Empire, having a vast population representative of all the nationalities of the known world, was engrossed in commerce and steeped in heathen superstition. Into this pagan city a few persecuted believers entered, possibly unobserved; but the handful of salt soon made its presence felt. That little company was altogether unlike the citizens of Antioch in principle, life, and conversation. They lived not for pleasure, but for One whom they called "the Christ," and his kingdom, for eternity more than for time, for the soul more than the body, pure lives and holy. Christ their Saviour, Christ in their hearts, homes, lives, and worship. They were "a peculiar people," and the men of Antioch "called them Christians"—(Antioch was famous in all antiquity for the manufacture of nicknames). The Jews had called them "Nazarenes." They had called themselves "believers," "brethren," "saints."

Can I Call Myself a Christian?

S Am I trusting in Jesus? (John iii. 36; Rom. x. 9.)
I Have I the witness of the Spirit? (Rom. viii. 16.)
G Am I led by the Spirit? (Rom. viii. 14.)
N Can I cry "Abba, Father"? (Gal. iv. 6.)
S Do I love all who love Jesus? (1 John iv. 7, 8.)

If I bear the same name as the Christians in Antioch, am I living the Christ-life among my companions as they did, so that "many turn to the Lord" (v. 21)?

Christ's I am,
His blood redeemed me:
Righteous now "in Him" I stand.
I in his love He's pledged to keep me,
Safe in God the Father's hand.
'Tis his Name is named upon me;
In his ranks I fain would prove
All the power that Name can give me,
Name of Jesus! Name of love!
Sinners, saved by grace.

Practical Christianity.

1. The fugitive disciples lived such pure and holy lives in Antioch as to commend their Master to the heathen around, so that many "turned to the Lord" (Phil. ii. 15).

2. Believers at Jerusalem showed practical sympathy to the infant Church at Antioch by sending an eminently suitable helper, for Barnabas was (a) a native of Cyprus, and probably was acquainted with many who had gone thence to Antioch (v. 20); (b) could speak Greek, the universal language; (c) knew Antioch well; (d) was liberal-minded and sympathetic, (did not look for and find faults in the young converts, but encouraged, rejoiced, and advised with them helpfully); (e) had the rare talent, and used it, of finding out the power for work in another believer, and harnessing him to the service of the Church (see Acts ix. 27, and xi. 25, 27).

3. The Church at Antioch sent practical help to the mother Church at the time of the dearth. Barnabas may have suggested that; he acted in like spirit long before (iv. 36).

4. Barnabas and Saul worked together in unity and love (Rom. xii. 10).

Results.

1. The kingdom of Christ established in the heart of heathendom.

2. A Church founded which could send forth men to the ends of the earth.

3. A new name given to believers because their lives witnessed for Christ.

Illustration.

As a railway train was sweeping rapidly down a steep curve in a narrow cutting, the driver was horrified to see a little girl playing with her baby-brother right on the track of the engine. The shriek of the whistle started the little girl; in a moment the train would be on them. Quickly she grasped the little one, and thrust him into a niche, left by blasting in the side rock, and herself sprang to the other side of the track. But the passengers could hear a clear, shrill voice calling across the rails, "Cling close to the rock, Johnny—cling close to the rock, Johnny!" And the little lad snuggled his head in as closely to the riven rock as possible, while the terrible cars whirred past him, and thus he was saved.

A few hours later the train stopped at the next station, and an old man got out, leaving his young son in the car. The father had come as far as he could with his boy, who was going into a distant city to make his first start in life. Their hands were clasped in the farewell grip, while harassing thoughts filled the old man's mind as he remembered the temptations which had beset his own path in early life, and tears choked his utterance as he wrung the hand of his child. "Cling close to the Rock, my boy—cling close to the Rock!" The Lord Jehovah is the Rock of Ages (Is. xxvi. 4, marg.).

Oxford Notes.

Rev. F. W. Hinton, M.A., scholar of St. John's College, Oxford, and curate of St. Peter-le-Bailey, Oxford, has been accepted for service by the Church Missionary Society.

The Congregationalists of Summer Town Church have unanimously invited Rev. Arthur S. Welch, M.A., co-pastor of the Shanklin Church, Isle of Wight, to the vacant pastorate in North Oxford. Mr. Welch has accepted the invitation.

The approaching removal of Rev. the Hon. W. Talbot Rice, M.A., from Oxford, will be a great loss both to the University and city. The new vicar of Swansea, during the nine years he has been rector of St. Peter-le-Bailey, has endeared himself to all sections of the church. His thorough preaching, keen missionary zeal, and willingness to serve have won for him many friends in Oxford. He hopes to commence his new duties in June.

Welsh Notes.

A Welsh philanthropist has announced his intention of presenting his native village of Newborough in Anglesea with a public hall, a library, coffee-house, and clock-tower. He is also going to build six houses for aged people. The total cost of the gift will be over £4,500.

The Free Church Council of Denbigh has taken a step which might well be imitated throughout the country. Under its auspices the first of a series of united "fellowship" meetings has been held. The subject discussed was "The Keeping of the Sabbath." Meetings of a similar nature are to be held every three months.

A signal victory for those who are opposed to Sunday labour has been won at Cardiff. At a meeting of the Town Council last week a motion to run tram cars between 12.30 p.m. and 10 p.m. on Sundays was defeated. The presence of a deputation of 100 members of the Free Churches of the town was not without influence in bringing about this desirable result.

An important Temperance Conference was held at Pontypridd on last Thursday, the special speakers were the Dean of Hereford and Mr. R. Cameron, M.P. In the course of an address the Dean said that the temperance party were too apt to lay all the blame for the curse of intemperance on Parliament. It was greatly due, he declared, to want of sympathy, he might say cowardice, on the part of a great number of workers in the church—clergy, ministers of all denominations, deacons, and others.

Christian Endeavour Topic.—In consequence of the topic for the week beginning April 13 having been inadvertently omitted, our Christian Endeavour expositions have got a week ahead. The subject for next week was dealt with in our last issue (April 17).

Drink in Hampshire.—The action of the Farnham justices referred to in a recent "Note and Comment" is being followed in Hampshire, in which county the justices, at the instigation of Mr. Shaw Lefevre, have called for detailed returns of the population in each district, and the number of public-houses and beershops. The object is obvious, as Mr. Shaw Lefevre has stated that he has found a large excess of public-houses throughout the county beyond all possible requirements of the people, and that of late years a large number of the houses have become the property of a small circle of brewers, who have established a virtual monopoly. There are 3,000 public-houses with "on" licences in Hampshire, and therefore there is one public-house for every fifty-four male adults. No wonder that crime and poverty stalk hand in hand through the country.

The Christian Temperance Campaign.

DUMBARTON.

"THE visit of Rev. Dr. J. Q. A. Henry to Dumbarton," writes Rev. A. S. Inch, of the U.F. High Church, "will be long remembered with deep thankfulness by all friends of the temperance cause. The Mission began on the afternoon of Saturday, 12th inst., with a children's demonstration, presided over by Mr. A. M. Kennedy, chairman of the School Board. A reception meeting in the evening was arranged by the United Temperance Committee and the executive of the B.W.T.A. Mr. Garrick, the chairman of the Parish Council, occupied the chair, and an address of welcome was given by Rev. A. Scott Matheson. Dr. Henry's address made a deep impression; it was eloquent and powerful, and deeply spiritual in tone.

"Dr. Henry had three meeting on the Sabbath. He occupied two of the United Free Church pulpits during the day, and in the evening lectured to a very large congregation in the Parish Church, which is the largest in the town. Rev. A. S. Inch presided. During the week the meetings were held each night in the Parish Church Hall, and were well attended. The respective chairmen were Lord Overtoun, Bailie Miller, Mr. F. Boyd, Revs. A. S. Inch and J. Golder Burns, and the music was supplied by the various church choirs of the town.

"Dr. Henry's addresses were a revelation to most of the people who heard him. Whether he was dealing with the social, physical, industrial, or religious aspects of the temperance question, he was alike powerful, lucid and convincing. His appeals for united action on the part of Christian people were most impressive. The campaign is indeed a Christian Temperance movement, for it is first and dominantly Christian. Christ and the power of his grace are always put in the forefront, and made the basis of all the appeals. Dr. Henry occupies a high platform, but not too high. His outlook is broad, but yet there is no compromise with the enemy. He has certainly given temperance sentiment a "lift" in Dumbarton, for which all temperance reformers thank God.

"The local arrangements were in the hands of Mr. John McNidder, secretary to the United Temperance Committee, who was indefatigable in his exertions, and under whose care everything passed off without a hitch. During the course of the week upwards of 1,400 pledges were taken."

Another correspondent, writing later, says:—"The mission was a most gratifying success, and closed with a splendid meeting. The pledges will total up to more than 1,500. One lady got sixty outside the meetings, a girl fifty, and two boys forty each, in addition to a large number of smaller returns. We gave the children another meeting on Friday afternoon, when over 1,000 were present."

"Dr. Henry's remarkable lecture on 'The Future of the Anglo-Saxon Race' was," a friend writes, "an occasion of much interest, and drew a large and expectant audience. Lord Overtoun, who presided, opened the proceedings with a comprehensive address on the temperance question, which gave evidence of a profound knowledge of the whole question in its bearing on the State, the Church, commerce, and on the moral, social, and spiritual condition of the people.

"Dr. Henry delivered a masterly lecture. At the close Lord Overtoun rose to say that he had seldom listened to an address that had so stirred him, and that was at once so stimulating and suggestive. He (Lord Overtoun) wished that thousands instead of hundreds had been listening to what was one of the ablest addresses he had ever heard."

AIRDRIE.

Rev. Alexander Mann writes:—"Dr. Henry has commenced a seven days' campaign in Airdrie, N.B., in the happiest and most promising circumstances. Airdrie has been the scene of a marvellous temperance awakening, which has now lasted without any intermission for seven months, and which has already produced permanent results not only in the rescue of many victims of drink and in the brightening of their homes, but also in the creation of a new social atmosphere, and in the courageous and faithful action of the bench of magistrates.

"Two meetings were held on Saturday in the Public Hall—one for children in the afternoon, with the Chairman of the School Board presiding, and one for adults in the evening, when Councillor Knox occupied the chair. The former was largely attended; and the latter turned out to be, almost without exception, a meeting of men. Stimulating addresses were delivered by Dr. Henry, which gave those who were present some indication of what was to come. The Lord's Day will never be forgotten by hundreds. At three o'clock in the afternoon the large hall was quite full. For this service the P.S.A., which is worked on purely Gospel lines, gave up its regular meeting and readily assisted, and Rev. Alexander Mann presided. The hall again was filled in the evening, and Hon. Sheriff Adamson took the chair.

"On both occasions Dr. Henry appeared in excellent form. With burning eloquence, with intense earnestness, with a masterly grasp of his subject, and with direct appeal, he simply wrestled with his audience until he completely conquered it. Never before in the history of the town has the duty of the churches been so forcibly expounded; never before has the summons been given to the churches so persuasively to face that duty with courage in the name of Christ. When the pledge boards were sent round there was a ready and general response. Hundreds present had been abstainers for several months, as may be understood from the local circumstances to which we have referred, and although it is not exactly known at the present moment how many new pledges were taken in the two days, the number must be slightly over 300. A thousand at least are expected, and so far as matters have gone, there is every likelihood of this number being reached. It may be added further that the Lord's Day was an exceptionally busy time for Dr. Henry. Besides the two large meetings in the Public Hall, he preached in two of the churches with great acceptance, in the morning to a large audience in the Congregational Church, and in the evening to an equally large congregation in the Wellwynd U.F. Church." The mission is proceeding amid many manifestations of blessing. Particulars of the subsequent meetings will be given next week.

FUTURE MEETINGS.

Till April 25, Airdrie; 26-29, Edinburgh; (26, afternoon, meeting of teachers; evening, Carrubber's Close Mission; 27 (Lord's Day), 3 and 6.30, Synod Hall; 28, Synod Hall, 8 p.m.; 29, Band of Hope Union meeting, the Music Hall); 30, Metropolitan Tabernacle (Baptist Union); May 6, 7, Newmarket; 10-16, Falkirk; 17, Manchester Christian Endeavour Convention; 18-23, Dr. Barnardo's "Edinburgh Castle," Limehouse, E.; 25 (Lord's Day), 11 a.m. Rev. Convention at Liverpool.

FOR many days to come, happy memories will linger in the minds of those who attended this year's Holiness Convention at Hope Hall, Liverpool. Much prayer had been offered for its success, and from the commencement there appeared signs that the Holy Spirit had stirred the minds of many of God's people, and that they had been led to anticipate showers of blessing. Nor did these expectations fall short of fulfilment.

MEMORABLE GATHERINGS.

On each of the four days the capacious hall was well filled, while on the platform were to be seen clergymen, Nonconformist ministers, and many leading laymen. The Convention was under the presidency of Rev. C. Musgrave Brown, M.A., vicar of St. Clement's, and the first day's proceedings commenced with a devotional meeting. Numerous and fervent were the petitions which ascended to the Throne of Grace.

A helpful and practical Bible reading on the Higher Life was given by Miss Bessie Porter, of the South Africa General Mission, which was listened to with eager attention.

In the afternoon Rev. J. J. Luce (Gloucester) based an instructive address on Rom. vi. 1-14, remarking that, while Christians might differ in their opinions concerning the interpretation of the chapter, they must agree that its primary teaching was that deliverance from sin was provided in the death of Jesus Christ. The way to the consecrated life is by crucifixion. The old man was crucified with Christ, and the first thing God expects from justified believers is that they should reckon themselves to be dead unto sin, but alive unto God in Christ Jesus. We may know God's methods of deliverance, but it is only so far as we do the reckoning that we realize the deliverance.

Two of the most powerful addresses given during the Convention were delivered by Rev. J. Gregory Mantle—one on "The Victory of Faith," and the other on "The Danger of Quenching the Spirit." The speaker's scathing criticism of some of the objectionable modes of raising money for church purposes, made a deep impression, and doubtless caused many to reflect on their ways. Another speaker was Rev. J. Brash, whose words were full of spiritual power; while Mr. Thomas Payne, with earnest utterance, appealed to his hearers not to rest satisfied until they experienced the joys of a full salvation. Although there was considerable variety in the different speakers, yet in the teaching perfect harmony prevailed, all converging to the one point—the necessity of being filled with the Holy Spirit.

MINISTERS' AND MISSIONARY MEETINGS.

Two gatherings were arranged for ministers in the Lecture-room of the Y.M.C.A., Mount Pleasant. The speakers on these occasions were Revs. J. J. Luce and J. Gregory Mantle, who dealt in an earnest spirit with some of the dangers and temptations incident to the ministerial office, and gave the younger men present some practical hints as to the best means of securing real success in their ministry. The last day of the Convention was devoted to the interests of missionary work, and among those who took part were—Rev. Samuel Schor (Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews); Rev. J. Williams (twenty-six years C.M.S. missionary in Japan); Mr. F. Marcus Wood (C.I.M.); Mr. Cyril S. Green (South Africa General Mission), Miss Bessie Porter, &c. Their addresses were of an instructive and impressive character.

One of the most gratifying features of the Convention was the large number of young men and women present, and there was the strongest evidence that the spiritual life of hundreds had been quickened.

Applicants for Tracts.—Mr. J. G. Wintersgill, 17, Carey Road, Leytonstone; Mr. J. F. Macfarlane, Parish Council Chambers, Stornoway, N.B.; Miss A. J. Moore, 2, Madras Road, Bowery Town, Cambridge; Miss Bilton, Devonshire House, 56, Regent Street, Cambridge; Mr. G. Stabler, 15, Bridge End, Mytholmroyd, Yorkshire; Mr. H. A. Hillary, 15, Stamford Road, Kingsland, London, N.; Miss M. J. Wrightson, 113, Victoria Road, Darlington (for police cells); Mr. Lionel Maddison, 106, Roxburgh Street, Walton, near Liverpool; Miss F. Fisher, 41, Hythe Road, Staines.

The Leysian Mission.

In one of the most congested areas of London the Leysian Mission for sixteen years has been a thriving centre of religious and philanthropic endeavour. The existence of the institution is a confession of the fact that there are means by which it is possible to get closer to the poor than those adopted by the ordinary churches and chapels. The spirit in which the Mission is conducted is the subordination of the secular and social element to the religious interests. The institution is conducted and supported by the old boys of Leys School, Cambridge, and has done more than is generally realized to improve the moral and physical condition of the people.

The annual report, presented recently at the anniversary gathering, records a highly successful year's work, especially in connection with the home life of the people. The Mission has over 300 members connected with it. At the Sunday school there is an average attendance of 550; and the tract distributors number 100, who report cases of sickness to the district visitors. Added to the ever present evil of intemperance, the monstrous conditions of life among the poor create a demand for excitement, which finds an outlet in the growing practice of gambling. In many instances the workers meet with those whose income, reduced so perilously by drinking, is still further reduced by gambling.

A GAMBLER'S FALL.

Only recently a man was dealt with who had earned £5 per week at his trade. He married the daughter of a Free Church minister, and had a comfortable home. Seized with the craze for betting, he gambled away his home and tools, and, when brought under the notice of the mission, was penniless. The children subsisted on the food collected by the workers from the clubs, and within a fortnight of her confinement the wife left her bed and pleaded to be allowed to scrub the hall in order to be able to feed her starving little ones.

Notwithstanding the discouraging conditions under which the work is carried on, the year has been marked by a distinctly higher spiritual tone, and consequently a more steady, persistent earnestness of spirit has manifested itself in every branch, and resulted in a markedly increased efficiency in every department.

IMPORTANT DEVELOPMENTS.

The extension scheme which the Mission is undertaking is broad and comprehensive. A site has been secured in City Road, and the scheme will embrace an old Leysian settlement and hostel, a settlement for young business men and students, a small settlement for sisters and lady workers, complete suites of club-rooms for working men, lads, young women, and girls, with gymnasium and drill hall for Boys' Brigade, &c.; a great hall for services and public meetings, accommodating 2,000; a minor hall, seating about 600, with a complete suite of twenty-five class rooms; complete accommodation for medical mission, brass band, orchestra, choirs, and offices for workers. The total estimated cost is £100,000, one-fifth of which will be granted from the Wesleyan Connexional Funds. The new home of the Mission is eagerly anticipated by the workers, affording as it will a far wider sphere of usefulness than is possible under the present arrangements.

North Africa Mission.—The offices of the North Africa Mission have been removed from Barking to 34, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

A Year's Toll Among East-End Jews.—Among the numerous agencies having as their object the evangelization of Israel in the metropolis, the Brick Lane Jewish Branch of the London City Mission carries on a quiet, unobtrusive work in the East End. Mr. P. L. Dornbusch (7, Shortlands Terrace, Lea Bridge Road, E.), directs the mission, and the efforts put forth comprise—Gospel services, Bible classes, gatherings for Jewish mothers, meetings for the children, free classes for teaching English, &c., free reading-room, and the distribution of relief to poor Jews. In spite of the difficulties contingent upon the prosecution of such endeavours, the last year has witnessed gratifying progress, and the labours of the Lord's servants have borne fruit which has been seen in many directions.

Gravesend Ragged School.

The school at Gravesend, so well known throughout the country on account of the fact that the late General Gordon at one time belonged to its band of teachers, celebrated its fifty-first anniversary on April 16, the jubilee having been observed last year. The Marquis of Northampton was to have presided, but, being too unwell to attend, his place was taken by Lord and Lady Darnley. The assembly took place in the Town Hall, and, at the request of the Mayor, Lord Darnley presided. In course of his address the chairman referred to the interest which his father had taken in the work carried on and to his having laid the foundation-stone in 1851.

The Mayor of Gravesend spoke of the veterans who had taken part in the work of the school, special reference being made to General Gordon, who had been a teacher for two years during the time that he was stationed at Gravesend as chief officer of the Royal Engineers. The late General then taught a class of boys in the Sunday school. The famous Chinese flags, which are still greatly prized heirlooms, were given by General Gordon himself; and as children and teachers are alike proud of these, they are always used whenever a treat or an anniversary occurs.

In the course of the evening, addresses were given by various friends, including representatives of the Ragged School Union and the West Kent Sunday School Union. Mr. Maurice, K.C., speaking as an old ragged school teacher, said that a debt of gratitude was owing to those who carried on work which saved so many from a life of crime. Mr. W. G. Penman also made a statement, and local ministers spoke of the work. It was decided to form a crèche or day nursery.

Canning Town Women's Settlement.

The Women's Settlement in Canning Town (supported almost entirely by Congregational Churches) has celebrated its tenth anniversary. It has been worked under the able and devoted guidance of Miss Cheetham all these years, and it is with real thankfulness that one looks back and sees what has been accomplished during that time.

This settlement is distinguished by its medical work; it supports a small hospital, a dispensary with two doctors (women), and recently half its workers are employed in this important branch. To realize the importance of bringing reliable medical aid within reach of the sick poor, one has only to live for a short time in such a district as Canning Town, and even to study the published results of last year's work. Over 10,000 women and children are seen yearly at the dispensary, and 3,500 visits are paid to patients in their homes.

The nine beds and four cots in the ittle hospital are always full, while patients are being constantly refused for lack of room. All patients are asked to pay a little—at the dispensary their help meets the drug bill; in hospital unfortunately, it only pays the milk bill. This leaves a wide margin for the generosity of friends. It is satisfactory to note that the expenses of the Nurses' Home are covered by the nurses' payments, and that salaries are only given to the resident physician and night nurse.

The hospital has quite out-grown the limits and capacities of the two private houses in which the work has been carried on, and an effort is now on foot to provide a building which will meet, in some larger measure, the ever-growing needs of this rapidly developing district. A suitable site has been already secured, and two generous friends have offered to build a hospital and nurses' home, on one condition, that is, that an Endowment Fund of £6,000 should be raised towards its support.

The Women's Settlement Committee feel that this offer must not be refused, and have determined to mark the end of their first decade by raising the money, and taking this important step forward. In doing this, they will be helped by the hearty co-operation of the people of the district. A bazaar in aid will be held in the public hall, Canning Town, on June 4 and 5 next. Appeal is made to all who sympathize with the toiling, suffering East End to help in a practical way. The hon. financial secretary is Mrs. Coote, 30, Campden House Court, W. Parcels of work or goods for the bazaar should be sent to "Sister," Medical Mission Hospital, 538, Barking Road, E.

Evangelization in Liverpool.

At the annual meeting of the Liverpool Branch of the Evangelization Society, held recently, Mr. T. A. Leigh (chairman) showed that the amalgamation with the London Society, twelve months ago, had resulted in satisfactory progress. Last year 1,735 meetings were held, as against 715 the year before the amalgamation took place. The number of places to which preachers had been sent by the branch had also increased from thirty to fifty-eight, and the income had gone up from £191 to £402.

Archdeacon Madden declared as his experience that it was very hard to get the poorest of the poor into the churches, and he had endeavoured to remedy that by arranging evangelistic services. He wanted to get people to church even though they had not a bonnet or a shoe, but it was extremely difficult to persuade them. There was something in the Protestant character which caused poor people to keep aloof from the house of God if the outward form was shabby. It was not the case with the Roman Catholics. He had seen them go to mass in Ireland tattered and barefooted. Poorly-clad people had attended evangelistic services in his parish, but never yet had he prevailed upon a woman to go without a bonnet. On the other hand, he had heard of one bonnet being used by a whole court, lent round so that those who did not possess such an adornment could go to church.

Brixton Orphanage.

In common with the majority of similar institutions the Brixton Orphanage has felt the adverse influence of the nation's trouble in South Africa during the past year. Added to this there has been the loss by death of benefactors, who, from the earliest days of the Home, have given largely of their sympathy and substance. But the year has not been all clouds. To quote from the annual report: "The sunshine of God's love and faithfulness has shone upon us, cheering our hearts, and bidding us take courage and go forward. The sympathy of friends has been called forth by the absence of Mrs. Montague. This has been shown by the cordial support given to Miss Bird, and by increased help and interest in many ways."

Last year saw the admission of fifty-two orphans into the Home; fourteen left for service, and others returned to their friends. The children are admitted between the ages of seven and twelve, and are retained until the age of sixteen or seventeen, when they are provided with outfits and placed in domestic service. It may be remembered that the Home was started in 1876 by Mrs. Montague with four children, but within the first year the family grew to forty, and has continued to grow, until now the institution maintains, clothes, and educates 300 orphan and fatherless girls. To care for these fatherless little ones, and train them for Christian service in the world, is recognized by the workers as a privilege which God has committed to them, and they ask for the prayers of his people that the opportunities may be rightly used. The vice-superintendent is Miss A. H. Bird, 57, Barrington Road, Brixton, S.W.

Palestine Exploration.—The Sultan has granted permission to excavate the important site of Gezer. There is reason to expect that light will be thrown upon some obscure periods of Old Testament history, notably on the Philistines and other early inhabitants of the sea-coast of Palestine. It is estimated that the expenditure on the excavations will amount to about £100 a month. The "Quarterly Statement of the Palestine Exploration Fund," which gives this information, describes the German excavations already carried on at Ba'albek, and contains an obituary notice of Dr. Conrad Schick from the pen of Sir Charles Wilson, who also writes on "Golgotha and the Holy Sepulchre." Office of the Fund, 38, Conduit Street, W.

Obituary.

MRS. JOHN HALL.

MANY will learn with sorrow that Mrs. John Hall has gone home. She survived her devoted husband just four years and a half, and died last week at Newport, Mon., at the age of seventy-five. Long will she be remembered for her work in East London. A true helpmeet for her husband, she entered with full sympathy into his labours among railway employés, policemen, and other classes at Stratford from twenty to thirty years ago. During the earlier London missions of Messrs. Moody and Sankey, Mr. Hall was a valued helper in the inquiry-room, and in this his wife was with him heart and soul. If ever Christians had the burden of souls these had, and they allowed nothing to stand in the way of the work which they so greatly loved. When they left the inquiry room, they by no means forgot the inquirer or convert. Now, in fact, their real care began; they were in possession of the names and the addresses of those with whom they had conversed, and they followed up their loving words with letters full of Christian solicitude and instruction. In this special work, Mrs. Hall had a large part, and those who hold letters from her pen will long prize them, and praise God for her loving ministry.

REV. W. CLARKSON.

Congregationalism in the West of England has lost one of its most highly esteemed ministers by the death of Rev. William Clarkson, B.A., which took place, after a long illness, at Bishopston. Educated at Cheshunt College, Mr. Clarkson's first charge was Market Harborough, where he remained for ten years. He afterwards responded to a call to Salisbury, where another ten years of fruitful service were spent. About nineteen years ago he was invited to become pastor of the newly-erected David Thomas Memorial Church, Bristol, remaining until about three years ago, when he experienced a serious illness, and in consequence tendered his resignation. The members, however, had become so deeply attached to him that not until June, 1900, would they agree to his severing himself from the pastorate. For nearly twenty years, he had been co-secretary with Rev. H. Arnold Thomas, of the Gloucestershire and Herefordshire Congregational Union; while his interest in education and other public questions made his services highly valued in the district.

THE LATE MRS. COLIN VALENTINE.

Writing with reference to that devoted worker, Mrs. Valentine (wife of Rev. Dr. Colin Valentine, late of Agra), Rev. Thomas Evans, of Mussoorie, says; "At Landour, a hill depôt to which some 300 troops came up from the plains of India in the summer months, Mrs. Valentine afforded valuable and generous aid in our service during the hot seasons she spent at the place. Once a week she had a Bible-reading in her own house, which was attended by many, and this was carried on for years, various missionaries and ministers leading in the study of God's Word. Once a week, too, our departed friend had a meeting for soldiers. She was treasurer of our local funds, and contributed largely to every good cause. She took deep interest in the memorial church, which is being erected to commemorate the useful life of the late Dr. Kellogg.

"Mrs. Valentine's main work at Landour was in connection with the Sunday school. For years she was the esteemed superintendent, and spared neither time nor labour in endeavouring to lead the young to the Saviour."

REV. PRINCIPAL CALEB SCOTT, D.D.

After the publication of our last issue we learned with deep satisfaction that the announcement through the press of the death of Rev. Principal Scott was incorrect. Deep and widespread sympathy is felt for this honoured servant of God and his home circle in this serious and continued illness. According to our latest intelligence he is still with us, the subject of much intercessory prayer.

Church of England.

The Bishop of Peterborough is gradually recovering from his recent riding accident, but must be kept perfectly quiet for some days yet.

Rev. F. J. Horsefield, vicar of St. Silas Church, Bristol, has just completed the seventh year of service in that capacity, and the event has been marked by the members of his congregation presenting to him at a recent meeting a new black silk preaching gown and scarf.

Rev. J. G. Gregory, minister of Christ Church, Leamington, has just issued the fourth annual report of his ministry there. Among the several meetings for prayer held in connection with the church is a monthly Protestant prayer meeting. The amount raised by the congregations by collections and contributions during 1901 was £714, an increase of £115. A great part of this sum is devoted to various religious societies and institutions, including the C.M.S., the Bible Society, the China Inland Mission, and Irish Church Missions. Mr. Gregory has throughout his ministerial career kept his pen busy in defence of Evangelical principles.

The population of Leyton, one of the north-eastern suburbs of London, continues to grow with great rapidity. The mother parish, St. Mary's, has a population of 12,000 people, which will soon be greatly increased, as seven estates of varying size are in course of development for building purposes. The vicar of Leyton (Rev. J. T. Inskip) and the churchwardens have just purchased a site for a new church (St. Paul's), vicarage, and hall, on the best part of the estate, at a cost of £1,250. In another part of the parish a population of over 3,000 has sprung up with no place of worship at hand. Work has been begun with encouraging results in a private house, and a site for a mission church has been secured.

Congregational.

On June 5, Rev. D. B. Hooke, secretary of the Colonial Missionary Society (Incorporated), starts with Mrs. Hooke on a visit to the Society's fields of labour in Cape Colony, Tasmania, New Zealand, and Western Australia. They hope to reach Wellington, N.Z. (where they remain for a month) on August 13, in the Karamea. Their homeward voyage will (D.V.) begin on November 13 at Perth, W.A. Mr. Percy E. Bignell (Harley College), who has been accepted for service in South Africa, sails with them to Cape Town.

Baptist.

The Bible Studies on "The Second Coming of Christ," which Pastor Percy J. Smart is giving at Hornsey Road Chapel, N., on Thursdays at 8 p.m., are to be continued until further notice.

At the recognition of Dr. N. H. Marshall, as pastor of the church at New Barnet, on Tuesday week, a crowded congregation assembled, and encouraging addresses were given. Rev. Charles Brown, of Ferme Park, delivered the charge to the church, and Rev. Dr. Clifford the charge to the minister.

It is hoped, by the end of April, to raise £15,000, and so complete the Twentieth Century Fund. Rev. J. H. Shakespeare has already received one conditional promise of £1,000, while two friends have offered £500 each; and it is suggested that there are 13,000 Baptists who could, by the gift of £1 each, provide the balance.

The Year Book of Bloomsbury Chapel (pastor, Rev. B. J. Gibbon) shows that £2,754 was raised for various purposes. The starting of a C.E. Society has been a feature of the year, and good work has also been done in connection with the Sunday schools and at the mission hall: £5,343 has already been paid in to the Twentieth Century Fund. The membership stands at 586.

Very encouraging Sunday-school anniversary services were held at the church at Rochester on April 13, when Rev. Carey Bonner (secretary of the Sunday School Union) was the preacher. At a public meeting which followed on Monday the chairman was Major R. L. Long, and Revs. J. Kingdon, W. R. A. Budd, and other friends, gave addresses.

In a booklet, entitled "Seven Fruitful Years," Pastor A. H. Tolhurst describes the Carey Hall Extension Movement, Leicester. For the first three years the cause was a mission; for the last four years it has been a church, worshipping in a building that accommodates easily a thousand persons, and has large Sunday-school premises adjoining. "A few weeks spent in this neighbourhood would show that such a place, where young people can meet and spend their evenings under Christian influence, is necessary, unless we are willing to let them drift into the tap-rooms and bars of public-houses, or even into worse places. Carey Hall is open to them almost every day in the year; it has been to a great number who were walking in perilous paths, the door to a new and better life."

In connection with the Settlement of Mr. C. Evelyn Charlesworth, of the Pastors' College, as minister at C. H. Spurgeon's Chapel, Waterbeach, special services were held on Sunday, April 13. The preacher was Rev. V. J. Charlesworth, of the Stockwell Orphanage, and on the following day a public meeting was held, at which Mr. James Toller, J.P., presided. The charge to the pastor was given by Rev. Robert Smith, of Histon, secretary of the County Association, and that to the church by Rev. V. J. Charlesworth. The speakers included the late pastor (Rev. Harry Jenner, of Hitchin), and Revs. H. W. Taylor and J. J. Hayman, and other friends. The meetings closed on Tuesday, 15th, with a devotional service, when Professor Hackney delivered an excellent discourse.

Methodist.

Permission has been given by the General Committee of the Primitive Methodist Connexion for the sale of the chapel at Lambrokhead, Orrell, near Liverpool. A new and larger one is to be erected.

The returns of Wesleyan Church membership show the comparatively large increase of 8,136, being the largest increase reported for the last nineteen years. The total membership at the present time for Great Britain is as follows:—Full and accredited church members, 463,118, with 33,705 on trial and 86,565 in junior classes. There are 156 candidates for the ministry.

The Wesleyan Chapel Committee, at their monthly meeting, considered proposals for the erection of a dozen new chapels in various parts of the country at an estimated cost of £50,320. The Deptford Hall mission scheme was sanctioned, the outlay being £21,850. There is a distinct movement in many parts of British Methodism in furtherance of the removal of the trust debts. The sum of £1,000 is to be paid off Radcliffe Close Church, Radcliffe.

At a recent meeting of the Wesleyan London Mission Committee, Rev. Hugh Price Hughes paid a high tribute to the services of Rev. J. Gregory Mantle at the West London Mission. Mr. Mantle thought the Committee should understand that although the Mission has suffered through the loss of its two most distinguished ministers, it has been able to maintain its congregations and usefulness. Sunday night at St. James' Hall is crowded in every part, and overflow services have to be held. Since last October 200 inquirers have professed conversion, and eighty young men have been gathered into Mr. Mantle's own Society class.

Lady Chubb's reception, on behalf of the Wesleyan Soldiers' and Sailors' Homes Fund, was an encouraging occasion, notwithstanding the absence, through illness, of the guest of the evening, the Secretary for War. Lord Stanley, who represents the War Office in Parliament, under Mr. Brodrick, touched two vital points in his admirable address—Home and Religion. As he truly said, "these Homes, although they are conducted irrespective of religious denomination, are not conducted regardless of religion—the religion which teaches men to fear God and love one another." The Grosvenor Road Home, S.W., which, from a business point of view, has had special difficulties to contend with, has been wonderfully distinguished by the spiritual work that has been accomplished in it. The religious meetings night by night have been crowded, and never a week goes by without some soldier declaring himself for the Lord Jesus.

Presbyterian.

The committee of the Frognal congregation, West Hampstead, N.W., have cabled to Rev. Dr. Herridge, Ottawa, their intention to offer him a call. Dr. Herridge supplied the Frognal pulpit for some weeks last summer.

Regent Square Church is to be provided with electric light as well as with an organ. The church is likely to be closed for some six weeks from the beginning of July. The whole amount required to meet this heavy outlay and to clear off the remaining debt on the adjoining new halls is already within sight.

In recognition of the nomination of their minister, Rev. A. H. Drysdale, as Moderator of the Synod indicted to meet in Newcastle on May 5, the members and adherents of Morpeth congregation took advantage of their annual business meeting to present tokens of their affection and esteem to him and Mrs. Drysdale.

Salvation Army.

The first training institution of the Salvation Army for the training of its social officers has been opened by Mr. Bramwell Booth. Up to the present the workers in this branch of effort have obtained training by somewhat irregular methods, but the new departure, which is for women, and is to be followed shortly by a like agency for men, will secure a more effective equipment of all those engaged in Salvation Army social work. The Army has, of course, long had Training Homes for those engaged in its evangelistic work, over forty of them being now in full work.

With reference to the call to a day of prayer and humiliation at Earlham Hall, Forest Gate, we are informed (since inserting the announcement) that the conveners are of the Seventh Day Adventist persuasion. This fact is likely to lead to unsettlement on the part of inexperienced Christians that might attend the meetings.

Lime-light lantern lectures are being given each Thursday evening during April, at Malden Hall, Kentish Town by Mr. D. S. Hyslop, in connection with the Protestant Alliance. The attendances so far have been very encouraging, audiences of 300 persons and upwards gathering on each occasion. The titles of the lectures given have been—"The Reformation on the Continent," "The Reformation in England," and "Plots against Protestantism." The lecture for Thursday, the 24th inst., will be "The Superstitions of Romanism and Ritualism." Other important meetings have been held by Mr. D. S. Hyslop recently at Hanwell, South Acton, Hackney and Brixton, a very valuable Protestant educational work being accomplished.

A series of important meetings has been held in the West of England by Mr. W. A. Limbrick, of the Protestant Reformation Society. At Exeter Mr. Limbrick spoke thrice. An encouraging gathering was held in the Barnfield Hall, which was well filled for a lecture, with limelight views on "The History of the English Bible." Another notable gathering was a conference of Sunday-school teachers, both Church and Nonconformist. After an address on "What the Ritualists are Teaching English Children," illustrated by lantern views, an interesting discussion took place. It was decided to form Protestant educational classes for teachers, and to promote Protestant principles amongst the young by means of Sunday-school addresses, the spread of suitable literature, &c. A sad state of things was revealed by those who spoke with regard to the persistent efforts to "capture the children" through Ritualistic and Romish organizations.

Fallen Asleep.

Aged seventy-one, Rev. W. M. STATHAM, rector of Iver Heath, Bucks., formerly Congregational minister.—Rev. G. NICHOLSON, formerly pastor of the Congregational Churches at Northampton, Putney, and Longsight.—The Baptist Church at Bovey Tracey has lost by death, at the age of eighty-two, its oldest member, Mrs. E. HAYWOOD, who had been on the roll of membership forty-nine years.—By the death of Mr. LEONARD CLEMENT, J.P., of Nelson, North-east Lancashire has lost its most representative Congregational layman.—The Baptist Church at Oswestry is mourning the loss of its senior deacon, Alderman CHARLES G. BAYLEY, J.P., who has just passed away, aged eighty-five. For thirty-five years he had been deacon and treasurer of the church, and in his younger days was most active in the county association and denominational work generally.

Literature for Fisher Folk.—For some years the crews of the fleet of fishing boats, which gather at Stornoway every summer from many parts of the kingdom, have been supplied with religious periodicals, tracts, and booklets. Mr. J. F. Macfarlane, who has organized the work, acknowledges with gratitude the kindness of readers who forwarded literature for this purpose. Gifts for use in this season's effort may be addressed to him at the Parish Council Chambers, Stornoway, N.B.

Missions to Young People.

Ilderton Road Baptist Church, S.E.

A GRACIOUS revival has been experienced during a mission conducted here by Mr. Wm. Olney and Mr. Spencer Johnson. It was evident from the commencement that God had set his seal to the undertaking. The chapel was crowded in the afternoon of the opening day of the mission, and there were many decisions for Christ. In the evening there were again a number of inquirers. At the meetings of children held each evening during the week, at 6.30, an average of nearly 500 were present, and the interest was well sustained. The services for adults and young people at 8 p.m. were well attended, hearty, and reverent. On one evening a little girl intended for the stage was converted; her mother, surprised at this, came herself to the eight o'clock meeting and was led to Christ. She took a decision card and promised to keep the girl off the stage. Altogether 215 decision cards have been signed and sent in by persons of ages varying from ten to sixty who have given themselves to Christ. T. E. H.

Tooting, S.W.

In connection with the Free Churches of Tooting, S.W., a mission to young people is being conducted with fruitful effect. Mr. Olney and Mr. Johnson took part in a service last Lord's Day at the Congregational Church, which was crowded by the children of the combined Sunday-schools. Owing to the crowded condition of the inquiry-room it was impossible to deal with all individually, but very many expressed a longing desire to find the Saviour. Meetings are being held on week nights in the Longley Road Baptist Church.

Chiswick.

An eight-days' mission to young people has been conducted at Chiswick Baptist Chapel, W., by Rev. W. J. Sears, of Willesden Green. About seventy persons, chiefly scholars of the school, entered the inquiry-rooms. The happy method of the missioner, combined with his earnest spirit in presenting the Gospel, eminently fit him for this work amongst the young. Much interest in Divine things has been awakened, and the meetings have not only been a blessing to those who have "newly come to the faith," but have proved a means of spiritual refreshment and quickening to adult believers as well.

Mr. Leonard Weaver at Brixton.

It was with a spirit of expectancy and holy enthusiasm that a large number of workers came together on Saturday evening last to welcome Mr. Leonard Weaver, who has undertaken a mission at Trinity Congregational Church, Brixton, S.W. Much prayer had been offered up that God would mightily bless the mission, and the Lord graciously honoured faith in the opening services on the Lord's Day.

In the afternoon a special service was held for the young, and it was very touching to see the fatherless children from Brixton Orphanage with rapt attention drinking in the simple story of Jesus and his love for the children.

At the evening service the place was crowded. After Mr. Weaver had given a solemn and powerful appeal, many of the unconverted manifested their desire to accept Christ as their Saviour. The services are continuing nightly until Sunday next.

The Boy Preacher.

At Westbourne Grove Baptist Chapel, W., Mr. Jack Cooke has continued his mission during the past week with signs of increased interest and fruitfulness.

On Lord's Day morning the young preacher gave an earnest address on "Faith," which was listened to with deep attention by an appreciative congregation. The commodious building was crowded. Mr. Cooke's refreshing word brought a new realization that "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith."

In the evening the crowd was larger than ever. It was computed by some of the friends responsible for the direction of the arrangements that there were as many people turned away as secured admission. Mr. Cooke spoke powerfully, and there were many inquirers. Mr. Towers spoke with much acceptance at a large overflow gathering, and in the inquiry room Pastor Geo. Freeman and Rev. J. R. Coutts were busily engaged, with a devoted band of workers, in pointing the seekers to the Lord Jesus Christ. The week-night meetings have also been accompanied by blessing.

The mission continues nightly (except Saturdays) until May 2, at 8 p.m., and on Sunday next Mr. Cooke is to speak at 3.30, to men only, in addition to the usual gatherings at 11 and 7.

The Weaver Brothers at King's Cross.

"We have been greatly cheered," writes Pastor D. H. Moore, of Vernon Chapel, King's Cross, "by the visit of Messrs. Bewley and Frank Weaver, both intensely earnest in the desire to glorify God and win men and women to Christ. We invited them to prolong their visit over last Sunday, which they did, and God gave us a gracious ingathering of precious souls. Ninety-eight men and women received cards; many of these have been returned, as a sign of decision for Christ."

"The men's meetings on Sunday afternoon have been very encouraging, and some very interesting cases have been dealt with. One man came to Christ, and his brother met me at the vestry door and said, 'Pastor, my brother, whom I have not seen for twenty years, is there. He is now trusting Jesus.' One night a man came to the service half intoxicated, interrupting the meeting, but signed the temperance pledge. He spoke of his drunken wife. One of our workers went home with him. Three nights afterwards his wife came to the meeting. She had been drinking, but signed the pledge. Both came on Sunday night and professed to accept Christ. A minister's son was among those restored from backsliding. These are but samples of many cases for which we praise God. Many of the converts have come from great depths of sin. The Woodbridge Brass Band rendered splendid service in the open air."

Gipsy Smith in Glasgow.

After a lapse of eight years Gipsy Smith is again evangelizing in Glasgow. Then, his mission, which was in connection with the Free Church, lasted several months; presently, his mission which is in connection with the Wesleyans, is to last for ten days. The present mission was begun, not reckoning the welcome meeting on the Saturday, on Sabbath, 16th inst. On the opening day, the services were held in St. Andrew's Hall. In this great hall, preachers of note such as D. L. Moody, Richard Weaver, Major Whittle, Henry Varley, and our own John McNeill have often had immense congregations; and Gipsy Smith's evening meeting was equal to anything ever seen in the hall before, while crowds were turned away for want of room. Many at the close of his address responded to his appeal, and went into the inquiry room.

On week nights he is preaching in the Windsor Hall, where the Wesleyan congregation worships, and it is proving far too small for the crowds that desire admittance. On some nights the gates have had to be locked a quarter of an hour before the time announced for commencing the service, to keep out the people desiring to get in. Even until after nine o'clock, when the first meeting disperses, many of the disappointed hang about the outside of the building. Rev. T. Morcom Taylor, minister of the church, advertised the meetings widely and well, sending out 20,000 notices; the pity is that the accommodation is so scarce, even though "1,000 free seats" are advertised. Many would be glad to get even free standing room to hear the Gipsy, so widespread is the desire. Night by night many precious souls are being personally dealt with, and there is sure to be much fruit that will abide. J. C.

Dr. Harry Guinness in New Zealand.

Writing from Dunedin, Dr. Harry Guinness says:—The Master has been indeed present with us during these days of special effort, and we are grateful to Him for all the signs and wonders of his right hand. When Mr. Grubb was here the Garrison Hall was the largest then available in the city. But since that time the Agricultural Hall has been erected, and is a most spacious and delightful building for Gospel work. It holds 2,000 people, and has attached to it several smaller rooms, which we employ for inquiry-rooms; as also the Victoria Hall. We have employed the latter on Sunday afternoons, dealing on the first occasion with 111 dear fellows, many of them in great distress of soul, and following up the after-meeting on the next Sunday by inviting the men to stay and have a cup of tea, and further conversation afterwards. We had a splendid time.

One lad of eighteen years of age, who was greatly moved the first Sunday, and attended the meetings throughout the week, decided for Christ last Monday evening. On the following day he received his call to Christian work, and on the Wednesday night he was the means of leading two other lads into the meeting, one of whom decided for Christ. That very night he was seized with a serious fit, and early on the Thursday morning he went into the presence of the King. This sudden removal has had a remarkable influence upon the whole family. The three sisters have all turned to the Saviour. The last words of the dear lad were, "O Lamb of God, I come." This hymn, sung to the tune of 'Rockingham,' had been a great favourite throughout the mission, and the refrain lingered with him in death. On his mantelpiece stood the card with all the texts I am wont to give to inquirers, among others the words which have so largely been owned of God during these meetings—

Upon a life I did not live,
Upon a death I did not die,
Another's life, Another's death,
I stake my whole eternity.

I first saw these lines on Mr. T. A. Denny's mantelpiece in his study at Connaught Place, and was deeply interested in them, but straightway forgot them, to my regret. I often tried to recall them but all in vain, until the other night, when crossing from Tasmania in the Coogee, I recollected them perfectly. As soon as the vessel steadied up sufficiently for me to get out of bed, after passing through the Heads, I got up and committed them to paper, so that I should not once more let them go. After the Convention at Geelong, I had them printed for the mission, and have used them ever since in all the missions.

These few lines were the means of bringing a prominent man of business in Adelaide to definite trust in the Saviour. Like myself, he had just recovered from a terrible attack of typhoid; at the very time my life had been hanging in the balance, he was in the same condition. Then he was troubled at the uncertainty he felt in facing the issues of the future. We had a delightful conversation, which resulted in his gladly subscribing with his hand and heart to the above lines.

The Agricultural Hall was crowded to the doors on the occasion of the two Missionary Lectures this week, Several candidates are coming forward for training for the foreign field. Such gatherings have never before assembled in Dunedin in connection with the missionary cause, and we are deeply grateful to the Master. I hope that the outcome of the work will prove to be a very sensible increase to the Church membership of the city, and a lasting impulse granted to the cause of foreign missions. After the afternoon Bible-Readings, we have conducted a children's service. Between 100 and 200 dear children have come forward to confess Christ, and although some of them are quite young, it has often been observed that work amongst the children is as permanent in its effects as that amongst the adults, if not more so.

Mr. Stephens, who has accompanied me throughout this New Zealand campaign, was converted to God at the last service that I conducted at the Theatre Royal in Melbourne, when I was in Victoria sixteen years ago; and since that time he has become a successful evangelist and soloist in connection with the Evangelization Society. The daily Press of the city has not helped during the mission, and therefore the large crowds were all the more remarkable. The attitude of the Press is purely secular, and perhaps somewhat antagonistic on account of my outspoken position with regard to the Roman Church.

About Books.

"THE MOORS."

HAVING given in two previous volumes—"The Moorish Empire" and "The Land of the Moors"—an excellent epitome of the history of our nearest Mohammedan neighbours, and a comprehensive description of their country, Mr. Budgett Meakin has completed the series with The Moors (15s. Sonnenschein), which is well entitled to rank as the best authority on the subject with which it deals. The student who has been helped to a better and fuller understanding of the history and topography of the land, will now—whether his purpose be missionary, commercial, or scientific—find himself brought into living touch with the men and women who inhabit it.

That the author visited Morocco for the convenience of personal study, with no intention of "making a book," is no drawback to those who share his desires without the opportunity of meeting them in like fashion. To see the Moors through the eyes of one who went to make personal observations because he could find no books answering his requirements, is a privilege which others will hail with satisfaction.

The two main divisions of the volume are "social" and "ethical," and the points touched on are of the most practical character. The reader feels that he is being introduced to brethren according to the flesh, men of like passions with ourselves, and gives us that sympathy which was very much needed with regard to a country lying within four days' journey of London, and which seems destined in the near future to form a serious element in international politics. The people live before us in the market and the home, the workshop and the field. Full credit is given for improvements and reforms in recent times: but no attempt is made to conceal the hopelessness of "mending" satisfactorily the rule of the False Prophet.

The ethical chapters shed much light on the tenets and practical working of Mohammedanism. The educational system is treated with insight and fulness, its barrenness and fruitlessness being exposed with no sparing hand. The keystone of the Moslem system is reached in the references to sensuality and superstition, which are shown to prevail to an almost incredible extent.

The volume is an informing one on many topics on which particulars are not otherwise easily obtainable, and the 132 illustrations add a great additional attraction.

Many excellent lessons in illustration of the truth are drawn from natural facts in Christ in Astronomy (2s. 6d. A. H. Stockwell), by Rev. John Spence, of Chelsea Chapel. The application is always evangelical. Presented in this fresh light, old truths will, we trust, find their way to hearts hitherto impervious.

Setting before him to show from their own standards and manuals that Roman and Anglican are identical in such doctrines as confession, absolution, penance, and purgatory, a very serious indictment has been formulated in The Twin Sisters (2s. 6d. A. H. Stockwell), by John Oates.

After a sale of over 100,000 copies, Moses' Bible, by Alexander Macbeith, has been revised, greatly enlarged, and sent forth again as a valuable aid to teachers and parents in the imparting of Scripture truth. (6d., 1s., 1s. 6d. Pickering & Inglis, Glasgow; Bagster, London.) As many of our readers know, the lessons were originally prepared for the Glasgow Poor Children's Dinner Table, where the audience frequently numbers 2,000, and were there thoroughly tested. To those who already use the blackboard in teaching, the book will be an invaluable adjunct: to any who wish help in making a beginning, it will go far to make the difficult path easy. No instructor of youth can fail to find it of great use as a storehouse of suggestion.

The Pocket Guide to May Meetings and to London has several new features in addition to the usual list of gatherings and the accompanying mass of useful information. There is a coloured map of London showing the route to be taken by the coronation procession. (1d. J. E. May, 68, Fleet Street.)

Messrs. T. & T. Clark announce that every article in the fourth volume of Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible is now in type and returned for press, and that they hope to publish it the last week of May. This volume includes "Talmud" to "Zwingli," and in the opinion of the editors it contains some of the most important and finest articles in the entire work.

Romanism in the S.P.G.: Reasons why Evangelicals should not Support the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. By Rev. A. G. Townshend, vicar of Sileby, Leicestershire. (6d. per dozen. C. J. Thynne.) A very serious exposure, giving particulars of the Romish leanings, associations, and practices of bishops and clergy working under the S.P.G. Surely the times call for Protestant consistency in these days when Rome is increasingly active on her own account.

The Christian.

☞ To avoid delay it is requested that all letters relating to business matters should be addressed to the firm, Messrs. Morgan and Scott, and not to its individual members. Letters of a personal nature should in every case be so marked.

Communications for The Christian should be addressed to the Editor, 12, Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C. All advertisements should be sent to Messrs. John Haddon and Co., Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

☞ The Publishers request that all orders for The Christian by post, and remittances for same, be addressed to "The Christian" Postal Department, Bouverie House, Salisbury Square, London, E.C. Cheques and Post Orders to be made payable to Messrs. John Haddon and Co. at that address. (For Subscription rates, see Page 1 of Cover.) Postcard or stamped envelope should be enclosed if receipt is desired.

Notes & Comments

The Mission Field. The return of the month of May brings us face to face once more with work in the great mission-field, at home and abroad. The reports which will appear in successive issues of The Christian will, it is hoped, induce in many hearts a warmer sympathy with the great work of evangelization. Week by week throughout the year, much of our space is occupied with accounts of Gospel effort in heathen lands; and some indication of the deep interest of our readers in this work is afforded by the gifts acknowledged regularly in our Donation List. It is a pleasure to announce that we have in hand, for early publication, some specially instructive articles on the foreign field, its needs and workers. We could wish that friends would call the attention of thoughtful young people, members of the Y.M.C.A. and Y.W.C.A., Christian Endeavour Societies, &c., to this means of spreading information regarding foreign mission work.

Systematic Giving. We are sorry to notice that two or three missionary societies again report a grave deficit in their annual income. This is accounted for by the claims of the Twentieth Century Funds, and the increasing demands of home mission and forward movement work. We confess we are not at all satisfied with the explanation given, for it simply means that one fund has gained at the expense of another; and therefore there is not represented that amount of real self-denial which appears upon the surface. The truth is, many people who ought to give never give at all with anything like regularity, and the burden of giving falls upon the same minority all the time. If the entire membership of the Church reverted to the Apostolic practice of laying by systematically a certain part of their income for the direct work of the Kingdom of God, there would be an overflowing sum of money available both for home and foreign work. The fact that frantic appeals for help are so common, shows that the Church as a whole has not learned the lesson of systematic giving.

True Gratitude. It is announced that Lord Mount Stephen, who lately gave a sum of £25,000 to pay the debt upon the Royal Infirmary at Aberdeen, has now notified his intention to contribute £1,000 per annum to the expenses of that hospital. This noteworthy generosity is said to be based upon the fact that when the donor was a poor lad and in ill health, he received kind and skilful attention at the infirmary. Unhappily such cases of proportionate gratitude are but rare. If they were not, and all our gifts had some relation to the extent of the blessings we have received, the financial condition of some of our Christian and philanthropic societies would be vastly improved.

The Return of the Birds. Naturalists always find in the departure and return of the pilgrim birds a mysterious and entrancing topic for study. With unfailing regularity vast numbers of birds quit our shores in the autumn, and with a regularity as unfailing they return to us in the spring. All we can say of this annual pilgrimage to and fro is, that "instinct" causes it. But the word instinct is not an explanation of the wonderful mystery which causes birds to travel in the night time to more congenial climes. The "instinct" has behind it the marvellous wisdom of God, and the return of our feathered friends is a testimony to the greatness of the Creator's work. It is not surprising that some of the keenest intellects of the world have gathered immense consolation and hope from the spectacle of migrating birds. If, they argue, a mysterious instinct drives little creatures such as these to warmer climes, which always await them, will God treat men, into whose hearts He has placed the instinct of immortality, less kindly than He treats the birds? Our instinct of the future life should be a pledge of the same. If God never mocks birds, He will not mock men. All the same, God's blessing in eternity does not attend men who mock Him in time.

Selling Our Birthright. What has come to us that we are quietly allowing the new locomotion for London and the ocean to pass under the direction of American millionaires? Two great American "Trusts" are competing for the London "Tube" traffic, while London's own government is allowed no voice in the matter. Are we a conquered people that this has become possible? The more serious thing, however, is the new Shipping Combine, the accomplishment of which surprised the country last week. The daily journals are doing well to sound an alarm, for this practical transference of our carrying power to another flag holds within it more than the possibility of a deadly menace to our trade, and to our supremacy upon the seas. Lord Charles Beresford, who, in speaking with remarkable frankness about the whole question of our Navy, points out that ten years ago we had a steamship company with the largest tonnage of any line in the world; to-day we are third on the list. Is the detestable adage true, "Every man has his price"? and are we sacrificing serious situations for the millionaires' gold? It is about time that the cry, "Wake up, John Bull!" took practical effect.

The Effect of Drink on Vital Statistics. The relation of drink to the statistics of mortality were well brought to the front in a recent letter by Mr. James Whyte, secretary of the United Kingdom Alliance. He pointed out that while the death-rate has been greatly reduced during the last forty years, owing to improved sanitation and cheap food (now threatened by the new bread tax), this fall has been shown to affect only the young. All the ameliorations have failed to reduce it among men between twenty-five and sixty-three. The adult mortality even increased between 1860 and 1890. There is a mystery here, but there is strong evidence that those who drink alcohol consume much more per head than did the drinkers of half a century ago. "Soaking," is, vitally speaking, a deadlier practice than occasional drunkenness. It is drink that is nullifying all the mitigations of our modern civilization. The statistics of our temperance insurance companies prove this beyond question. There is as strenuous a call, therefore, to temperance work as ever there was.

A Long Record. Mr. James Atkinson has recently celebrated his 80th birthday, and completed forty-one years as secretary of the Christian Community, a society that has done splendid work among the poor, the aged, and the necessitous. Mr. Atkinson can interest his hearers by the hour with his experiences of practical Christian effort, and his memory is brimful of instances of God's faithful care of those who have put their trust in Him—reminiscences which concern persons of whom the world has known little or nothing, but who have made a brave struggle against poverty, temptation, and sin. It is a great joy to him that through his excellent Society he has thus been God's almoner of the gifts of Christian people to relieve distress in the homes of the deserving poor; and we may confidently bespeak for him the prayers of our readers, that he who has refreshed others may himself be refreshed in his declining days; and that to him at eventide it may be light, until at last he receives the reward of a "good and faithful servant."

Crowning the Year with Goodness. Perhaps one of the best methods of bringing Coronation year home to the hearts of the poor will be that of helping, in however small a degree, in that war against misery which is being waged untiringly by so many admirable societies. An appeal has just been made on behalf of that section of the Ragged-School Union which deals with the task of sending about 7,000 neglected children to holiday homes in the country for a fortnight, and of giving some 30,000 others a bright day away from the metropolis. To enable this struggle against "gloom, airlessness and hopelessness" to be carried on, the Union depends entirely upon voluntary help, and undoubtedly the present year, when there will be so much glitter and noisy show, seems an especially suitable one for practical consideration of the claims of the waifs upon the fringe of our civilization.

The Coronation and the Churches. We should have thought that if any event could have had the effect of uniting all the churches in a common service, that event would be the Coronation of our King. Edward VII. is not the King of one section of the nation, but the monarch of the whole empire, and all serious people will be glad to make the occasion of his Coronation one for thanksgiving and prayer. Since the event is national and not denominational, surely all the churches should be represented in the common services which will be held all over the land. We very much regret that many of the clergy are absolutely refusing to allow their Nonconformist brethren to take any part in the service of June 26, and in this action they have the active support of such papers as the Church Times. This seems to us to be unreasonable bigotry, and regrettable from every point of view. In every way it would be better to have, in every town or district, one great common service, than to emphasize denominational differences by holding sectional services.

The Argument of Ridicule. Ridicule is a weapon which should never be used whilst a better is available, but there are occasions when the only way of combatting certain errors is to pour contempt upon them. It was the prophet Elijah's method with the priests of Baal, and that of Isaiah with the idolaters of his day. We notice that several eminent ministers and scholars have, for some little time past, been treating the latest assumptions of the extreme Biblical critics in the same manner. When men, professing the Christian name, and receiving pay for teaching Christian truth, advance their destructive methods to the extent of branding the greater part of the statements of the Bible as inaccurate, miracles as incredible, Bible characters as clumsy mythical heroes, and historic places such as Nazareth non-existent—the hour for serious argument with them is past, and the only thing left is to do what Dr. Robertson Nicoll has done with Dr. Cheyne last week in the columns of the British Weekly, i.e., use the argument of ridicule. We do not argue with persons who believe the world to be flat—life is too serious to waste in frivolous disputes; and we cannot treat seriously the bizarre notions of men who seem to have lost the sense of religious balance and proportion.

A Lesson in Method. A very interesting and successful experiment has been tried in a village about twenty miles out of London. According to a contemporary, regularly on one evening a week most of the men of the place—to the number of 100—including loafers, poachers, and the like, have deserted the public-houses in order to attend a newly-formed Bible-class. The men crowd to the meetings, and even the publicans have expressed regret because they could not close their bars and come with their customers; "but," they said, "we hear about it afterwards." This experiment is a sufficient proof that under proper leadership the Bible is still capable of being made of absorbing interest to working men, if they are permitted to have a voice in the method of carrying on the class.

A Useful Handbook. There is a growing demand on the part of those who attend religious worship for a clear and thoughtful exposition of the Word of God to supplant the "moral essays" to which they are so largely treated, Sunday by Sunday. To preachers and teachers who are sincerely anxious to meet "the need of the hour," we would introduce a little book entitled, "Pictures of Christian Life and Service," by C. Edwards, of the Soldiers' Home, Winchester. (9d. Morgan & Scott.) Himself a "man of the people," the author knows what the people want, and his Bible-studies are replete with research and spiritual suggestion. Mr. Edwards conducts a robust Men's Bible-class, by which his ministry is greatly valued; and preachers may construct some very good, practical sermons out of the material provided by this handy little book.

Jesuits in England. The attempt of the Protestant Alliance to secure judicial pronouncement as to the virtual outlawry of Jesuits in England has so far failed. This is hardly surprising, for, since the passing, in the reign of George IV., of the Act under which the proceedings were initiated, many things have happened—things that greatly complicate the case. More than that, the whole trend of thought and policy has proved favourable to the Jesuits, who are now quite a host in the midst of our land. How to act is a question of great difficulty. By-and-by, action will be imperative, and England will have to follow other countries in measures of self-protection. Meantime, we cannot but deplore the stolid indifference that exists on the subject of Romish encroachments. With the history of the Jesuits before us, how can we be other than apprehensive regarding the coming days? Let us pray for Divine light and guidance, and prepare for action, as God may lead us, in the interest of religious liberty and civil freedom.

Rome and the Bible. Mr. Austin West's article in the April issue of the Contemporary Review dealing with the question of Abbé Loisy and the Roman Biblical Commission, throws strong light upon the reasons which, apparently, influenced the Pope in taking a step which (as the writer says) "marks a new epoch in the history of Roman Catholicism," since "all expert Bible knowledge has hitherto been constantly and consciously ignored." The deposition of the congregation of the index and the inquisition, and the determination to submit all Biblical problems to a new "International Pontifical Commission," is, in itself, sufficiently remarkable, but it is even more so in the light of Mr. West's remarks:—

> Throughout the length and breadth of Italy there is no sort of (Roman Catholic) society for Biblical studies. . . . Can this be wondered at when, in fact, there is no chair of Biblical criticism in the Roman Ecclesiastical schools, and when at the Gregorian and Minervan Universities—to cite only two—none of the 2,000 students who flock there annually are ever examined in Biblical knowledge, nor is any standard of proficiency demanded even from the selected group who go forth decorated as bachelors and doctors of theology?

Boy-and-Girl Marriages. A striking statistical article in one of the London dailies last week, dealing with the subject of boy-and-girl marriages, lets in a flood of light upon the causes of much of the poverty and wretchedness which abound amongst the lower classes. In London alone, it appears, there are 18,000 married persons under twenty years of age—some of them beginning as early as thirteen years. Most of these people belong to the least advanced social class, and the majority of the marriages are contracted in absolute poverty, the few domestic utensils being obtained on the hire system. In England, 56,398 married persons were returned at the last census, as under age. Separations are frequent after a short time, when the first passion has worn off. The worst of it is that the majority of the girl wives amongst the very poor are entirely undomesticated, and of course the consequences are not difficult to forecast. These continual revelations of the sources of our national weakness and misery only confirm what we and others are always insisting upon, viz., that it is the home life of this land which needs dealing with. Vast numbers of people are not only pagans in the matter of religion; they are ignorant of the first principles of domestic economy and of their own physical life.

Who Are "Evangelical"?

WHAT is the meaning of the term "Evangelical"? We ask the question in view of the laxity that has come with recent years. A generation ago the term was much more clearly defined than now; to-day it is claimed by men who have boldly removed the "ancient landmarks," and by others whose teaching and belief is coloured by every conceivable shade of "modern thought."

In Nonconformity, especially, the word is applied comprehensively to churches and ministers, without sufficient regard to their teaching concerning the Virgin Birth and Divinity of our Lord, or his Atoning Sacrifice. The assumption is that the Methodist, Presbyterian, Baptist, and Congregational denominations are entirely Evangelical, and therefore all their churches are federated in a common bond.

Undoubtedly these denominations, as a whole, are Evangelical, but they as certainly embrace churches which in every honest sense are non-Evangelical, and prominence is occasionally given to men who are pronouncedly so.

Consequently the word "Evangelical" is distorted out of all recognition and meaning.

One effect of this abuse is that when a really Evangelical Nonconformist congregation seeks a pastor, the greatest difficulty is experienced in "locating" the candidate in such a wide area. Of course, no minister "on trial" can cover even a moderate range of theology in one or two sermons, but if, in view of this, church members in council venture to inquire as to what the candidate really believes, they are met with protests against "raising theological tests" or "forming themselves into a court of orthodoxy." Was ever a more unreasoning contention made! Surely a congregation has, above all things, a right to know what a prospective minister believes and intends to teach; and whatever else may remain unasked or unheeded, his doctrinal position should be unmistakably made known.

But, we are told, if this were so, "no self-respecting minister would preach with a view to such a pastorate." This we do not for a moment believe; but, if it were true, there are matters of even greater moment to a Christian Church and a dying world than even a minister's self-respect.

It is high time that Evangelical people and churches put their foot down and stood for what they believe. Let the others do the same; then all will know where they stand. But so far from a congregation being denied the right to inquire as to a minister's belief, that question is, above all others, the most important—just as in the case of a physician or lawyer, his knowledge of the subject he essays to teach is his paramount claim to practise his profession!

We have heard the term "Evangelical" defined as loyalty to the Gospel as defined by St. Paul; and acceptance of the supernatural in the birth and ministry of our Lord, in Holy Scripture, and in the regeneration of the human heart—the last, as distinct from the advocacy of mere moral development or evolution of character. Whether this covers the whole ground, some may be disposed to question; but it may at least be taken as a practical working basis in a church in which a moderate difference of opinion may exist. It may certainly be regarded as a minimum of Evangelical theology; and we think that the leaders of religious thought should fearlessly face the present unsatisfactory condition of things, and take uncompromising steps to effect a change.

Practical Papers.

On "PARENTAL PERPLEXITIES."

AMONG the many perplexities that harass us in these days, is the attitude of the rising generation to the things of God. The last ten or twenty years have witnessed a decided reaction from restrictions which were formerly associated with religion. The wider spread of education, the increase of personal liberty both in thought and action, the multiplication of books—all these and many other causes have contributed to a state of unsettlement and unrest. We are in a distinctively transition period, and one in which young people find it difficult to plant their feet firmly for God and for his truth.

It is not their fault that they are born at such a time (call it their misfortune, if you will); but one of the most important of all parental duties is to lead them gently and lovingly on to terra firma. It is not breaking they need, but bending; not chiselling, but moulding.

Too many parents content themselves with laying down the law; and demanding conformity to it in a manner which has in numberless instances repelled the young from the ways of pleasantness and the paths of peace in which true religion invites them to walk, and has driven them, later, into the dismal wilds of un-belief.

When I was a lad, I went to Switzerland with my father and brother. One day, while traversing a glacier, I stood upon what appeared to be a patch of solid ground, but which was really a mass of loose earth upon the face of the ice. Gradually my weight caused it to move and slide downward towards a crevasse. I called out to my father for help. He did not scold me for going upon such a dangerous spot, nor command me to leave it; but holding on to a rock with one hand, he stretched out his alpenstock with the other; and, as I seized it, he drew me gently into a place of safety.

The wisdom of his action was apparent. Had he pulled with a rough and angry jerk, my hand would have failed to hold the only available means of help, and I should have slid on, probably to destruction. May we not learn the lesson in dealing with the—perhaps foolhardy, perhaps sincere—young people who, from whatever cause, find themselves, accidentally or otherwise, in slippery places to-day?

Note that my father himself stood upon firm and unmovable ground. Had it been otherwise, he could not have assisted me. Parents who lament the unpromising attitude of their children to the truths that they themselves hold dear, must see to it that both in faith and conduct they are on firm ground themselves, and have a strong grip of the Rock of Ages.

We mourn the apparent lack of interest of young people in the Word of God. Have we tried to convince them that we really and experimentally believe it ourselves? Do they see that it lights our path and directs our steps, that we place its precepts uncompromisingly above our own desires, that its principles unerringly rule our conduct? Let us get firm hold of God and of his truth ourselves; then we shall inspire them with confidence, so that they may without hesitation commit themselves to our guidance.

Of the many causes which contribute to present-day declension, we may refer more particularly to three:—

1. The Neglect of the Lord's Day.—The rigid observance which characterized the times of our forefathers has to a large extent passed away, and in many Christian homes there is now a laxity which has gone to the other extreme. We cannot afford, as families or as a nation, to ignore the claims of the Day of God. They must be enforced both by precept and example. But this must be done in an attractive way.

When John B. Gough was a child, he was taken with a stern hand by his parents to their place of worship; set upon a hard, high bench, with his "little legs dangling in the air" (as he pathetically describes it). There was no feature in the entire proceedings in any way calculated to inspire his interest; and, after he had sat through a long, wearisome service, the congregation would rise and sing of that happy home—

> Where congregations ne'er break up
> And Sabbaths have no end!

Small wonder that he had no wish to go there!

It is a hopeful feature of to-day that in many places of worship a brief address is given to the children. But we, as parents, are more concerned with the Sabbath in our homes. Let us try to make it bright. It is a good plan to reserve some interesting occupation for that day—some books or pictures which are put away during the week that they may be studied with greater zest when Sunday comes. Let them be regarded as a treat, not as a penance; and, speaking of penance, let me earnestly plead that the learning or writing out of Scripture be never given as a punishment, on Sunday or any other day. I have known the saddest instances of positive detestation of the Bible from this cause, which it has taken years to eradicate.

2. The Criticism of the Bible.—There has been a terrible unsettling, due to loose and careless theories of the inspiration of the Word of God. Here, above all things, parents must know where they stand themselves. Whatever their views of inspiration may be, they must convince themselves, before they can convince their children, what the Bible really is—that they are not free to accept or reject just those portions which they like or dislike; that it is, indeed, the Word of God, given to us for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness. Teach young people how to "search the Scriptures," that they may find therein "the words of eternal life." Dig deeper than the letter, and reveal the spirit; show them that, beneath and above all disputes as to dates and authorship, are the outstanding precepts and principles which make for holiness of living. Let the Word speak for itself and impress upon their hearts its own inherent truth and force.

Though we may hold firmly to the historical view of the stories of Jonah or of the prodigal son, yet, for practical purposes (whether these be parable or actual fact), the prime necessity is to learn the inspired lesson that disobedience spells disaster, and that the rebellious heart can only find rest in the mercy and love of God. If our children grasp the spiritual, the natural will fall into its appointed place. Take care of the kernel, and the shell will take care of itself.

3. The Modern Novel. If young people do not read the Bible they will read something else. What is that something else to be? One per cent. may read science; perhaps, five per cent. may study history; for certain, ninety per cent. will read fiction.

There are, of course, novels and novels. Some few become classics; the majority are death-traps to spirituality. There are some whose only feature is sensationalism, and their value is easily estimated at a very large nought.

There are others that come with a more specious claim upon our attention, dealing as they do, truly or untruly, with the verities of the Christian faith. Clad in the garb of the saint, too many of them reveal, upon more intimate acquaintance, the horns and hoofs of the Devil; and instil into the mind the most insidious poison. An author, from some cause or other, gets "a bee in his bonnet" in regard to some religious truth hard to be understood; or some grievance against the professors of religion; or some specious theory which he desires to foist upon the unwary; and many studious and thoughtful young people, being insufficiently familiar with Scripture to ward off the attack, fall an easy prey to the writer's cross-grained complaint, or hare-brained imagination.

Find out what your children read; do not forbid a book without giving an adequate reason for your prohibition (they will only read it in secret, if you do!); take pains to show them the fallacies that you detect. Inspire their imagination by a recital of the deeds of God. Kindle their ambition to know more of the Lord who alone worketh great marvels. This is what Israelitish fathers were bidden to do, and it is a useful model for us to imitate. Choke error by planting truth; sow the seed of the Word, that the tares may have no room to thrive. Remember that young people are inexperienced and pliable, easily influenced by the opinions of others. Let your opinion be paramount with them; but, to ensure this, you must convince them of its reasonableness.

Before Christ bids us, "Learn of Me," He says, "Come unto Me"—the spirit of kindness and consideration precedes that of instruction; and both before and after the suggestion of learning, He holds out the attractive promise of rest. Not until our children feel they can come to us with their difficulties, confident of our sympathy and willingness to help, can we hope to teach them aright. Instead, then, of scolding them, let us hold out a promise of the restfulness found in the "more excellent way." G.

Devotedness.

Begone each earthborn tie and bond,
Begone affection deep and fond,
That Christ does not partake.
Have I a box of alabaster
Which is not broken for the Master,
To which my heart but clings the faster?
Help me my box to break.

Oh, break whatever it may be,
That holdeth back my heart from Thee,
Who died my heart to win.
All other love, however dear,
However old, or strong, or near,
Of which Thou art not theme and sphere,
Is only polished sin.

All other love would cease to flow,
But thine no chill nor change can know,
In spite of ill return.
The source of thine is not in me,
In what I am, or I can be.
The deep, deep spring is found in Thee.
It cannot cease to burn.

Upon my callous heart impress
The depth and height of all thy grace,
That I may love Thee more.
That Thou canst call a worm thy treasure,
That Thou canst find in me thy pleasure,
Tells of a love that none can measure,
But worship and adore. Selected.

Through the Grating.—It appears, from a volume just issued upon "The Convents of Great Britain," from the pen of Miss Francesca Steele, that there are over ninety congregations of nuns settled in Great Britain, and that the number of separate communities of such, each possessing a separate chapel, is over 600. Allowing, at any rate, ten or twelve sisters to each establishment, the number of nuns domiciled in this country must be about 7,000—surely a sufficient ground for State inspection of convents in England.

Samuel and Saul.

Failure Under the Supreme Test.

(1 Sam. xv. 26.)

By Rev. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

ON the shores of the Dead Sea, encrusted with salt, lie the trunks of many noble trees which have been torn from their roots, and carried by the rapid Jordan in its flow from the uplands of Galilee towards the depression of that remarkable gorge; and as they line those desolate shores they remind us of lives which God planted to bear fruit and give shade, which have not fulfilled his original purpose in their creation, and which have been torn up by the roots and borne down to the sea of death. Conspicuous among such failures is that of Saul, the first king of Israel. This chapter gives the story of his final rejection, which had indeed been threatened aforetime, but which now befel.

I. The Test of the Divine Summons and Command.—"Go and smite Amalek, and utterly destroy all that they have, and spare them not; but slay both man and woman, infant and suckling, ox and sheep, camel and ass" (v. 3).

This command was given after several years had intervened from the incident narrated in the previous chapter; and during those years Saul had met with marvellous encouragement. The handful of men who had followed him, trembling, had increased to a great army, properly disciplined and armed, and led by Abner, his uncle. He had also waged very successful wars against Moab and the children of Ammon on the East, against Edom on the South, and against the kings of Zobah on the North. He had also gathered around him considerable state, for we find the royal table was reserved for himself, Abner, and Jonathan; that he was surrounded by a bodyguard of runners; and that his will was law. The kingdom that had been inaugurated amid such adverse circumstances was beginning to enforce respect, and Saul was able to vie, both in the magnificence of his state and in the army that followed him, with the kings of the lands that bordered on Canaan.

THE DANGERS OF PROSPERITY.

It was at this time that the supreme test entered his life, as it so often comes to us in days of prosperity. In the warm summer days we are most in dread of corruption and contagion, and it is in these days of prosperity that the soul is oftenest subjected, not realizing the significance of the ordeal, to its supreme test. If of late you have had immunity from special adversity, if your circumstances have been easy and comfortable, if paths that were once difficult have become smooth and easy—be on your guard; for, at such a time as ye think not, the Son of Man comes to call you to his bar.

You will notice, also, that this supreme test gave him a final chance of retrieving the past. At Gilgal, years before, God had told him by the lips of Samuel that his kingdom should not continue; but there had been no sentence of his own deposition or rejection, and it seemed as though this last command was put into his life to give him an opportunity of wiping out his former failure.

God often comes to us, when we have made some sad and apparently irretrievable mistake. He gives us yet another opportunity of reversing the past, as when our Lord said to his disciples in the Garden of the Olive-press: "Sleep on now, and take your rest;" a moment afterwards adding, "Arise, let us be going," as though a fresh opportunity would be afforded of fellowship in his sufferings.

The Divine command involved the absolute extermination of the Amalekites; for the word translated "utterly destroy," would be better rendered devote. It is the word so often used in the Book of Joshua for placing under the ban the sin-infected cities of the Canaanites. It was understood that, in the case of the "devoted" city, man, woman and child, and the very beasts, must be destroyed, and only the precious metals kept, after being passed through the fires of purification. With such absolute devastation and destruction was the name of Amalek to be wiped out from under heaven.

THE CURSE UPON AMALEK.

There had been feud between Amalek and Israel from the earliest days. "Thus saith the Lord of hosts, I have marked that which Amalek did to Israel, how he set himself against him in the way, when he came up out of Egypt" (v. 2). You will remember that Moses reared an altar, and called it Jehovah-nissi—"the Lord my banner"; because he said that the Lord would have war with Amalek, until He had wiped out the reproach of his people (Ex. xvii. 16). Centuries had passed, and this ancient threat had remained unfulfilled until this hour struck, and the command was given, "Go and smite Amalek."

At first it seems very terrible that God demanded this act of obedience from Saul; but on the other hand the Amalekites, as we are told in v. 18, were sinners of a very black and aggravated type. We learn also from v. 33 that Agag with his sword had often made women childless. A very cruel and rapacious tribe of robbers were these Amalekites, who were constantly making raids upon the southern frontier of Judah. It was absolutely necessary, therefore, for the safety of the chosen people, that their power to injure should be permanently arrested, and their claws drawn.

Remember that Saul was only called to do summarily and suddenly that which otherwise would follow in the natural process of decay, for God has so constituted us that when we sin against the laws of truth, purity, and righteousness, decay immediately sets in by an inevitable law. If Amalek had never been attacked by Saul and his hosts, the vices that were already at work in the heart of the people must have led to the utter undoing and consumption of the nation. It is said of families in our great cities, infected with the evils that are rife among us, that in five generations they die out, having lost the power of self-propagation; and what is true of a family is equally so of a nation.

SAUL'S FATAL ERROR.

II. Obedience with Reserve.—The story is told us in v. 9: "But Saul and the people spared Agag." When he raised his standard, 200,000 footmen from Israel, and 10,000 men of Judah, Benjamin, and Simeon gathered around it at Telaim, on the southern frontier; and they came to the chief city of Amalek, which lay, probably, a little to the south of Hebron. After lying in ambush in some dry water-course, or wady, and having given notice to the Kenites—a peaceful, friendly people—to depart, the attacking army carried the city by assault, put to the sword men, women, and children; pursued the fleeing remnants of the Amalekites from Havilah even to Shur, the great wall of Egypt; and with the exception of Agag, and a few that may have escaped, and the choice of the flocks and herds, the whole country was rid of its inhabitants, and reduced to the deathlike silence of an awful solitude.

Saul returned, flushed with triumph, reared a monument of victory in the oasis of Carmel, near to Hebron; and then came down to the sacred site of Gilgal, that he might sacrifice to the Lord, and perhaps divide the vast plunder of sheep and goats, of oxen and camels, which had fallen into his hands, which he and the people had been loth to destroy.

Whether this reserve was due, so far as Saul was concerned, to greed, as appears most likely, or because, as he says in v. 24, he feared to thwart the people, obeying their voice rather than the voice of God, we cannot decide; but considerable light is thrown on the incident by the startling expression used by Samuel in v. 19, when he says, "Why didst thou fly upon the spoil?" employing the same expression as in chapter xiv. 32, where we are told that the people, in their ravenous hunger, flew upon the spoil, and ate even with the blood. The same passionate vehemence seems to have characterized Saul, and the men of Israel. Surely rapacity and greed were at work, and before the boiling current, all the bulwarks of principle and conscience were swept away.

THE POINT OF FAILURE.

There is great significance in this for us all. We are prepared to obey the Divine commands up to a certain point, and there we stay. Just so soon as "the best and choicest" begin to be touched, we draw the line and refuse further compliance. We listen to soft voices that bid us stay our hand, when our Isaac is on the altar. We are quite prepared to give up that which costs us nothing—our money, but not our children, to the missionary cause; the things which are clearly and disgracefully wrong, but not the self-indulgences which are peculiarly fascinating to our temperament. Skin for skin, yea, all that a man hath, will he give for his life—only spare him that, and he will cheerfully renounce his claim to all besides. There is always a tendency with the best of us to make a bargain with God, and sacrifice all to his will, if only He will permit us to spare Agag and the best of the spoil.

But an even deeper reading of this story is permissible. Throughout the Bible Amalek stands for the flesh, having sprung from the stock of Esau, who, for a morsel of meat, steaming fragrantly in the air, sold his birthright. To spare the best of Amalek is surely equivalent to sparing some root of evil, some plausible indulgence, some favourite sin. For us, Agag must stand for that evil propensity, which exists in all of us, for self-gratification; and to spare Agag is to be merciful to ourselves, to exonerate and palliate our failures, and to condone our besetting sin.

Is this your case? You are willing to give Christ the key of every cupboard in your heart, save one; but that contains your most cherished sin, for which you find manifold excuses, and to retain which you are prepared to sacrifice everything else. Thus Ananias and Sapphira kept back part of the price, and were cut off from the ranks of the Church.

It is startling to learn that Saul perished, on the field of Gilboa, by the hand of an Amalekite (2 Sam i. 1-10). What a remarkable fact! The least instructed can decipher the lesson. He who runs may read. If we spare ourselves, forbearing to cut off the right hand or foot which may be causing us to offend, we shall certainly perish by the hand of that which we refused to part with. Our cherished indulgences will bring about our undoing. The love of God, foreseeing the risk we are incurring, pleads with us to destroy without mercy the enemies of our own peace; but Agag comes to us delicately, and we forbear to inflict the Divine sentence; and presently we are stricken by the hand of the assassin, dye the green sward with our life-blood, and are despoiled of our crown, which is transferred to another.

Moreover, presently, Samuel arrives to speak the Divine sentence of deposition: "Because thou hast rejected the word of the Lord, the Lord hath rejected thee from being king."

"Our Daily Bread."

SUNDAY, May 4. Leviticus ix.

AT the end of the previous chapter we leave Aaron and his sons eating of the bread from the basket of consecration, and remaining within the precincts of the tabernacle. This lasted for eight days, which is the symbol of Resurrection. Surely we cannot miss this lesson. During this dispensation, which is to close with the manifestation of the sons of God, we are hidden with Christ in God, and meanwhile are called to feed on the riches of Divine grace, consecrated and set apart for spiritual sacrifices.

At the close of this period Aaron was commanded to offer a sin-offering, as though sin had mingled with the holy sojourn within the sacred shrine, for our holiest services require the touch of the cleansing blood. Thereafter he offered a burnt-offering, as betokening his entire surrender to the Divine Will.

Notice verses 4, 6, and 23—they tell how the glory of the Lord was associated with the fulfilment of the seven days of secret fellowship and ministry, followed by this eighth day of manifestation. "Aaron lifted up his hands in blessing . . . the glory of the Lord appeared . . . and all the people saw it." Surely this is a prophecy of things not seen as yet, when our Saviour shall appear with his saints, and shall bless, in the first place, his own chosen people. He has been hidden from their eyes for a time that He may be given them for ever. When Israel shall be turned away from the sins which have come between them and the Messiah, then shall come the restitution of all things, and days of heaven upon earth (Acts iii. 19-26).

MONDAY, May 5. Leviticus x.

What a sad and tragic story is unfolded here! How surely it teaches, that whatever be the outward privileges which God confers on us, there is ever the terrible liability that we should misuse them, and wreck his fair design. The sin of Aaron's sons was that they substituted strange fire for the fire of the altar. Was it mere negligence, or wilful disobedience? Or was it that they had fallen under the power of strong drink, which from that moment was strictly prohibited (v. 9)? The plain fact remains, that there had been a distinct violation of the Divine commandment, and a disregard of that careful reverence and holiness which God required (v. 3).

What a solemn warning is here for all who hold holy office in God's house; and who, though not pretending to the priestly functions, are called to handle the sacred doctrines, and engage in the service of the sanctuary. Too often we have offered strange fire! Through some inconsistency of the inner life we have failed to obtain a spark of the true fire of the Holy Ghost, and have tried to make good our failure in the eyes of our fellows by the strange fire of our rhetoric, or vehemence, or exciting words! Too often we have preached ourselves, and not Christ Jesus our Lord! And it is of the Lord's mercies that we have not been removed from his service.

"Aaron held his peace." He felt deeply; but pursued his ministry, as though he realized the justice of the Divine sentence and sought to identify his will with God's. But God graciously cared for his child, and when his inward grief made him forget one item of the intricate ritual, the mistake was graciously condoned. Nadab and Abihu presumptuously and wilfully offered strange fire, but Eleazar and Ithamar failed through grief to eat the sin-offering. For the former, a sin of presumption, there was judgment; for the latter, a failure accounted for by natural grief, there was mercy.

TUESDAY, May 6. Leviticus xi.

All believers are priests unto God (1 Pet. ii. 5). It is abundantly clear in this book that the priests and people of the Old Covenant were strictly under law, even as regards their food. They were called upon to make a difference between the clean and the unclean, between what might and what might not be eaten. For ourselves, though of course not bound by this dietary (Acts x. 11-16; 1 Tim. iv. 4-5), it is often wise for sanitary reasons to adopt it, especially when travelling in hot climates; but above all, let us heed what food we take into mind and heart. As we feed, so we are.

Holy men have elicited much spiritual instruction from the combination of the chewing of the cud with the divided hoof. They have pointed out that there is an intimate connection between the inward digestion of the Word of God, which may be compared to the former, and the character of the daily walk, which adopts the rule of separation, of which the latter may be taken as the symbol. The inward life must lie down to ruminate on the Word of God, and the outward walk must be separated from all known sin.

All the inhabitants of the waters, such as oysters, which had not fins and scales, were forbidden, probably because their feeding was unclean. All carnivorous birds were forbidden, and winged creatures that crept on the ground. Not only eating, but contact was prohibited (vv. 8, 24, 26-28, 31-41). And the reason for this awful care is clearly revealed (vv. 43-45). The fact is that God is Holy, and those who minister to Him must be holy also; and when we are tempted to listen to, to read, or to consider that which might contaminate, we must meet it with the most absolute refusal.

WEDNESDAY, May 7. Leviticus xii.

From this chapter we are taught that when a man child was born, the mother was rendered ceremonially unclean, and was separated from the sanctuary for thirty-three days. In the case of a maid child, these periods were doubled. Does not this remind us of the words of two of God's Spirit-taught servants, of whom one says, "How can he be clean that is born of a woman?" and the other, "I was shapen in iniquity, and in sin did my mother conceive me" (Job xxv. 4; Psa. li. 5)?

Here, too, is the ordinance of circumcision, which must have its counterpart in each of us, if we would belong to the true family of God—the putting off of the body of the flesh by a circumcision not made with hands (Col. ii. 11).

It is as instructive as it is interesting to see the graduated scale of offerings. "If her means suffice not." "To the poor the Gospel is preached," even in this ancient and somewhat rigorous code-book. God asks only for that which is within the compass of our powers. From those of great faith and gift, He requires the utmost they can give. But if your faith is weak, your knowledge limited, your capacity small, bring Him what you can, and it shall be accepted, according to what you have, and not according to what you have not. It is touching to recall Luke ii. 24, and to remember that the parents of our Lord were too poor to procure even the lamb, and had to content themselves with the two young pigeons. Let us adore "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, who, though He was rich, yet for our sakes He became poor, that we through his poverty might become rich."

THURSDAY, May 8. Leviticus xiii.

Leprosy—one of the most loathsome diseases by which human nature can be afflicted—furnishes a most vivid and terrible view of sin.

It required the most careful examination. "The priest shall look"; "the priest shall shut up him that hath the plague seven days"; "he shall shut him up seven days more." From such words we gather that our great High Priest is most careful and deliberate in forming his conclusions. He will not exclude us from his fellowship and service, unless it is proved beyond doubt that the evil from which we are suffering is one of our deliberate choice and will. God distinguishes between sins of ignorance and of presumption. A skin-blemish might not be the defiling brand of leprosy; yet it might be caused by some deep spring of disease, which would presently spread through the whole nature; and the most careful investigation was needful lest a mistake should be made (vv. 2-11). The Son of Man will not break the bruised reed, nor quench the smoking flax.

When the presence of leprosy was placed beyond a doubt, the leper was attired in a special garb and isolated from the assembly of God's people (vv. 45, 46). Here, too, is a striking emblem of the power of sin to shut off the soul from fellowship with the saints. Nothing is so absolutely destructive of that blessed communion, by which soul may be knit to soul in Christ Jesus, than permitted sin.

The "garments" of the closing paragraph are evidently the habits of our life. If there is any suspicion of their being contaminated, we must forthwith burn them lest the evil spread. Every suspicious symptom and trait must be sedulously dealt with lest it become a spreading leprosy.

FRIDAY, May 9. Leviticus xiv.

The leper must dwell without the camp, but the priest would go out to him. Yes, we may be excluded from the fellowship of God's people, but Jesus will find us out, and come to us. He is not ashamed to identify Himself with us, though He hates our sins. He will put forth his hand and touch us, so that the leprosy may depart.

What a beautiful emblem is presented in the two birds, of which the one represents his death whose blood was shed for our cleansing, and the other represents the resurrection of Him who hath ascended to the right hand of God on our behalf. Yes, and surely we may see the forgiven sinner in the flight of that emancipated bird in the open field. We have risen together with Christ, and sit with Him in the heavenlies, far above principalities and powers.

After the priest had fulfilled the initial rites, the cleansed leper had to wait for a further week, during which he had to perform certain acts, which may be taken to symbolize that putting off of the old, and putting on of the new, which touches specially the realm of habit, and is so absolutely essential, if we are to please God (Eph. iv. 17-24). Then, on the eighth day—the type of resurrection—there were the cleansing and anointing of the members (14-17). As each of our members has been defiled by sin, so each must be cleansed and anointed for the Divine service. We must not only seek to realize the sin-offering with its forgiveness, but the burnt-offering with its consecration; then also we may feed on Jesus, as the bread of our life (v. 20).

In the provision for the detection and cleansing of leprosy in a house (v. 33, &c.), we have deep lessons suggested as to the churches of the saints. The High Priest is ever searching them and seeking to deliver from the taint of uncleanness (Rev. i., ii.), and, thank God, there is atonement and cleansing for all (v. 23).

SATURDAY, May 10. Leviticus xv.

This is a chapter for private study rather than for public reading. But its lessons ought to be considered by those of mature growth, because we are reminded that there is nothing in our most private or secret life that God accounts a matter of indifference. All is dealt with by his Word, because all reacts on our standing and ministry. He is a holy God and searches all hearts. From Him no secrets are hid. He requires truth in the inward parts. In our most private actions, and in the most hidden dealings with others, we must pass his test of perfect holiness. Nothing is indifferent, nothing trivial, nothing unworthy of notice. We must be separated from all uncleanness, whether of the flesh or spirit (compare v. 31 with 2 Cor. vi. 1), else we shall suffer from the taint of death, and defile the sanctuary.

The matters referred to in this chapter did not entail quite the same loss as did leprosy, as appears from the difference which pertained between the values of the respective sacrifices. In the present case, turtle-doves and young pigeons only were required from all. But there were to be constant ablutions. Repeatedly we are told that the unclean were to wash themselves in running, i.e., "living" water. Let us be reminded of the constant necessity of availing ourselves of "the washing of water by the Word," by which we are kept clean in our Master's eyes, and enabled to walk before Him without condemnation. It is only by great care, watching, study of the Word, and reliance on the grace of the Holy Spirit, that we can walk so as to please God.

Other Lands.

Irish Presbyterians in Western India.

THE Irish Presbyterian Mission does its work chiefly in the villages. Probably no country in the world is so thickly studded with villages as India.

Miss Lilian S. Stevenson, a sister of Rev. J. S. Stevenson, of Parantij, who spent the winter of her visit in looking after the orphans, has written, "Our Famine Legacy," in which she gives some account of the children received into the orphanages of the Irish Presbyterian Mission in Gujerat and Kathiawar. It is a graphic, sad story, full of pathos and of pictures. It may be obtained for 4d., post free, at the I.P.M. Office, 12, May Street, Belfast.

During the famine of 1900, which was the worst of the century, not less than a fourth of the population of Gujerat perished through starvation and consequent disease. During that sad year Robert Gillespie, the senior missionary, and R. B. Macwhinney, in the flower of a youth full of promise, fell victims to cholera; and Wm. Mulligan, "capable in business and spiritual in nature," and Mrs. J. F. Steele, "mother of the motherless, feeder of the hungry, tender of babes," laid down their lives in trying to save the famine stricken. In the two days we spent at Ahmedabad, as the guests of Rev. J. F. Steele, a little before Christmas, we observed the lively and kindly interest which a young lady doctor, Miss Egan, B.A., LL.B., took in the children. Now she also has been called home, when her earthly service had scarcely begun. She only came out in 1899.

Prompt measures were taken by the Government on a scale unexampled in famine records, and in June of 1900 there were between five and six millions employed on Government works or receiving gratuitous relief.

PURBLIND CRITICISM.

One of the most nauseous forms of insincerity or misrepresentation which one hears in India is the praise sometimes bestowed on Hinduism, and the contempt cast upon missionaries, by men of our own country, who seem colour-blind to the impurities of the idolatry they praise, and to the faithfulness unto death of the servants of God whom they contemn.

But the famine of 1900 stopped the mouths of these vain talkers. It was the missionaries' opportunity, and they availed themselves of it to the full. They added their help of the starving to that of the Government, with all the advantage derived from an intimate knowledge of the people, and from a reliable Christian native agency in the administration of relief. They opened cheap grain shops, and thus interposed between the grasping money-lenders and their victims. All the mission agents worked well, and though large sums passed through the hands of some of them, not a penny was known to have been misappropriated. "The Government, the missionaries, and the railways were all praised by the common people. The land as a whole is still heathen, but Christianity, as represented by a Christian Government and Christian missionaries, has made a distinct advance in the estimation of the people."

THE HORRORS OF FAMINE.

One of the horrible effects of famine is the death in many of natural affection. Of this the Scripture gives us more than one extreme and loathsome picture. Children in this famine were deserted by their own relations; some parents never came to claim their children, and others robbed them of their food and ate it themselves. In these and other ways the hard cruelty of heathenism has many lives to answer for. Yet there was another side even to this repulsive picture. "The frequent sight of a couple of sickly feeble elder children, with a baby brother in comparatively good condition, told of a child's self-sacrifice. Most of these only staggered in to die; their little charges have in a few cases rewarded the life laid down and are bright little fellows to-day—not many, however. It was hard to bring any of the tiny children through the valley of the shadow of the famine year."

Another great advantage of missionary relief is that moral training is regarded as of more importance than teaching from books. Cleanliness, order, obedience, truth, honesty, kindness, fair play are studiously inculcated. And to be well grounded in primary and useful knowledge is regarded as more necessary than advanced studies upon an ill-laid foundation of undigested learning.

From our recollection of Miss Carruthers' very successful kindergarten schools at Pisa, and from some experiences we have lately had in Burmah of the effects of similar training on little mites from four to six years old, we are not surprised that Miss Stevenson should say, "A missionary trained in kindergarten methods would be of much value." Seeing that the hope of the future necessarily lies so largely in the children, it would seem desirable that every young woman missionary should possess this training.

With regard to industries this Mission evidently prefers, for the future of its children (of whom they have 1,500 in their seventeen orphanages), to see them settled in the Christian villages, which are one of its marked features. With a nucleus of established orphans it is much easier, they say, for new-comers to feel at home. And the children trust and believe one another more readily than an adult or a stranger. Out of five native pastors three were brought up in the orphanages, and it is hoped that not a few will be called to "the work of an evangelist" among their own people. But most of them will probably become artizans or farmers. This raises the great question of INDUSTRIAL WORK.

If (say these missionaries) the chief aim were to make such work pay at the earliest possible moment, the simpler way would be to gather the children into two big institutions, and start a small factory—weaving, soap-making, or the like.

In spite, however, of the many advantages of the larger institution system—in lessening expense, in providing efficient mental and moral training with greater ease and completeness, in allowing one man to be set apart for orphanage work alone, and that this plan is widely adopted by other orphanages—the method already tried successfully in this Mission has been unanimously preferred. The limitation of the number in an orphanage to about a hundred is in their judgment more conducive to health, and more free from unhealthy moral surroundings, than if extended to 600 or 700. It is better that the orphanages should be scattered all over the Mission, so that the children see and are surrounded by an independent Christian community.

Three industries, however, are carried on on a definite plan—carpentry, cane-work, and tape-weaving. One thing must be kept in mind with regard to industrial work. In a land where trades are hereditary, and are more confined to castes than even in the trade guilds of the Middle Ages, it is obvious that unskilled labour will not win its way. If these children are to rise above the level of the field labourers, they must have time, patience, and skill expended on the training of both brain and hand.

AMONG THE BHEELS.

We spent a few hours at Dohad, a country station at the foot of hills inhabited by Bheels, an aboriginal tribe. Dr. and Mrs. McNeill were about to leave on furlough, and Mr. Hanna, a young missionary, had just arrived to supply their place, and to learn the language. Dr. McNeill gives in one sentence an idea of the famine year. "The Bheels killed and ate their cattle; there was no fodder to be had, and they could get more for the skin than for the live animal. Then they took the tiles off their houses, and sold them for food; then the pillars and beams went, one by one; then the mill and plough. Sad, sad it was to see them grow thinner every day, but they would preserve their independence to the last; and, when all had gone, preferred to die by the roadside rather than go to the poor-house. . . . One of the sad effects of the famine is that now many of the Bheels are not ashamed to beg."

Dr. McNeill told us that one morning before breakfast he gathered up more than 400 corpses. It is very painful to think that in Western India they are again beginning to pass through experiences similar in kind; we can but pray that they may be less terrible in degree.

The reports of these missionaries from their different stations are of much interest. The shadows are thrown in as well as the lights—the discouragements and apparent failures no less than the evident successes. As the missionaries are "the messengers of the churches and the glory of Christ," ought not this always to be the case? R. Cope Morgan.

The Empress Dowager of China.

THERE is probably no man living to-day who is so well qualified to judge of the missionary outlook in China as Dr. W. A. P. Martin, of Peking, who reached New York recently from the Chinese capital. He has made his home in Peking since 1863, spending more than forty years in the service of the Imperial Government, his last appointment being that of President of the Imperial University. He went through the siege of the Legations in Peking.

On arrival at Vancouver, Dr. Martin found a telegram from the great Yangtsze Viceroy Ch'ang Ch'ih T'ung, asking him to take charge of a new university in his capital, besides becoming his own adviser on international questions. The doctor intends to return to China to take up this position next summer.

In an interesting account of the advance of Christianity in China, he said that he thought the outlook had never been so good. Education is everywhere in the air. Colleges and graded schools are ordered to be established in the provinces, and the presses of the missions are unable to turn out scientific books fast enough to meet the demand of readers.

Concerning the Empress Dowager, Dr. Martin said:—"To my certain knowledge she had progressive ideas during the minority of the present Emperor, and I think that some of the Imperial edicts that caused the reactionary element at Court to call upon her to come from her seclusion and save the Empire, were originally suggested by herself. But having been recalled to power by the conservatives, she threw herself into their arms, took a back track, and abolished the liberal measures that had been adopted. After the relief of the Legations she again displayed liberality towards progressive ideas, which some people thought to be merely intended to deceive foreigners. But this is quite in keeping with her earlier history, during which she had the young Emperor instructed in English. His teachers had formerly been pupils of my own, and they brought me his lessons to correct. I understand she is studying English herself, and that she uses it when she can. When she received the ladies of the foreign legations last February, she took them into her private apartments, where she threw herself on her couch at full length to show her guests how she slept, and then invited them to follow her example and see "how it felt" to lie down on the imperial couch, and whether they would be comfortable on it. That was a curious revelation of character in one of the most (hitherto) unapproachable women in history, of the most powerful woman that China has yet produced, and the woman who holds in her hands to-day the destinies of that great Empire.

"She has become satisfied through her recent defeat that China can never conquer the foreign Powers by force of arms, but that if she wishes to maintain continual peace she must push modern education through the Empire, and by strengthening it in this way bar any aggression on the part of Western nations." Roger Martin.

The Simplon Tunnel Mission.

EVER since the great undertaking of boring the Simplon Tunnel was commenced, three years ago, a work of evangelization has been carried on among the Italians employed on the Italian side. From the beginning, the work has steadily grown and prospered. It now embraces public Evangelical services in a large hall on the old diligence road, a day-school with 130 scholars and a staff of three teachers, a Sunday-school frequented by a large proportion of the day school children, and a night-school and reading-room for adults. All these branches are located in commodious premises admirably situated near the centre of the works, and secured to the use of the Mission, as is also the minister's residence, free of rent.

The work has been from the beginning conducted on purely Gospel lines. Bitter polemics have been carefully avoided. The one aim has been to bring souls to Christ, and to subject them to his sway. Much fruit has been borne; a living Church has grown up; drunkards and men of immoral conduct have been reclaimed; and the beneficial influence of the work on the lives of the navvies is matter of general recognition. Some of the men, returning to their homes, have carried with them the truths they had received at the Tunnel, and have opened new centres of evangelical light among their kinsfolk and acquaintance.

An extension of the work has now become necessary. The mountain valley leading to the mouth of the Tunnel is a narrow one. Both sides of it, for an extent of some five kilometres are now lined with the wooden barracks and chalets that have become necessary for the accommodation of the 3,000 Italians employed on the works, and of the traders who supply their wants. At the entrance of the valley, coming from Domodossola, is a wide opening in which lies the village of Varzo, and in the village and its immediate neighbourhood some 1,000 of the navvies have been obliged to seek their quarters.

As the preaching-hall is situated at the other extremity of the valley, near the mouth of the tunnel, an urgent need arose to provide an auxiliary place of worship at Varzo. This need has now been met. A piece of ground has been purchased on the side of the diligence road, and a chapel put up with accommodation for about 150 hearers. The building was opened a short time ago; but about £200 is still owing upon it.

With regard to the mission itself, it should be stated that the fund for current expenses are chiefly provided by the "Gospel Mission to Foreign Navvies," through the secretary, Miss Maynard (The Cottage, Hawkhurst, Kent), while the ministers and teachers are furnished by the Italian Wesleyan Methodist Church, that church being the one in possession of the Italian field adjacent to the tunnel. A similar evangelistic work has recently been commenced at the Swiss extremity of the Tunnel, also amongst the Italian navvies.

Itineracy in North Africa.

WRITING from Djemâa Sahridj, on April 11, Mdme. Rolland says:—"Pray for us that we may be directed and strengthened for the accomplishment of God's will. We feel ever more resigned to the will of God, and desirous of obeying Him alone in our service. Since returning from Europe in September last year, I have been led to undertake more than in the past the work of itinerant evangelization in European centres and Kabyle market places, in which I have already seen manifestations of the Divine blessing.

"The Gospel has for some years been proclaimed in these parts; we feel urged to make it known where it has not yet been preached. The five and a-half years during which we have been here, have not been in vain; we have witnessed some souls come out veritably for the Saviour."

The terms of this communication imply (as the fact is) that Mdme. Rolland and her daughter are now working without support or subsidy from any society or organization.

A Visit to Cote d'Or.

SOME time ago, a Bible was given to a policeman, who kept order at a Salle de Conférence at Pré St. Gervais, near Paris. I afterwards met him one day in the street, and he told me he had been to see his parents who live in a village in the province of Cote d'Or. He said he did not like to give the Bible to them, as it had been a present to him; but he had left it on loan. From what he said, I thought the Book was much appreciated, and was the only Bible in the village. It awakened in my mind the desire to visit those peasants. This year, returning from a visit to the Ardèche, I spent about a fortnight in Cote d'Or with a friend. We went first to Beaune, a very pretty town near Dijon. We were most cordially received by the excellent pastor and his wife, who are doing a good work in the neighbourhood.

Moving to Bligny, we passed through beautiful scenery, as the tram wound its way up the rocky hills. Bligny is surrounded by villages where there are no mission-halls or Protestant churches. Of course there are the Roman Catholic churches, and the people are under the influence of the priests. My short stay there impressed me that it is an open door for Christian work. The people are not all priest-ridden. My friend and I distributed Gospels and tracts. Quite a little crowd gathered round us wanting books, and we had not sufficient Gospels with us to supply all who asked for them. One lad showed me a Testament he or a member of his family had bought of a colporteur who sometimes visits that district.

One day we drove over to Thiery, the village where the parents of the policeman live. We were received by that family with French politeness, but when I spoke to them about the Bible they had, I found that Madame did not care to read it much herself; she said her daughter had it, and she did not wish "to change her religion." However, I read to them a portion of Scripture, and when we went away, they thanked us for coming to see them. We gave away several Gospels and tracts in that village. The people seemed much surprised at having them given; some at first refused to take them, but when they found they were gifts they received them with thanks. We had some very interesting conversations with the people. I should rejoice to see some permanent work started there, so that these people might have the opportunity of hearing that salvation is offered to them "without money and without price." I shall be glad to give further information about the district to inquiring friends.

Nestorian Orphans.

UNDER the care of Deacon Abraham the Nestorian Orphanage maintains its strictly Evangelical position. For upwards of twenty years the institution has proved an incalculable boon to the orphan children of the poor, persecuted Nestorians, many of whose parents have been killed by the Kurds. In the latest report Deacon Abraham writes: "We have now thirty-two orphan boys and sixteen girls. The boys are taught to do all kinds of work in the vineyards and fields, and the girls do housework, sewing, and making clothes. Lately we sent away two orphans—a boy and girl; they are good Christians, worthy and honest."

One of the many advantages of the Deacon's school is that the girls are entirely trained by natives, and are thus better suited for the homes of Syrians. Youths who are educated in European ways are often unfitted for ordinary life in Persia, and are too apt to wander into other countries, seeking a freedom not to be found in their own. In view of this it is not surprising that the Nestorian Orphanage should be found to serve so useful a purpose.

Deacon Abraham cannot receive more of the homeless orphans for whom admission is sought through the lack of support. The hon. secretary is Miss Barclay, 9, Tranton Road, Bermondsey.

The Moody Bible Institute.

THE summer schedule of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago has been planned to meet the circumstances of those who desire to get better acquainted with the English Bible and with soul-saving methods of work, but who have not much time at their command. Certain regular courses, which run the year round, will be in operation, including Bible Chapter Summary (taking the Bible consecutively by chapters), Bible study for personal work, &c. In addition, a well-known Bible teacher is engaged for each month, so that those who come for short periods shall be able to get short but complete courses. These special courses cover church history, homiletics, as well as analytical, exegetical, synthetic, and other methods of studying the Bible.

The lecturers for the summer include Dr. C. I. Scofield, pastor of the Congregational Church at East Northfield, Mass.; Prof. W. W. White, of Montclair, N.J.; Dr. James M. Gray, of Boston; Prof. W. G. Moorehead, of Xenia, O., Theological Seminary; Rev. Mark Guy Pearse, of London; and Mr. Robert E. Speer, of New York.

As Mr. Moody went up and down the land in his evangelistic labours, he met many of both sexes who would, with some well-directed study and training, become efficient lay-workers in the cause of Christ, and who would then prove invaluable assistants to their pastors in the Sunday school, choir, &c.

The Institute receives for a few weeks such as aim to serve as lay-workers. Pastors, evangelists, returned missionaries, and other Christian workers who have had actual experience on the field, and who wish to give time to further study and preparation for larger usefulness, will find a course at the Institute very helpful. Not only is theoretical training a part of the Institute curriculum, but students are also assigned to definite appointments in Chicago under the supervision of expert instructors. Unusual facilities are thus afforded for testing men and women, and developing their special gifts of service. An earnest spirit of consecration and self-sacrifice is fostered by devotional features in the home life of the Institute.

A prospectus giving full particulars as to conditions of entrance, &c., may be obtained from Mr. J. H. Todd, Superintendent Men's Department, 80, Institute Place, Chicago, or Miss E. S. Strong, Superintendent Women's Department, 230, La Salle Avenue, Chicago. No fees are asked for tuition or training.

From Dr. Baedeker.

I AM anxious to secure the prayers of readers of The Christian on behalf of a Conference, which is to take place at Prague, Bohemia, on May 8 and 9, where many Christians of the various Slav population of the Austrian and Hungarian empire will meet together in unity with Germans and others, for fellowship in the Gospel and for encouraging and deepening in spiritual life. Bohemia and Moravia have been the very hotbed of persecution and martyrdom, of Popish bondage, from the time of their reformer, Huss, who was burnt at Constance, until within twenty-five years ago, when the restrictions of the Gospel were the cause of a deputation to the Emperor, who most graciously granted a milder rule.

Since that time there has been liberty granted in an increasing measure, and throughout the Empire many thousands have taken advantage, and declared themselves "free from Rome"; and the Gospel of God's grace is bringing very many to the knowledge of the truth, and the assemblies of believers and the service of the Gospel are expanding in a most encouraging manner. I hope (D.V.) to leave England for Germany on the 28th inst., purposing to visit Wiesbaden and Stuttgart, on the way to Bohemia and Austria, before going to the Northern countries. My further programme will include Norway and Russia.

Arousing Civic Conscience.

MR. JAMES KNOX, AIRDRIE.

A SIGNIFICANT event of the social life of Scotland during the past winter has undoubtedly been the great temperance revival in Airdrie. For many years that town has been in a most unsatisfactory condition, so far at least as facilities for the sale of intoxicating drink are concerned, and the occasional condemnatory words that fell from the lips of serious people interested in reform were spoken without effect. Those in civic authority felt so slightly the burden of responsibility for the moral condition of the community that they did not hesitate to encourage something like free trade in the sale of drink. As a result Airdrie came to enjoy the unenviable distinction of being the most highly licensed town in Scotland, and about a year ago this meant 110 licences to about 20,000 people. Think of it—a public-house for every fifty adults of the population.

To a number of the more earnest and practical Christian people, this condition of affairs was slowly becoming unbearable. It was apparent that the work, which was urgently demanding their best consecrated effort, needed many years for its accomplishment. Year by year a few young men of business capacity, of social standing, and of Christian character, stood for seats in the Town Council, and won them, and in the natural course of events (usually in the third year of their term of office) they rose to the status of magistrates. While this healthy movement was slowly progressing, it was constantly confronted by a glaring and serious drawback in the incoherent, and therefore impotent, condition of the forces of temperance. While temperance people refused to unite, the aggressive power of the best representatives was necessarily curbed. The recent movement that has so deeply affected the town, that has awakened the interest of Scotland, and that at the present moment shows no signs of abated vitality, is the direct result of bringing together the scattered forces of temperance, and of charging them with the power which comes from unity and co-operation. The splendid achievements of these seven months have created a new social atmosphere, have greatly strengthened the hands and nerved the will of those in civic authority, and have awakened in the breasts of hundreds a hopeful buoyancy which before was impossible.

The prominence here given to the life and work of Mr. James Knox must not be construed into any extravagant claims on his behalf, so far as the movement is concerned. It is quite sufficient to affirm that he has played a part of undisputed importance, that he has brought with him to the Chief Templar's chair fine administrative ability, warm enthusiasm, and an attractive personality, and that his presence has inspired many with the conviction that the revival is no mere brilliant spurt, but a healthy awakening of the civic conscience that will lead to permanent results. His father and grandfather belonged to Airdrie, but he was born in Glasgow. Three years afterwards, on the sad occasion of his mother's death, he was brought to the town of his fathers, and there he has since remained. At the age of fifteen he entered the University of Glasgow, where he studied arts for three years, with law in view.

While he was in attendance at the University two events took place which entirely altered the course of his life, and compelled him to abandon all thought of the legal profession for a business career in Airdrie. The first was the death of his father; the second, a year or two later, was a serious and unexpected reverse in the circumstances of his home. Thus, while yet in his teens, Mr. Knox found himself in a position of grave responsibility as the eldest member and only son in a large family. He faced the inevitable with courage, threw himself into business with heartiness, and ultimately achieved considerable success.

Alongside the business which his father had continued to own in Airdrie, and which Mr. Knox took in hand at the crisis just referred to, there existed a small savings bank. The young man was keen enough to notice that this bank could be considerably extended to the great advantage of the community, and to this kind of work he felt specially drawn from his earliest days. Indeed, when he was but a lad of ten years he started a penny savings bank in his own home in imitation of his father's, and in the course of three years he collected in pennies from children running about the door the handsome sum of £100, and some of his youthful depositors of that time own to-day a considerable amount of property. The capacity of which this incident was a forefeeling has been fully developed, and has led to happy and beneficial results. Mr. Knox accordingly separated the savings bank from his business, and extended the hours of work, and as a result in the course of eighteen years, with the help of an able board of management he has succeeded in raising the amount of total deposits from £10,000 to £400,000.

It is well known that only busy men find any time for work beyond their private interests. Mr. Knox is one of the busiest of men, and yet he has found a large amount of time for the service of the town and church. When he was twenty-five years of age he entered the Town Council, and whatever he took in hand, although he was one of the youngest councillors who ever served the burgh, was done with thoroughness. He has fully shared in all the honours that fall to the lot of the representatives of the people, and has served as Bailie, Dean of Guild, and Treasurer. The only position of distinction that he has not yet held is that of Provost, and it is not likely that he can much longer escape from this office.

But private enterprise and public duty have not absorbed the whole of the Bailie's time and energy. In his boyhood he was interested in religious work through the "Foundry Boys' Religious Society," in which work his father took a leading part. Through Mr. James Stirling, the first lecturer in connection with the Scottish Temperance League, he was early interested in the temperance cause. Much of the fluency of speech which he possesses, was acquired in connection with the work of the Young Men's Christian Association. When he was about eighteen years of age, he identified himself with the church, and for many years he has acted as an office-bearer.

Such is the man who has played an important part in the inception and development of the temperance movement in Airdrie. Fitness for the work is surely the election of God. Already he has had his reward. The satisfaction is indeed great of having taken a leading part in a work of social reform that has secured the allegiance of 1,350 people, of whom three-fourths are men. These figures represent a removal of misery from individual and family life which no man can correctly estimate. But the results of the movement are far more extensive than figures can indicate. Part of the achievements of the past winter are to be found in the change of local opinion, in the quickening of the Christian conscience, in the feverish anxiety of the trade, and in the fresh inspiration which every other temperance organization in the town has received as well as in the welcome additions to Church attendance.

The joy of such exceptional success is no doubt exhilarating; but the responsibilities which it imposes are of the weightiest nature. Mr. Knox and his fellow-workers are well aware that the movement still throbs with possibilities, and that very much will depend upon the developments of the immediate future. While they are working in confidence, and hope they will nevertheless be greatly helped by the knowledge that they are being followed by the warm sympathy and prayerful interest of Christian people in different parts of the land.

The Coronation.

DAY OF INTERCESSION AND CONFERENCE.

To our Christian Brethren and Fellow-Subjects throughout the United Kingdom and Colonies.

THE approaching Coronation of our gracious Sovereign, King Edward VII., will, it is hoped, be made the occasion for renewed and importunate intercession by all praying people on behalf of our King and Queen, the Royal Family, and the whole nation and Empire.

There is sore need of a revival of true religion in our midst, and of a deepening of that fear of God and enthusiasm for righteouness which are the foundations of individual and national prosperity. Amongst other signs of irreligion at the present time many deeply regret the lessening of reverence for Holy Scripture, the waning of a due observance of the Lord's Day, the sad prevalence of intemperance, gambling, and impurity, and the inordinate love of riches and pleasure.

At the Coronation service the blessing of God upon the Sovereign and his Royal Consort is specially sought by united prayer, by solemn worship, and by the administration of the Holy Communion. What could more effectually help forward the vital religion of our time than such an answer to our prayers on behalf of our gracious King (brought back to us once from the very verge of death in answer to a nation's prayer) as should be abundantly manifest throughout the remainder of his reign?

We venture, therefore, to appeal to you to regard the Coronation not only as a time for demonstrations of loyalty and rejoicing, but as a solemn call to earnest and believing prayer for Throne and Fatherland, and the Greater Britain beyond the seas.

In London we are arranging for a day of Intercession and Conference so that the solemn and unique service at Westminster Abbey may be further enriched by the prayers of their Majesties' loyal and devoted subjects throughout the metropolis. It is fixed for Wednesday, June 25, in the Queen's Hall, Langham Place. Meetings will be held at 7 a.m., 11 a.m., 3 p.m., and 7 p.m., in which the Bishop of London, the Bishop of Durham, the Chaplain General (Bishop Taylor Smith), Prebendary Webb-Peploe, Prebendary H. E. Fox, Dr. Monro Gibson, Principal Rainy, Rev. C. Silvester Horne, Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, Rev. J. H. Jowett and others hope to take part. We ask your prayers on behalf of these meetings, and venture to express a hope that similar opportunities for united prayer may be extensively arranged throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies on the same day or during the Coronation week. Let us obey the teaching of Holy Scripture in 1 Timothy ii. 1, 2, and 1 Peter ii. 17.

Baptist Spring Assembly.

THE sessions of the Spring Assembly of the Baptist Union of Great Britain and Ireland opened under the happiest auspices on Monday afternoon. The year has been one of progress at home and abroad. The Nonconformist churches have been brought closer together by many causes operating from within and without, and the alliance has proved a fruitful source of strength to each of them in its own sphere of influence.

The delegates gathered on Monday afternoon to the preliminary devotional service held in Bloomsbury Chapel, with a consciousness of the blessing of God on the past, mingled with a deep sense of the necessity of discerning and standing true to principle in momentous questions which at present occupy the public mind. Under the conduct of one of the fathers of the church, Rev. Dr. Richard Glover (Bristol), the members received a fresh glimpse of the heavenly vision which reveals Christ as the foundation of all that is true and good.

THE NEW PRESIDENT.

The session which followed was opened by Rev. Dr. Alexander Maclaren (Manchester), who after expressing his gratitude to God for blessings and mercies vouchsafed during his own year of office, introduced as his successor in the presidency of the Union Rev. John Roskruge Wood, minister of the congregation at Upper Holloway.

A native of Wincanton, in Somersetshire, Mr. Wood was born in 1838, if not into a ministerial family, at least into one which became such because of the high standard of Christian service which was recognised. His father, who was the teacher of a small school, was constrained by the spiritual destitution of the district to establish also a Sunday-school, around which there grew up also a small preaching service, and in process of time a small congregation with Mr. Wood, sen., as pastor. With such surroundings it is not surprising to learn that the new President was a recognized preacher of the Gospel before he was twenty years of age. An older brother returning home on a visit was stirred by the young preacher's message, and found the Saviour under the guidance of one so near of kin. Applying for church membership at his own home, the reference made to the preaching of the younger brother led first to inquiry by the minister into the circumstances, and ultimately to Mr. Wood's enrolment as a student for the regular Baptist ministry at Regent's Park College, in 1859. The business apprenticeship and training previously received has had an important share in preparing him for the all-round usefulness which has been the characteristic of his life. Mr. Wood early came under the influence of Thomas Jones and C. H. Spurgeon.

Invited in 1862 to Boutport Street Chapel, Barnstaple, the first change was in 1867 to City Road, Bristol, the first twelve years of successful pastoral life being happily spent in these two charges. The call to Upper Holloway, in 1874, was, however, one which could not be put aside. The church seated for 1,100 people had 217 members. But now all is changed. The premises have been enlarged twice, a large debt has been paid off, and the membership was last reported at 914, with seventeen local preachers at work. Mr. Wood has already filled with acceptance the chair of the London Baptist Association and of the Islington Free Church Council. He is a faithful pastor, much loved by his people, with a high sense of the duties and privileges of his sacred office. Known intimately in the homes of his people, he feels that in visitation he is able to do some of his best work. Being a man of method he accomplishes much in the course of the day; and the man who has received over 3,000 members into church fellowship in one pastorate always has his hands full.

Addressing himself on Monday afternoon to the topic, "The Place of the Minister in the Life of the Church," he opened by tracing the growth of the idea of the Church in the New Testament.

"The life in our churches dates from the mediatorial throne, and is of a high type. Towards God, it is worship—the homage of the soul; towards Christ, it is love expressed in obedience; towards each other, it is brotherly affection; towards those outside, it is service involving sacrifice. This is the life of the churches we serve; 'not of the world,' and yet for the world in which it exists. We must be just to our fathers, who were themselves lovers of justice. Any reflection on them is not warranted by facts. It is to the old evangelicalism we owe the reform of our prisons, Negro emancipation, our great Missionary, Bible, and Tract societies, and the beginnings of Temperance reform. We are more numerous and wealthy than our fathers, live under different conditions, and cover a wider area of benevolent activity, as it becomes us to do; but the trunk line of service, 'preaching the Gospel and healing everywhere,' in every generation remains the same. Jesus Christ reproduces Himself and his mission in the life of his Church.

REV. J. R. WOOD.
From Photograph by Messrs. Russell & Sons, 17, Baker Street, London, W.

"Every intelligent observer knows that the Divine life exists in differing degrees of strength and beauty in different churches and in the same church at different periods of its history. One church is as remarkable for animation as another is for the want of it. An air of brightness and cheerfulness prevails. Deacons love as brethren, members keep rank, denominational objects are loyally supported, while the institutions of the church are worked with vigour. Nobody complains of the minister, 'murmuring in tents' is unknown, the atmosphere is charged with love, and the reigning spirit is the spirit of the family and the home!

The best of our young people are attracted to such fellowships, and weary men of business find in them centres of refreshment. On the other hand, from some churches the 'Dove of Peace' has been driven forth by an unchristly spirit, and the chill of winter is upon all. We form different estimates of the average condition of the Divine life in our churches, but those who take the most sanguine view admit that it is lower than it ought to be—lower than it would be if all of us were faithful.

THE INFLUENCE OF THE MINISTER.

"The spiritual life of our churches is affected by many things; but surely we are one in believing that the Divine life is in this world, not to be conquered by it, but to conquer; and that there is nothing in the conditions under which it exists, to impair its essential sovereignty and crown. I am prepared to maintain that of all the forces acting on the life of our churches to-day, no force is so powerful in itself, so incessant in its activity, and so far-reaching in its consequences, as the influence of the minister. Give him time for his personality to tell, and, to a large extent, the minister reproduces himself in his church. This is one of the weightiest facts of our ministry. Other things have their weight, the doctrine we preach, the prayers we offer, the activities in which we spend our time; but the weightiest of all is the life we live.

"We are not suffering to-day in our Free Churches from an over-estimate of the minister's influence; our danger is on the other side. Thinking too little of this influence may be as injurious as thinking too much. 'Dr. Dale,' it is said, 'lived under the benignant sway of a succession of great truths following one another like the constellations of the heavens.' A fact of this kind in the intellectual life of the minister must have influenced powerfully the intellectual life of his congregation. Imagine the effect on thoughtful minds of 'Discourses on Christian Doctrine,' which contained Dr. Dale's 'latest thoughts on these great subjects, transfigured by the splendours of sunset'; or the effect on ethical practice of his 'Laws of Christ for Common Life'; or on Christian experience, of his noble expository discourses on the Epistle to the Ephesians. Dr. Dale's is a distinguished instance, but it is not solitary; others wield, though in inferior measure, the same influence. Many churches would confess that the best that is in them, and the best they ever hope to be or do, they owe, under God, to their minister. 'They glorify God in him.'

THE BURDEN OF SOULS.

"Thomas Boston had a phrase he often repeated, 'the weight of the work of the ministry.' 'I got some impression of the weight of the work of the ministry fixed on my spirit, which continued with me.' Again, 'after prayer I saw much of the weight of my work. I saw it a great matter to have charge of souls, and to be faithful. Wherefore, I went to God mourning, and poured out my soul to Him.' With this 'weight' upon us, what can we do to increase our efficiency as ministers of Jesus Christ?

"The answer to this question is written large in the New Testament, especially in the pastoral Epistles. 'Take heed to thyself, and to thy teaching.' In our estimate of influence, the first place must be given to the minister's life—and to begin with, the life of the minister as a man. He should be frank and brotherly, a man of order, punctual in keeping appointments, as attentive to detail, and as hard-working, as any business man in his congregation. How can we expect our people 'to redeem their time' if we mis-spend ours; or to keep their engagements if we fail to keep ours?

SETTING THE PATTERN.

"We must set the pattern also in activity of intellect; singleness and integrity of mind. To do our work without thought, without effort, without purpose, is sloth; to do it without regard to conviction and Scripture, brings sorrow and shame; both evils, the indolence and the insincerity, will propagate themselves. We occasionally complain that our people are indisposed to mental effort, that thinking is an unwelcome task, that any tax on the mind is regarded with disfavour, that sermons must be brief, light in substance, and easy of digestion. There may, in some instances, be justification for such complaints. But are ministers always free from blame? If the languor in question did not begin with us, have we not contributed to it?

"A warmer appreciation of the Gospel on our own part will bring about a warmer appreciation of it on the part of our people. For the minister's own hold and enjoyment of the truth there is no substitute—cleverness, scholarship, incessant public activity, new sensations—none of them are substitutes for living experience of the things of God. The life of the minister is the soul of his ministry. If men are to be aroused from that fatal sleep which makes them indifferent to their origin, their relations to the invisible world, and their destiny beyond the grave, it must be by a ministry quickened and inspired by the Holy Ghost.

LABOURING IN PRAYER.

"The subject of prayer—private prayer—naturally follows this mention of a quickened and inspired ministry. Prayer is a holy art, in which the best of us are but beginners. Ministers of the type of Epaphras, who 'laboured fervently in prayers,' that Colossian Christians might 'stand perfect and fully assured in all the will of God,' are much needed in the churches of our denomination. To labour fervently in prayer is a form of ministerial service at least as useful as labour in the study or the pulpit. Can other forms of service be effective if prayer drop out of account? Surely one main business of a minister's life in the twentieth century is the business Epaphras set himself to do in the first century.

"One word of earnest protest against the commercial spirit which intrudes itself more and more into the relations of ministers and churches—the spirit of 'Change and the market, of supply and demand. The spiritual efficiency of our ministry is not increased by pulpit competition, or by driving on either side a close bargain. The commercial spirit works none too well in its own sphere. Competition is not the only doctrine of political economy. In the Christian Church it is quite out of its sphere.

DOUBTING YET UNDOUBTING.

"Secrets of spiritual efficiency and enduring success are still learnt under the 'shadow of his throne!' After such communion we may take up our work afresh, with confidence born of his Spirit. Defeat cannot happen in the kingdom we serve; if it ever could have happened, the Cross or the grave furnished the critical moment. It did not happen then; apparent defeat proved to be radiant victory; it cannot happen in the future. 'Be of good courage;' fight the demon of pessimism; depression of spirit is an enemy to gifts and grace, and a great ally of unbelief, 'that little pitted speck in garnered fruit, which, rotting inward, slowly moulders all.' Above us is 'the angel in mid-heaven, having the everlasting Gospel to preach to every nation, and kindred and tongue and people.' We watch his path of light, and record with joy the stages of his progress. Of present appearances we may sometimes stand in doubt; of final issues we have no doubt at all. The twentieth century is nearer than any other to the sound of the great voice, proclaiming, 'The tabernacle of God is with men, and He will dwell with them; and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes, and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things have passed away.'"

A YEAR OF PROGRESS.

The same warm reception which had greeted Mr. Wood was accorded to Rev. J. H. Shakespeare when he rose to present the annual report. Increases were reported under every head of statistics, save that of local preachers. The membership was 372,998, with 52,634 Sunday-school teachers, and 532,219 scholars. The world statistics show a grand total of 58,029 Baptist churches, with 5,454,699 members. For the first time for many years it had been possible, from voluntary contributions and interest on the Twentieth Century Fund, to pay in full the annuities to widows and aged ministers. In all £235,134 had been received towards the Twentieth Century Fund of £250.000, and a special effort was set on foot to complete it within the week.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT.

As the result of a ballot for the office of vice-president, Mr. Alderman George White, M.P. (Norwich), was elected, the appointment carrying with it the presidency next year.

A new proof was given of the deep feeling throughout the country on the Education Bill, when the newly-chosen Vice-President moved a resolution protesting against it in vigorous terms, pledging the members to "offer it determined and unceasing opposition by every means in their power, not only on behalf of the Baptists in rural districts, who are compelled by law to send their children to Church of England schools, and of Baptist teachers who are, and still would be, excluded from exercizing their profession in more than half the schools of the country, but also, and chiefly, in the interests of national education and religion."

This, said Mr. White, was not a party political question. It was a citizen's question. They threw back the taunt that the fight was only a denominational one, for the Bill was a clerical Bill, and was framed at the dictation of the clerical party. The Bill would lead to educational inefficiency and religious intolerance. There was nothing in it of an educational character, but there was involved the abolition of school boards, for which no adequate substitute was set up. But they would be called upon to pay rates for teaching what they regarded as pernicious error. They claimed no privileges for themselves, and would not have State pay for the propagation of their own religious beliefs; but they stood for the rights of conscience, and were determined to fight this Bill to the very last.

The seconder, Rev. Dr. Clifford, declared that the Free Churches wanted nothing for themselves. They wanted a just and national system of education, which should be controlled by the people who paid for it.

In the evening a crowded public meeting was held in the City Temple, under the chairmanship of Mr. R. V. Barrow, J.P. (London). An enthusiastic welcome was extended to Rev. J. G. Greenhough (Leicester), who gave an account of a recent visit to the Australasian colonies on behalf of the denomination. He was particularly happy in his references to the condition of social affairs in New Zealand. There were, he said, no millionaires there who wanted to buy up continents and annex oceans, and that was a circumstance for which everyone ought to be devoutly thankful. The speaker who followed was Rev. Charles Williams, who had also an interesting story to tell of the work of God in other lands, as it came under his observation during an extended tour.

Ramsgate Fishermen.

THERE are in the port of Ramsgate some 400 skippers, fishermen, and smack boys, in addition to yachtsmen, sailors, lighthousemen, bargees, and coalheavers, &c. For years past matters have been going from bad to worse, and now have reached the lowest depths so far as these men are concerned. After a correspondence of over eighteen months, and repeated meetings and discussions, it has been decided by the British and Foreign Sailors' Society to start an unsectarian mission; and a local committee is being formed, and funds are being collected—(a) to support a sailor missionary; (b) to start a home where Gospel services may be held, and a shelter provided for these men and their wives and children.

Great opposition has been manifested to unsectarian free Gospel work and services; and unless the Christian public come to the rescue, these dear men will continue to be left in the condition which I have described. Out of the 400 fishermen, I believe I am correct in saying that not more than thirty ever attempt to attend any place of worship. The number of drink shops and public-houses bordering on the quays render it exceedingly hard for men to keep away from drink. Mr. J. Cory promises £500 towards a Home if others will subscribe, and also £10 a year towards a missionary.—Yours, &c., Alfred Porcelli.

Ellington, Ramsgate.

Open-Air Mission.—The quotation given in our issue of last week, respecting the labours in tract distribution of the late Mr. John MacGregor ("Rob Roy"), should have read:—"He went through Europe with a paddle in one hand and a bundle of tracts in the other."

Oxford Notes.

THE annual meeting of the Oxford Auxiliary of the London Missionary Society was held on Monday, April 21, in the George Street Congregational Church. The chairman was Rev. H. T. Grey, M.A., Principal of Wycliffe Hall. When one hears so much of sectarian bitterness, it is of special interest to see a Churchman—the Principal of one of our leading theological halls—himself once a missionary in India, and still an attached member of the Church Missionary Society—presiding at a Nonconformist meeting. It is a sign of the times, and we welcome it.

The party under the leadership of Rev. W. H. Griffith Thomas, M.A., has returned from the Holy Land after a most interesting and enjoyable tour.

Canon Christopher resumed his Saturday evening Greek Testament lecture to undergraduates on Saturday, April 26, in the St. Aldate's Rectory Room; and the Principal of Wycliffe Hall has also resumed his important Sunday evening lecture to members of the University in the Hannington Hall.

In the Sheldonian Theatre, on Thursday, April 24, was held the annual gathering in connection with the Oxford Auxiliary of the C.E.T.S., under the chairmanship of Sir William Herschel, M.A., Bart. Gratifying reports of work done were presented.

Sympathizers with the work carried on in distant Melanesia, and there are many among the members of the University, are keenly anticipating the meeting to be held in the hall of Hertford College, on Sunday, May 4, at nine o'clock, when Bishop Cecil Wilson is to speak.

Welsh Notes.

THE executive committee of the North Wales Temperance Association, at its last meeting, had before it the latest reports of the Million Pledges Scheme. The total number of pledges secured amounts to 37,550.

The meetings of the South Wales and Monmouthshire Calvinistic Methodist Association were held at Aberayron, Cardiganshire, on April 22-24, Amongst the most important of the subjects discussed was "The Indwelling of Christ in the Believer."

The annual meetings of the North Glamorganshire Congregationalists were held on April 21 and 22. The statistics presented showed that there are fifty churches in the district. The membership of these is 12,193, with forty-seven ministers. The Sunday-school scholars number 12,399, with 1,199 teachers.

A conference of the Wesleyan ministers and preachers of the Rhyl circuit was held last week. The conference passed an important resolution, appealing to the residents of seaside towns in North Wales to set their faces against the desecration of the Sabbath, and to make every effort by precept and example to keep the day holy.

Irish Notes.

THE Association for the Employment of the Industrious Blind in Belfast continues to do a good work. It enabled the blind to gain for themselves last year the sum of £2,795 and it dispensed £311 additional to the sick and aged. The number of blind and deaf and dumb employed by the institution during the past twelve months was 120, of whom eighty-one were men and thirty-nine women. A bequest of £200 helped to reduce the debt on the new dining rooms.

The annual meeting of the Hibernian Bible Society has just been held in Dublin under the presidency of Sir Algernon Coote, Bart. The report stated that during the last ninety-six years the Society has gone on steadily, and has circulated in that time five and a half million copies of the Bible, while last year alone it circulated 41,000 copies. The income for the year showed a decrease as compared with that of previous years, and the Society was not therefore able to send its usual contribution to the British and Foreign Bible Society. It is eight years since a similar financial condition necessitated similar action on the part of the Society.

The anniversary meetings of the Hibernian Church Missionary Society have just been held in Dublin, and were largely attended. Bishop Tucker's absence was a great disappointment, but his place was taken by Bishop Tugwell and the Bishop of Mooseonee. Miss Chadwick, of Uganda, daughter of the Bishop of Derry, was one of the speakers. The total receipts were £20,926 as against £20,750 for the previous year, being an advance of £176. Sir Algernon Coote, Bart., was elected President of the Society in place of the Earl of Belmore, resigned, and the collections at the meetings were £65 against £40 last year. Sermons have also been just preached in forty-nine churches in Dublin and the suburbs on behalf of the Society.

The May Meetings.

Protestant Calls and Warnings.

A NEW emphasis was placed on Wednesday of last week—at the annual gatherings of the Protestant Alliance, held at the Queen's Hall—on several questions connected with the maintenance of the Protestant position in this country. In the course of an earnest and stirring address given from the chair in the afternoon, Colonel Wellesley Robinson, C.B., after reviewing various enactments which have been disregarded by Roman propagandists, went on to declare it to be "a real farce and a monstrous shame that there should be laws on our statute book at which a foreign power should be allowed to come in and snap the fingers."

In an address which was attentively listened to and warmly applauded, Rev. F. S. Webster (All Souls, Langham Place) proved how absurd is the contention that by the abolition of the Succession Declaration the king would only be receiving that liberty of conscience which the meanest of his subjects now enjoys. The making of the Declaration places no limit on the liberty of conscience of the king; on the other hand, if he is to have a free conscience he cannot be a Roman Catholic. There are, indeed, limits to the freedom which can be allowed when by the exercise of it men would do injury to others, as is the case with those who allow the Church of Rome to dictate to their consciences. "If a man is to be sovereign of this realm, he must have a free conscience, he must be taught by God's Word, and he must not be a slave and puppet of the Pope."

Examining the objections taken to the Declaration, Mr. Webster declared that "we have no cause to be dissatisfied with it or to be troubled at the fact that the Roman Catholics do not like it. It was not meant to be what they should like. Thieves who want to break into your house do not like the steps you take to keep them out. Then, if you compare the Declaration with other theological statements, the wording is studiously simple and moderate." Dealing with the statement that it charges Roman Catholics with idolatry, it was shown from an examination of transubstantiation that if the bread on the communion table remains bread, to worship it is idolatry, while if it is changed, to refuse to worship it is atheism.

THE NATION ASLEEP.

"The indifference to Protestantism in the Pulpit and the Pew, in Parliament and the Press," was the keynote of an address by Rev. W. C. Minifie. "The nation gets one shock after another, and still sleeps on undisturbed, while Jesuits are seeking in every way to capture the schools, to corrupt the Press, and to coerce the Government. If Protestants had rather more fire and rather less starch we should soon have a more agreeable political atmosphere around." Representing Welsh Nonconformity, Rev. William Thomas expressed strongly the opinion that we live in a day when it is essentially necessary to revive the old battle-cries of Protestantism.

Several references were made during the day to the dangers to Protestantism with which the Education Bill is fraught; and at the evening meeting Mr. B. Nicholson (chairman) warned his hearers to examine the clauses well, lest they should be led into an approval of something which would lead to the withdrawal of the Bible from the schools in favour of Ritualistic and Romanising teaching.

Rev. W. R. Mowll protested against the inaction of successive Governments in neglecting to enforce the Act of 1829 for the suppression of Jesuits and other Papal orders. A resolution deprecating the Ritualistic teaching and practice in the Church of England, and calling upon Lord Salisbury to nominate for promotion such men only as were faithful in both preaching and practice to the principles of the Protestant religion, was moved by Rev. Henry Dening, and seconded by Mr. John Kensit.

"Friendless and Fallen."

THE comprehensive work of the London Female Preventive and Reformatory Institution so widely known for its efforts on behalf of the friendless and fallen, has been remarkably fruitful during the past year.

At the annual meeting, held on Tuesday week in the lower Exeter Hall, Mr. W. J. Taylor, secretary, gave a vivid sketch of the operations. The cases admitted during the year included 217 rescue and 264 of a preventive character, and statistics and letters were adduced to show that after many years the fruit of the work remains. In addition to four commodious homes and the "Open-all-night" Refuge there is a large training institution for respectable but friendless young girls rescued from dangerous surroundings, and besides the regular staff no fewer than 223 voluntary helpers assist in the work of rescue and evangelization in the homes. Mr. Taylor enlarged on the essentially Christian character of the society, and showed that with kindly care, with earnest prayer and faith, it is aimed not only to reclaim from vice and shame, but to point sinners to the Lord Jesus Christ.

The report that was submitted by Mr. Taylor gives a number of illustrative instances which clearly demonstrate the practical nature of the Society's operations. For example:—"W. E. was barely fourteen years of age. Her mother was living a bad life, and her father, when not in the Infirmary, made his home at a common lodging-house, and earned a precarious living as a shoeblack. In consequence of her destitute condition, the girl had herself also been in the workhouse. After remaining under training a considerable time she was placed in service, and still remains in the same situation. 'I want,' she writes to her matron, 'to earn my own living, and get a good character. You have been like a mother to me.'"

Of one who was rescued "out of the depths," we are told:—"W. M. J. was, at the time of her admission, living under no control, remaining out in the streets at night, keeping bad company, and for some years had lived a life of shame. Altogether, the prospect of success did not appear hopeful, but after having been under discipline for fifteen months, a situation was found for her, and her mistress spoke of her in terms of high praise."

The good results of perseverance in instances where the outlook has appeared anything but hopeful, appear in the case of "C. R., who had lived a bad life for some years. More than one effort had in the past been made to help her, but without immediate success. She applied voluntarily, one cold winter's night, for another chance, after having been lost sight of for a very long time, and appeared so anxious to do what was right that she was admitted to a Home. In December, 1900, she was started in service, where she still remains, and her mistress gives her an excellent character."

The report is, indeed, full of interest from beginning to end.

Speaking from the chair, Mr. J. Compton Rickett, M.P., earnestly set forth the claims of the Society, and Rev. Marcus Rainsford followed with an eloquent appeal. Recounting from personal experience some encouraging instances of reclamation, he said, "There is no better hymn in Sankey's collection than that of which a verse runs:—

> Down in the human heart, crushed by the tempter,
> Feelings lie buried that grace can restore."

Rev. Dr. Hanson, the next speaker, in the course of a telling address, emphasized (1) the primary importance of careful home training; (2) the value of preventive institutions, since "a fence at the top of the precipice is better than an ambulance at the foot;" and (3) the sterling religious character of the good work carried on by Mr. Taylor and his devoted band of assistants.

Foreign Aid Society.

THE practical help given to the Protestant Churches upon the Continent by the Foreign Aid Society, has assuredly done much to strengthen the Evangelical cause in the battle with Romanism and infidelity. The friends of the Society who gathered at the annual meeting, held at the Conference Hall, Clapham Road, S.W., on Thursday evening last, had good cause for encouragement.

Reviewing the position, Rev. J. Gossett-Tanner (secretary) spoke of the many important congregations in various parts of France, who have come out from Rome during the past three years. Recalling the familiar and thrilling story of the spiritual movement in La Corrèze, the speaker told with what fervency the work is being organized and developed, and showed that the hatred of the people for the evils of the Romish system is only surpassed in intensity by their love of the Gospel. Much good, too, has followed the use of a French adaptation of "Sacred Songs and Solos."

Proceeding, Mr. Gossett-Tanner referred to mission operations, carried on with encouraging results, among the priest-ridden peoples of France and Belgium. Alluding to the book, "Roads from Rome," the speaker said that while there is a procession towards Rome, there is a much larger one in the opposite direction—that of the enlightened and the disillusionized.

PROTESTANT PROGRESS IN FRANCE.

Pastor Ch. Merle-D'Aubigné, of the Société Centrale Protestante d'Evangélization, followed with a telling address. At the outset he gave a terse account of the havoc wrought among the people of God in France by the persecutions of Francis I., Henry II., and their successors. In spite, however, of the almost entire eradication of the reformers, the principles of the Reformation have been making steady progress, which is being continued with a remarkable degree of acceleration. Protestantism is rising again, a love for the Word of God and an earnest desire for the furtherance of foreign missions being outstanding characteristics. In 1835 there were not more than five Protestant churches in the French capital, but now there are 110 meeting places in which the Gospel is regularly preached.

Again, in Nimes, half the people are Protestant, but in some of the country districts the work is beset with difficulties. For example, one pastor has to travel ninety miles to visit three Protestants. Another rode 120 miles on his bicycle to visit and instruct one Protestant girl. The work, however, is fruitful. The girl referred to, for instance, has become the light of the place, caring first for the spiritual welfare of her relatives, and then starting a Sunday-school for the village. There is, therefore, the speaker pointed out, a great need for more pastors to shepherd the people, in order to save them from drifting back to Rome or into unbelief. There are many places where such pastors would be heartily received by little groups of believers. In one village, where an awakening has resulted in the erection of a church building by the poor peasants, the Romanist authorities erected a rival building, but it remains unused, all the worshippers in the village being Protestants.

A WORD OF WARNING.

M. Merle-D'Aubigné concluded with a word of mingled warning and appeal: "We look to England for aid. We do what we can, as our contributions to the work show. Stretch your hands across the sea and help us by your prayers, your sympathy, your gifts. You, too, have a fight before you. The yoke of Rome is heavy; we could not bear it; we could not suffer the religious Orders that threatened to smother us. They have come to you, but so long as the Word of God has free course, and is exemplified in the lives of the Lord's people, there will be nothing to fear."

Hebrew Christian Testimony.

THE annual meetings of the Hebrew Christian Testimony to Israel were held at the new Mission House, Whitechapel Road, on Thursday last. A large number of friends and supporters of the work assembled to offer praise and thanksgiving to God for the signal blessing which continues to attend the efforts of his servants among his ancient people. The history of Mr. Baron's work in East London has proved that God blesses the efforts of Hebrew Christians among their brethren according to the flesh, and at Thursday's gatherings there was abundant evidence of the continuance of Divine favour and leading experienced in the work.

A matter for general regret was the absence through illness of Mr. James E. Mathieson, who had promised to take the chair, Mr. Baron reading a letter from him expressing his unabated interest in the evangelization of Israel.

At short notice Rev. D. Abraham Herschell consented to preside, and in the course of a fitting address referred to the antipathy often entertained towards efforts to bring the Gospel to bear upon Jewish thought and life. He recalled a conversation he had in the year 1869 with a baron, who expressed a wish that all Jews might be expelled from Germany, declaring that they corrupted the nation with their intense love of money as well as influencing the Press. Ultimately the baron was led to view Christian missions to Israel from a more favourable standpoint, and contributed a sum of £5 to the work, which was supplemented by gifts of £50 and £500. Passing to the consideration of some of the differences which exist among religious leaders, Mr. Herschell spoke of the insidious attempts which are being made to undermine the foundations of Christianity by certain higher critics, and earnestly pleaded for adherence to the pure Gospel and the Divinity of Christ.

A statement by Rev. David Baron indicated the scope of the year's operations. In looking back, there were many causes for thankfulness to God. Twelve months ago the Mission House was not entirely free from debt, and in October it was found that a sum of £1,000 was still owing to the builders. The matter was laid before God in prayer, and He had supplied this and every other need. Altogether a sum of £9,000 had been spent in erecting and furnishing the Mission House, which now forms the centre from which they labour. During the seven years the Mission had been in existence God had caused it to increase. In the course of the past winter larger numbers of Jews had been influenced for Christ through the Mission than ever before. The Bible class is one of the most inspiring sights to be witnessed in London. One of the most fruitful of the week's meetings is the service held in the main street every Lord's Day evening, when three Hebrew Christians proclaim the Gospel to a crowd of intelligent, attentive listeners. Another hopeful phase of the work is that among the children, and many have been the instances where a word taken home from the Sunday school by a scholar has led parents to think seriously and eventually turn with sincerity of heart to the true Messiah. Progress has been experienced also in the work in Hungary, and Mr. Baron mentioned that in a few days he starts for a mission tour in Asia Minor.

Rev. J. Gossett-Tanner, in the course of a forcible address, justified missions to Israel from the anxiety repeatedly manifested by Christ for the conversion and restoration of the race. One of the many reasons why the Hebrew Christian Testimony to Israel should be supported by Christians, was because of the reflex blessing to the whole Church of Christ which resulted.

Some earnest and practical words were also spoken by Mr. Finlay Gibson, and the afternoon gathering terminated with a season of prayer. In the evening there was again a full attendance, and under the presidency of Rev. C. A. Schönberger, a number of encouraging testimonies were given by the missionaries.

Christian Young Women.

BANNERS of many colours, bearing the names of branches of the work, rendered Exeter Hall picturesque last Thursday evening on the occasion of the anniversary of the Young Women's Christian Association. The members were gathered up in their strength from every part of London and the suburbs, filling the hall with a bright young life which was full of promise for the future of England and of the Church of God. The annual report supplied many figures to indicate the extent of the gracious influence exerted by the Association. The branches number 116, including over fifty homes, institutes, and evening rooms, while attached to these are more than 14,000 members and associates. Messages full of encouragement were received from the various institutes. At the Central the Bible Classes are drawing large attendances. Finsbury is supporting a missionary in South Africa. Of the 220 members at Percy, 171 are total abstainers. Building alterations and improvements have been made at Cloudesley. Wimbledon has fifteen former members in the foreign mission field. An orphan is supported in India by George Yard. The members at Holloway carry on a Sunday Bible class for workhouse women, and a weekly meeting for laundry women. Kilburn has contributed £47 7s. 7d. for home and foreign work, besides garments and other articles.

An effort made to raise a special £5,500 had raised £2,307. The total expenditure for 1901, including deficit brought forward, was £9,539 3s. 7d., towards which £9,469 2s. 7d. was received.

The employment agencies dealt with 7,150 employers and 5,390 applicants, resulting in 1,468 engagements. At Park Mission 123 preventive, rescue, and necessitous cases were hopefully attended to, while many more received helpful counsel. The superintendents of the various Homes—Welbeck, Princess House, St. John's Wood, Kent House, Hampstead, Queen Victoria, Peace Cottage, and preparatory—had all found their hands full in a fashion which filled their hearts with praise.

A GREAT FORWARD MOVEMENT.

Beginning by reading Psalm 133, Lord Kinnaird (chairman) made an inspiring appeal for a combined effort to go forth as "reapers," and prove the missionary nature of the work by doubling the membership during 1902.

A warm welcome was extended to Mrs. William M. Oatts (formerly honorary secretary at Glasgow), who, from personal experience during her recent tour round the world, described, in vivid language, the network of Christian organizations among young women which are now to be found in every quarter of the globe. Interesting cases were quoted to show how the members go forth in the service of Christ, and how those in circumstances of distress are reached by their more favoured sisters. A specially pathetic statement was made of the inadequate provision made for European and Eurasian girls in India.

Having congratulated the Association on what it is doing for women's bodies, Rev. R. Catterall (St. Augustine's, Highbury New Park) passed on also to find a happy augury for the future of the nation in the attention given to mental cultivation, having been defeated himself in efforts in the same direction. "Ignorance is at the bottom of a great deal of the gross irreligion of the land. How can people think aright who have never learned to think at all?" In burning words he called for women to educate themselves and turn their attention to the amendment of the laws under which their sex is treated unfairly. In Christian womanhood he found the promise of the great revival for which he was hoping and believing.

In the closing address Rev. W. Darlow Sarjeant emphasized the fact that the only limiting force in the success of the association is the spirituality of the members, from which he passed on to point out the true inward characteristics of pure religion, as distinguished from the outward dress of religion.

The Open-Air Mission.

RARELY in its history has the Open-Air Mission enjoyed more inspiring anniversary meetings than those gathered in Exeter Lower Hall to celebrate its forty-ninth year of work on Wednesday of last week. Several hundred enthusiastic workers and friends assembled, and the prevailing tone was one of deep spirituality as well as of lively joy.

In the afternoon Lieut.-General Sir William Stirling, K.C.B., presided, and deeply interesting addresses were delivered by Rev. George Hanson, D.D., and Colonel F. W. Major, the latter of whom told the story of the conversion of an infidel lecturer at Newcastle-on-Tyne through the efforts of the Mission.

At the evening gathering, after tea had been partaken of by a great company, the hall presented a crowded appearance as Sir George Williams took the chair. He was received with loving warmth, and spoke with a genial heartiness which delighted all present. Mr. Gerald R. Coultas, one of the evangelists, spoke on some racecourse missions of the Society, and Rev. G. Arthur Sowter, M.A., Vicar of St. James', Hatcham, won every heart by an address which will live long in the memory of all who heard it.

The secretary, Mr. Frank Cockrem, read a report which bristled with telling facts and striking figures, stating that 957 towns and villages had been the scene of the Society's labours during the year, that 882 races, fairs, and fêtes had been visited by its evangelists, that 3,252 special services had been held, that more than a million Gospel publications had been distributed, and that there was every reason to believe hundreds of souls had passed from death unto life as the immediate fruit.

Lieut.-Colonel Mackinlay, the honorary secretary, presented a financial statement showing that the Society was free from debt, and that the income was on a steadily ascending scale, having now reached £2,890. Altogether this Mission enters on its jubilee year with high hope and eager purpose to seek yet more and more the salvation of our home heathen.

City Policemen.

A FERVENT missionary spirit has been the dominant characteristic of the City Police Institute from its inception. A social centre it should be, and is. As "an undenominational mission of policemen to policemen," it exercises a wide and spiritual influence.

New premises have recently been secured at 19, Cheapside. Brightly decorated, furnished with prettily painted texts, and with accommodation for the supply of refreshments, the Institute will assuredly fill a useful place in the life of the great metropolis, and is certain to command general popularity among the force. The opening gathering, which took place on the afternoon of Wednesday week was largely attended. The ceremony of "unlocking the door" was performed by Mrs. Nott-Bower, wife of the newly-appointed City Police Commissioner.

Subsequently Rev. Francis Paynter presided over a hearty gathering of the police and their friends. He sounded a note of praise for the eager desire manifested by many policemen to come out boldly on the Lord's side, and encouraged his hearers with the promise (Hag. ii. 19) "From this day will I bless you." Captain Nott-Bower, who followed, expressed the indebtedness of the police to the friends who had made it possible for them to gather in such a central and convenient home.

Lessons of high spiritual import were drawn by Prebendary Webb-Peploe from Ex. vi. 6, in a dedicatory address. The speaker powerfully depicted some of the joys and privileges of those who follow the Master whole-heartedly, having emerged from the "wilderness" into the "Canaan" life.

From the report issued by Mr. H. Leng (hon. sec.), it is evident that in the Bible class and other departments of work good progress is being made, while the influence of the converted constables is seen in their Samaritan efforts for the help of the needy and distressed whom they meet in their midnight rounds. One of them writes: "We see strange sights on night duty, when most people are wrapt in slumber. I had occasion, one cold night, in the execution of my duty, to awaken out of sleep—which might have been his last—the most pitiable specimen of humanity it was ever my lot to meet. In conversation with the man I found him to be very much my superior in education, he having had a University training. He told me how he had fallen step by step until, losing the confidence of all his friends, and dreading to meet God, he was just eking out this miserable existence, with no home, no friends, no money, without God and without hope in the world. I talked to him as best I could, gave him a little help, and bid him go and get something to eat. I have heard talk about transformation scenes, but to see that same man come back to thank me three or four nights after was a living testimony that the day of miracles is not yet ended. He had found work, regained his self-respect, was decently clad, and I have every reason to believe his soul was won for the Master."

Mr. Leng anticipates that the work amongst the young men will be made much easier at the new premises, as they are within five minutes walk of the training centre and three other stations. "We hope to make our social evenings attractive, instructive, and a real blessing to the young men, of whom so many come up to town from country homes and from the influences of godly parents. Herein lie our hopes for the future."

Reformatory and Refuge Union.

An opportunity was afforded the public on Wednesday afternoon, last week, of witnessing some of the results of the far-reaching work which is being daily accomplished by the Reformatory and Refuge Union. It was the annual meeting of this excellent Association, and St. James' Hall had very few vacant seats. A special feature of the demonstration was the presence of a choir of 500 children drawn from various industrial schools of the metropolis, and a band composed of boys from the Children's Home, Farnboro'. Their performances were an eloquent tribute to the thoroughness of this phase of the Society's work, and their songs and pretty musical drills elicited warm appreciation. It was not easy to realize that this company of happy children had known any other life than the one they are now enjoying, for no trace of the terrible surroundings from which most of them have been rescued could be observed.

The past year has been one of notable activity for the Union and its thirty agents in their nine distinct departments. No fewer than 423 children have been placed in homes and schools; several have emigrated, others have been placed in situations; twenty-eight have been removed from evil surroundings without being sent to industrial schools. The educational inspector visited and examined 1,040 children in twenty-three homes, while fifteen institutions and 750 children were examined in Holy Scripture. The cases which have come under the care and influence of the workers in the female mission department of the Union number 1,370; while the mission houses in different parts of London have received young women from almost every county in England. In the same period there have been 16,110 inmates in the Magdalen Homes associated with the Union in the United Kingdom.

An old friend and loyal supporter of the Society, Sir John Dorington, M.P., presided, and, in the course of a brief address, pointed out that the Union brings into touch most of the institutions which are in operation for the saving of children throughout the Kingdom. It had also rendered useful service by gathering together and expressing public opinion as to the better organization of such institutions. A remarkable and useful Act has been passed regarding youthful offenders, which does not oblige an offending child of twelve years to be committed to a reformatory, but to an industrial school, where the treatment is milder. He expressed his regret that the training ship, Formidable was to be taken away from Bristol, but a building for carrying on its work as far as possible would be erected on shore.

In the course of a ten-minutes address to the 500 children, Rev. A. E. Richardson, B.D., combined some timely counsel and earnest exhortation, and his words were received with eager attention by his young hearers. Sir Robert Anderson, K.C.B., made an urgent appeal for extended support of the work, which he designated as an excellent investment, inasmuch as it saved the children of vagrants and offenders against the law from following the course of their parents, and becoming a burden to the country. Sir Mark McT. Stewart, M.P., Sir A. N. Agnew, M.P., Rev. Thomas Turner, and Mr. John Trevarthen also spoke; and an interesting item in the proceedings was the distribution of prizes by Lady Agnew to the competitors who were successful in the recent Scripture examination.

London Evangelistic Singers' Union.

The annual rally of the members of the London Evangelistic Singers' Union took place at Mildmay Conference Hall on Monday. The association, it will be remembered, was founded some three years ago, primarily for the drawing together of singers of the Gospel for united evangelistic effort in different parts of London. There was a large attendance, comprising members of the North Evangelistic Choir, the Stratford Evangelistic Choir, Peckham Evangelistic Choir, and many singers formerly connected with Mr. Sankey's London choirs.

After an hour of social intercourse, Colonel Morton presided over an enthusiastic meeting. From the report presented by the secretary (Mr. H. Beaton), it is evident that the choirs constituting the union have rendered valuable service during the past year. Perhaps their most important engagement was the Islington Tent Mission, where a choir of about 250 volunteered their aid; and there is every reason to believe that the singing of the Gospel was the means used by the Spirit for the awakening of many of the 800 converts who were registered. Numerous other organizations have been assisted by the Union, which now numbers over 400 members.

Christianity in Commerce.

Out of the great army of commercial travellers in Great Britain some 2,500 have joined the Commercial Travellers' Christian Association. Last year 324 new members were added to the numbers, and 473 were aided by the Beneficent Fund of the Society. At the annual meetings on Saturday, at Exeter Hall, there was a large assembly of delegates from many parts of the country. The afternoon gathering took the form of a conference, when the delegates gave reports of their work. Mr. George Hardy, L.C.C., occupied the chair, and the secretary, Mr. A. R. Baldock, in his report, remarked that the year which had just passed had been a severe testing for many Christians engaged in commerce. The continuation of the war and the consequent increase of taxation had caused feelings of deep depression in the minds of many manufacturers, and most commercial travellers had been influenced by it. Business demanded more time and thought than ever, competition was increasing, and the natural anxiety to satisfy employers and provide for families was often very intense.

Sir George Williams was re-elected president, and expressed his pleasure in seeing the society so vigorous, strong, and capable.

In the evening, Mr. R. W. Perks, M.P., who presided, devoted his remarks to the consideration of the important, but often unrecognised, part played in history by the man of commerce, and went on to consider the high qualities needed in the stress of modern competition. Proceeding, Mr. Perks said the position of the country was commercially serious, and they must make the people understand that it was laziness and mental inertia that are going to cause England to sink commercially, together with drunkenness and gambling and love of pleasure. Let them preach commercially a Gospel of temperance, thrift, industry, hard work, and reasonable enterprise on Christian lines.

Among other speakers were Rev. T. P. Bullen, Mr. Leonard Courtney, &c.

Obituary.

REV. DR. BARNES.

The earnest evangelistic preacher, Rev. Dr. Barnes, was laid in the grave at Folkestone, on Monday, April 21, in the midst of a great concourse of mourners. The service was read at Emmanuel Church and at the grave by Rev. A. E. Clementi-Smith, M.A., Oxon., and Rev. F. Bickford Heard, and addresses in each place were given by Rev. J. B. Figgis, M.A. We hope to give some account of Dr. Barnes' remarkable life and work, accompanied by a portrait, in a future issue.

REV. CANON POPE, LISBON.

We regret to announce the death of the well-known English chaplain at Lisbon, Rev. Canon Pope, D.D., whose work for the English colony, and especially for the reformers of Portugal, are so well known to English Christians. Canon Pope was the trusted friend and co-worker with the late Archbishop Plunket, and the two Irishmen laboured most unselfishly for the native Protestants in the Peninsula. To Canon Pope's scholarship is due the rich treasury of devotion now used by the reformers, and he was privileged during his connection with the movement to see the native congregations multiply sixfold and increase in influence. He said a few months before his death, "I never expected to see such a change in public opinion towards the reformers." May God bless the leaders left behind and give them a right judgment in all things.

MISS ELIZABETH NASH.

This excellent and beloved Christian lady fell asleep on April 17, at her residence in Clifton, having nearly completed her ninety-third year. Though originally connected with the Church of England, she had been associated for the last thirty-three years with the church at Bethesda, Bristol. Her mental faculties remained bright and clear to the last, and it was a pleasure to observe her keen interest in spiritual things. She was a staunch Protestant, and watched intelligently the movements of the present day among Ritualists and their antagonists. The work of foreign missions, and the efforts of the Bible and tract societies, were also followed by her with lively interest. Though looking for the coming of the Lord, she spoke cheerfully of the prospect of departure to be with Christ. To a friend, who visited her two days before her death, she said, "Well, I suppose the old tabernacle is being taken down, but it was a strong tabernacle and it takes a long time." On the morning of her departure, The Christian for that week was brought in. She always welcomed the arrival of the paper, and taking up this new number tried to read it; but the feeble hands soon dropped, and in an hour or two she had passed into the presence of her Lord. Her remains were interred in the family grave in Arno's Vale Cemetery, April 22.

Personalia.

Rev. A. R. Buckland has been appointed by the Religious Tract Society to the office of secretary, in succession to Prebendary Borrett White. Mr. Buckland will retain the preachership of the Foundling Hospital, and will not altogether sever his connection with the Evangelical Press.

Rev. Dr. Parker, after occupying the pulpit on Sunday morning last, was unable to preach in the evening owing to a severe attack of internal neuralgia. A favourable report was made by Sir Thomas Barlow, who was called in for special consultation, and there is no apprehension of a serious turn. Rest and change are advised, after which Dr. Parker expects to resume his duties.

About a Big Fire.

I EXPECT most of you heard of the great fire that occurred in London on Monday night last week. I happened to be passing near the place soon after it broke out, and had a clear view of the magnificent but dreadful scene.

It spread very rapidly from house to house, tremendous flames bursting from the windows and up through the roofs (which soon fell in), so that it seemed like a large and terrible fiery furnace, which is just what it really was. Presently the wind carried the flames across the street, and soon ignited the houses opposite, in spite of all the efforts of the firemen to prevent it. In all between twenty and thirty premises were either entirely burnt or very seriously damaged.

There are a great many lessons that may be drawn from this sad occurrence, but I am only going to touch upon those that relate to EVIL-SPEAKING. I should not be surprised if some of you exclaim, "Whatever can a fire have to do with that?" but if you will turn in your Bibles to James iii. 5, 6, you will find these words: "Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth. The tongue is a fire." And then the Apostle goes on to speak of the blessing of "a good conversation," and the unhappy effects of "envyings and strife."

We can all understand the first part, for we know how a great fire may be started by a small match, or even by a very tiny spark. Perhaps, too, some of you know from experience that a little cross word will often lead to a big outbreak of TEMPER and QUARRELLING.

And the worst of it is, that it not only affects those immediately concerned, but other people as well. Just as the London fire spread from house to house on either side and across the street, so do quarrels often extend their mischief far beyond their original limits, until other people are involved who had nothing to do with the original outbreak at all.

Think, too, of the terrible expense and inconvenience a great fire causes—the destruction of fine premises with all their valuable contents; the stoppage of traffic, so that people cannot go about their own business properly; the danger to life; the cost of the fire brigade and police; and also the sad fact that, while it gives extra work to some, it throws hundreds of people out of work.

Now, to some extent the same applies to what St. James calls "ENVYING and STRIFE," and also what the Psalmist speaks of as "BACKBITING." These are like a fire which begins with some unkind or thoughtless word, and the mischief grows until lots of people are injured by it; a good deal of water flows (from the eyes!) before it is put out, and everybody feels unhappy and uncomfortable all round. And then there is what we politely call "STORY-TELLING" (which the Bible more forcibly describes as "LYING"). What trouble is caused in this way! I once found this little poem (or something like it) in an American paper, which it will do you good to learn by heart.

WHAT BECAME OF A LIE.

First somebody told it.
Then the room wouldn't hold it,
For the busy tongues rolled it,
And got it outside.
When the crowd came across it
They never once lost it,
But tossed it, and tossed it
Till it grew long and wide.

This lie brought forth others—
Dark sisters and brothers,
And fathers and mothers—
A terrible crew;
And as headlong they hurried,
The people they flurried,
And bothered and worried,
As lies always do.

At last, evil-boded,
It fretted and goaded,
Till at last it exploded
In sin and in shame;
While through smoke and through fire
The pieces flew higher,
Till they hit the sad liar,
And killed his good name.

But it is good to know that if "the tongue is a fire" as regards words that do harm, it is equally so concerning those that do good. I have given you a "Bible-Searcher" this week about both kinds, which I hope you will do well; and will try to use your words only for "good conversation," so as to make your own life, and that of your friends, happy and bright, and, above all, to please Jesus, "in Whom was no sin, neither was guile found in His mouth."

The Christian Sabbath.

'Tis Sabbath Morn! how bright and glad!
The Church, in all her beauty clad,
Should lift to heaven a rapturous voice,
And in her risen Lord rejoice!

Then, as we at the footstool bend
Of heavenly grace, whence hymns ascend
From rich and poor, with hearts at rest,
What sunshine fills the Christian's breast!

And as we homeward wend our way,
Rejoicing through the Sabbath Day,
Our hearts yet tuned to praised the while,
All Nature doth around us smile!

The birds their songs unceasing sing,
The swallow flits on joyful wing,
Sweet flowers around our pathway bloom,
And heaven forbids one thought of gloom!

In Jesu's name should Christians pray
For blessings on the Sabbath Day,
And render praise for grace thus given,
To cheer us on our way to heaven!

The "Christian" Bible Searcher.

NEW TERM.—RULES FOR BIBLE SEARCHERS.

Answers to the "Bible Searcher" are acknowledged in two lists:—

(1) Those received up to Monday morning, in the next Thursday's issue.
(2) Those received later, in the one following. Answers for the "second list" which reach the office after midday Wednesday are too late. Those from Scotland and Ireland only will be received till Thursday morning.

No Concordance may be used or help given with the answers, but the questions may be explained when necessary.

No papers can be re-examined.

It is necessary that letters should be properly stamped, and that names should be written very distinctly. A star (*) is given for neatness and extra care in answering the questions.

All communications must be addressed to "Uncle Tom," the Young People's Editor of "The Christian," 12, Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C.

☞ PRIZE COMPETITION.—RULES.

The Prize Competitions are held at the end of April, August and December in each year,

There will thus be seventeen weekly Searchers before next Competition, for which those will be eligible whose names appear as correct in the weekly list twelve times between May 1 and August 28.

Those whose 10th or 13th birthdays occur during this period may continue the weekly Searcher in the same division, but must enter for the Prize Competition for their actual age. There is no limit of age for weekly Searchers; but no one above eighteen years of age can enter for the Competitions.

NEW TERM.

THIS WEEK'S BIBLE SEARCHER (No. 328).*

From the following chapters given, find and write out the part of the text or texts referring to the various headings.

BAD
- Envy (Prov. xxvii.; Prov. xxiii; 1 Cor xiii.).
- Strife (Rom. xiii.; Gal. v.; Jas. iii.).
- Deceit (Jer. xvii.; Prov. xi.; Jer. ix.).

Personal.

Many thanks for the flowers that have arrived during the week.

Violette Birney.—Your box of toys arrived quite safely. Thank you very much. I will write to you about the toys later on.

Millicent Buckingham.—I hope you will like your new school; perhaps after you are settled down there, you may find time to continue the "Searcher."

Maude Nottage.—I am glad that you were so successful, and hope you will not have to wait long.

The following gave no address on their papers, so I could not send them postcards to tell them they were eligible for the competition:—Harold Berry, May Hazledine, Alice Mackenzie.

Camberwell Mission and Ragged School.

IT is gratifying to find that this institution, which made a beginning more than ninety years ago, is doing a most needful and useful work in the dense slum in which it is situated. A few years ago the building was renewed at a cost of £3,000, and now its better accommodation of halls and class-rooms enables the varied branches of the work of a modern ragged school to be prosecuted vigorously. Its joint hon. secretaries are Mr. John Kirk, the secretary of the Ragged School Union, and his lieutenant, Mr. A. H. Ward. Apparently they do not get enough of the Ragged School atmosphere at 32, John Street, W.C., so many of their evening hours are spent at Camberwell.

The annual meeting was held a few days ago, when a goodly company of visitors were made welcome by the teachers and residents. Every evening of the week has its appointed meetings, and the work done is of a most varied character. It is a centre for the cripple children of the district. A youths' club is full of promise. The Bible classes are notable features. There are Sunday schools for all ages. The Band of Hope, the Boys' Brigade, a Labour Loan Club are well spoken of by the neighbours.

Addresses were given by Mr. Travers Buxton (chairman), who is the treasurer; Revs. G. A. Shaw, C. S. Hull, and others. Two presentations formed a very pleasant feature of the meeting. The first was a harmonium to Miss Terry, a lady who has endeared herself to the older girls by long and devoted labours on their behalf; the second, an address and books to Mr. and Mrs. A. H. Ward, in recognition of their long and fruitful service to the school.

Prayer a Necessity (Matt. xxvi. 26-46).

OUR Lord had a clear prevision of the temptation which was threatening his disciples, and especially Peter. He knew that the Shepherd was now to be smitten and the flock scattered (v. 31); He knew also Peter's self-reliance—he did not know himself, he thought that he could be steadfast when all else failed—and with the utmost delicacy our Lord sought to prepare him against the future. Nothing is more absolutely perilous for any of us than to think ourselves able to stand in the hour of temptation. Have you not sometimes, when you knew the temptation was near, heard a voice in your soul saying, "There is no need to be affrighted, you will be able to overcome"? Have you not even sometimes had a colloquy with the tempting spirit, challenging it, and boasting that you could stand, come what might; but you have never failed more absolutely than you have done in those moments of self-confidence. And, amid the storm of voices within your soul, have you not been conscious of other gentler accents pleading with you? If so, you have known again in your experience the counterpart of what happened to Peter in this paragraph.

It is not enough for the soul to rest on an outward ordinance. Amid the most solemn associations, the Apostle had eaten the symbol of the body, and drunk the symbol of the blood of the Lord. At that first Lord's Supper he must have pledged himself to be more than ever devoted to the Lord, intending henceforth to be strong in his strength, and tender with his love; and yet this was not enough to stay him in the hour of trial from yielding to cowardice and blasphemy.

The most urgent warnings are not sufficient in themselves to carry us through the hour of trial. Nothing could have been plainer than our Saviour's words, "Before the cock crow, thou shalt deny me thrice." We should have thought that Peter would have been aroused to take such heed, that it would have been impossible for him to fall; and yet the slender railing of his own purpose was not sufficient to intercept his fall over the precipice to which he was hurrying. To be forewarned is not always to be forearmed. To know our danger is not always to prepare for it.

Even repeated arousal by the Spirit of God is not sufficient to keep us when temptation breaks. Peter was taken into the inner mysteries of Gethsemane. James and John and he were allowed to wade deeper into the flood of anguish than was permitted to their brethren. He saw the Master's sorrowful face; he heard Him with trembling accents say that He was sore troubled; he knew that the Master was depending upon him to keep his watch; he might even have heard the accents of the Lord pleading that the cup might pass from Him. And again, and yet again, he felt himself touched by that gentle hand, aroused and bidden to watch and pray that he might not enter into temptation; and yet he fell. Appeals to feeling, to gratitude, to emotion may not be enough to steady you in the dark hour; in spite of all, you may fail.

Prayer is the absolute necessity of the tempted soul. To pray against yourself: to lay hold upon the Shepherd who was smitten, but lives for evermore: to see to it that the whole of the inner nature is made strong by the presence of Him who is greater than the spirit which dominates the world. See to it that in lonely fellowship with God, in unslumbering prayer; your soul is made strong to stand in the evil day.

Lastly, when the Lord said, "Sleep on now and take your rest," it was as though He said that the hour in which they could have helped Him and prepared for the battle was over. How often He still turns over the leaf of privilege and opportunity, and says, "That is done; I can never turn it back again." When the heart fills with remorse and regret, He says sweetly, "Arise, let us be going;" as though the future were yet available, as though He were prepared to give us another chance, as though life might yet have a store of privilege and usefulness. F. B. M.

Daybreak in Spain.—The new Ministry in Spain has announced its determination to follow the example of its neighbour in dealing with the unauthorised congregations of monks and nuns. The provincial Governors have now been called upon to furnish the requisite statistics. Signor Sagasta has stated that he had received protestations from the Pope against any dispersions, but he held out no hope of any withdrawal by the Government. Naturally the Roman journals are indignant at the threatened expulsion of "inoffensive men and women, whose only desire is to lead a quiet life," as one of the papers puts it; but Spain, happily, appears to be, however slowly, turning her eyes towards the light.

Peter Delivered from Prison (Acts xii. 1-19).
Golden Text—(Acts iii. 19).

THE prejudice and hatred of the Jews had not ceased. It was only smouldering, and would blaze out again with renewed force at the first opportunity.

About the time when Saul and Barnabas arrived in Jerusalem on their errand of mercy from Antioch (A.D. 44), that opportunity occurred, and the enemy had found an instrument willing and ready for his purpose in the grandson of the "Murderer of the Innocents" (Matt. ii. 16), and brother of the cruel and vindictive Herodias (Matt. xiv. 8, 10, 11).

Herod Agrippa I. at this time was king of all Palestine (tributary to Rome), and the power then placed in his hands by Rome was used to vex and molest the Church of Christ (v. 1, and does not the same fact remain with us also to-day?)

A time-serving man-pleaser, and that solely for his own ends. Unscrupulous in his cruelty and contemptible in his meanness was Herod Agrippa, for it does not seem he was prompted by conscientious scruples or even personal hatred to the Church or her faith, but by a wish to please the people over whom he ruled, so as to enhance his own popularity.

James, the brother of John, had been one of the three disciples whom Jesus, when He was on earth, admitted into his inner circle of companionship. He is "the only Apostle of whose death we have any certain record," and the first to win a martyr's crown.

A Night Scene in Jerusalem.

Some Sleeping.—(1) Herod and his flatterers, on soft pillows and luxuriant couches, confident of their prisoner.

(2) The Jews and their elders, after eating the Passover lamb, and closing their great feast with thanksgiving.

(3) Peter, in his prison cell, chained and doomed (as far as man could see), sleeping on a prison pillow the sleep of restful faith in God.

Some Waking.—(1) A praying group in the house of John Mark's mother, Barnabas' aunt Mary. The telegraph office of prayer is always open, and the shortest road by which to reach our friends in trouble is round by way of heaven.

(2) The angel who had charge of Peter (Psa. xci. 11). What a glorious Passover Peter had in his chains that night! Sheltered under the blood of the Lamb of God, and the angel of deliverance in his cell, to wake him and set him free for more work in his Master's harvest field.

It is easier to call Rhoda (Rose) a silly girl than to excuse the brethren in the prayer-meeting their shortness of faith. Maybe they had been praying for grace to sustain him, and a glorious testimony in death; and the Lord answered like Eph. iii. 20.

Illustration.

One Sunday morning, when the sun was shining with a fiercer heat than ever, after weeks of drought, a little girl was seen by her minister trudging along the dusty road towards the church with a very big umbrella in her hand. "Nellie, child, whatever have you got that large umbrella for on such a morning as this?" "Why, minister," said the child, "father told me you said we are going to pray in church for rain this morning, and of course, I brought an umbrella to carry over me as I go home again." After church the minister was glad to share the little girl's umbrella as the rain came down in refreshing showers, but he felt ashamed that her faith had reached higher than his own.

Practical Questions.

1. When Herod Agrippa stood before God, of what use was the cloak of religion he had worn in life?

"In the day when God shall judge the secrets of men" (Rom. ii. 16), it will be better to hear the "'Well done!' of the King" than remember the empty flattery of the world.

2. When we are in grave trouble, to whom do we turn?

"If only mother was alive!" "If brother was here he would help me!" God lives and is present. Note Psa. xlvi. 1, "A very present help in trouble," and Joshua iii. 10.

3. What is prevailing prayer?

The cry that "links our weakness on to Almighty Strength." God knows all about the trouble, but He will have his children tell Him. "When He shall hear He will answer" (Isa. xxx. 19).

4. If our strength is only weakness, and the devil knows exactly where our weak places are, what can we do?

Read what Jesus said to Peter, Luke xxii. 31, 32, by the side of Heb. vii. 25 and iv. 16, and trusting in Peter's Saviour, claim the help He is always ready to give. There is only one channel by which to get strength for all our emergencies—humble, trustful, believing prayer.

Pastors' College Conference.

THE thirty-eighth Conference of this ever-growing association held its meetings on the five days extending from Monday to Friday of last week, the first assembly being a praise and prayer meeting at the College at four o'clock on Monday afternoon, at which Mr. Charles Spurgeon presided. The enthusiasm which prevailed seemed to be worthy of the best days of C. H. Spurgeon, and it was noted that an unusual number of pastors were present, who had come from various stations in our own Colonies, and the United States. There were in all thirteen of these brethren.

Mr. Thomas Spurgeon (president) presided at the evening meeting in the Tabernacle. He said that they had reason to thank God for the restoration of several of their friends from sickness, specially mentioning his brother, the vice-president, who was still far from well, and Dr. McCaig, Principal of the College, who was also too unwell to be present. A cordial welcome was given to pastors who had come from distant lands. Rev. W. Higlett, who went to Queensland twenty years ago, spoke of bush and mission work in that colony. A great empire was being built up, and it was their desire that its foundations should be laid in righteousness. Rev. R. B. Morrison gave an account of what had been done in the neighbourhood of Bournemouth; and an address followed by Rev. W. Walker, of Bishops Stortford.

The President's Address.

The Conference re-assembled on Tuesday morning. The presidential address of Mr. Thomas Spurgeon occupied nearly an hour. He spoke from the words: "And the Apostles said unto the Lord, Increase our faith." He felt his own need, and then thought the words might do for a text. The theme concerned them, and not the Twelve only. There was an apostleship of Christ in the world. "By their fruits ye shall know them"; and success was better than Apostolical Succession. As Paul's Gospel was his Gospel, he claimed succession to him. No true apostles were raised above suppliance, though popes might claim infallibility. They did well to speak out their desires, and thus to pray definitely. He who felt need, felt it deeply. They were like proof-sheets; if one error occurred it showed in a large number of copies. They should ask for definite spiritual gifts. Christ's disciples often asked for things of a material kind. Was there no soul-hunger for things for the inner, as well as the outer man?

The disciples did not pray because of some mystery; there was a close connection between an offending brother and the cry for faith. They must be men of peace, and show no unforgiving spirit, and they could preach this if they practised it. He was below himself who was not above doing an injury. He who could not forgive broke down the bridge over which he must himself pass. The Apostles did well to recognise the remedy. They did not ask for patience, self-control charity, &c., because faith was the principle in all other graces. It was also needed for righteousness; they had not to stop the mouth of lions, they had the equally difficult task of stopping their own mouths. There was no Philistine to fight, but rather their own sins. Faith was associated with love in the New Testament; God had joined them together. Lack of character was to be traced to lack of faith. Having this strength, they thought better of others, and were more severe in judging of self.

Faith was needed for all Christ-like deeds; it lifted them above Rationalism and criticism. They should welcome offences which tried their faith, and thank God for a discipline of difficulty—a word which occurred but once in the Bible, and was then only in the margin. Christ gave a pointed rejoinder to the Apostle's request, and then added a parable. Perhaps it was a call to exercise what faith they had. Faith unused soon became unusable. Thus Christ warned them against spiritual pride. They must cease from self-trust, and account themselves unprofitable servants. Forgiving love had to be limitless. By way of cheer, the assembled pastors were reminded that all preachers had their fainting fits. Still God needed them all, and they should not allow seasons of barrenness or of failure to discourage them, for they might be starting-points for new developments.

DEPENDENCE ON THE HOLY SPIRIT.

When the Conference reassembled at eleven o'clock on the following morning Pastor FRANK H. WHITE (vice-president) presided at a special Devotion Session, the general subject for discussion being "The Ministers' Dependence on the Holy Spirit's Ministry." Rev. W. Y. Fullerton was to have opened the subject, but was unable to attend in consequence of his recent accident. Mr. White showed that preachers must be men of God if they were to speak for God. To have his spirit was to be able to do what He would have them to do. There was a loud call for spiritual men.

Rev. R. WRIGHT HAY gave a striking account was given of a Hindu convert's steadfastness under persecution. It was shown that ministers lived by the Spirit, and could not preach better than they lived. They were dependent on the Holy Spirit in prayer; and the Gospel never saved a soul apart from the Holy Ghost. The President read a letter on the subject from Mr. Fullerton.

THE COLLEGE.

Alderman G. WHITE, M.P., presided at the meeting of subscribers on Wednesday evening. Mr. THOMAS SPURGEON welcomed the friends, and assured them that the report was encouraging from all standpoints. The college paid well; the deacons of the Tabernacle were trustees; he and his brother were united in the management. The men loved the tutors, and the tutors loved the men. The students were men of faith and prayer, and he believed that they became not less so when they left for their work. The finances presented a brighter outlook; for although over £500 had been expended on repairs, they had expended only £17 in excess of their income. That was what he had been praying for, and it was mainly owing to the increased subscriptions of country congregations.

They were aiming high, and he believed that they would soon have more coming in. Eleven students had settled during the year; there was no difficulty in obtaining men, nor in getting rid of them, not a few being sons of their own men. The work was worthy of help.

In the course of his address, the CHAIRMAN showed that the College was founded in principles which commended themselves. Pastor CHARLES SPURGEON (vice-president) made a strong appeal for help, and addresses followed by Revs. R. WALKER (Chesham), F. J. HUMPHREY (Whitley), and others. The collection amounted to £1,200.

The Conference reassembled at eleven o'clock on Thursday, when several letters were read from members abroad. Rev. G. J. KNIGHT read a paper on, "Men Wondered At;" and Rev. G. MENZIES read on, "The Laws that Govern Prayer." Some business followed. Rev. T. W. MEDHURST was elected vice-president. Votes of thanks were passed to those who had entertained the members during the week; and to Mrs. C. H. Spurgeon, whose health was reported to be better, for her personal gift of a copy to each minister of her late husband's "Prayer-Meeting Addresses." The annual meeting took place in the Tabernacle in the evening, the president in the chair, addresses being given by Messrs. C. Spurgeon, J. C. Carlile, and others.

The Annual Report showed the income to be £3,852, and the expenditure £3,869. In his remarks on the condition of the college, the President says: "Pulse and temperature are all that could be desired. I know of no symptoms of an alarming or even of a suspicious nature." The remarks of Principal MCCAIG are also encouraging and interesting, and he adds: "I am glad that I can, as heretofore, bear testimony to the sterling character and devout spirit of the students." The number of men educated now shows a total of 1,031, and of these, 657 are still in the ranks as pastors, missionaries, and evangelists. The Association now numbers 85,351.

Church of England.

About 100 of the workmen engaged in fitting up Westminster Abbey for the Coronation service assemble after their mid-day meal to join in a service conducted by Archdeacon Wilberforce.

H.R.H. the Princess of Wales visited Bethnal Green, E., on April 23 in connection with an effort to raise funds for the Workmen's Hotel and Cottage Hospital which have been started by Rev. J. E. Watts-Ditchfield, vicar of St. James-the-Less.

The anonymous donor of a site in Handsworth New Road, Birmingham, for a church, parsonage, and Sunday-schools, has now added to this gift by promising to build the church outright, subject to certain conditions. It is hoped that, in the course of a few weeks, it will be possible to proceed with the erection of the building. It is intended that the church shall be a memorial to Latimer.

The Bishop of Worcester, while expressing gratitude for the anonymous offer of £10,000 towards the endowment of a Birmingham bishopric, holds that it will be best to wait a year before taking further action in the matter, in order to explore the causes which caused the failure of a previous effort. Meanwhile, Bishop Gore knows of "a second contribution of £10,000, which will be at our command when we make our fresh departure."

The vicar of Barrow-on-Humber, Rev. John Parker, is appealing for £1,110. Mr. Parker built a district church at New Holland, costing £3,750, which was opened in January last, free from debt. Efforts are now being put forth to raise £610 for fittings and for freeing the ancient parish church and schools from debt. It is also hoped to erect an iron church for about 300 brickmakers and their families in a distant part of the parish. Mr. Parker is thoroughly Evangelical, and in his preaching aims at the conversion of the people.

Congregational.

During the pastorate of Dr. Barrett at Princes Street Church, Norwich, now extending over thirty-five years, 2,013 persons have been received into church fellowship, 107 of these last year, and the church has raised in that time £82,210, independent of the pastor's income. The church has now 707 members.

The twenty-fourth anniversary of the church at Fareham, and the fifth of the settlement of Rev. W. Henry Rees, have been celebrated. At the public meeting the pastor stated that the past year has been one of steady growth; there was an increase in the membership, which is now larger than for many years; the sum of £45 has been contributed to the Twentieth Century Fund; and there is an encouraging increase in the number of scholars in the Sunday-school. Stimulating addresses were delivered by Revs. D. D. Johns, B.A. (Winchester), and A. Pringle (Caterham).

Baptist.

Rev. Silas Mead, late principal of Harley College, has accepted a call to be co-pastor, with Rev. A. S. Wilson, of the Baptist Church at Perth, West Australia.

It is officially announced that only £10,000 is now required of the £250,000 of the Century Fund. Six churches have contributed over £3,000 each, including Heath Street Church, Hampstead, N.W., Rev. William Brock, which heads the list with £5,269.

At Ramsden Road Church, Balham, S.W. (Pastor, Rev. T. Greenwood), a new schoolroom has been opened. A house adjoining the church was purchased a few years since, and the whole garden has now been covered with the schoolroom, the rooms in the house being useful for classes. The total outlay, including land, will be about £3,900, and towards this about £2,570 has been raised.

At Stevenage, Herts, a new church has been opened, with encouraging gatherings. The building was presented and furnished by Mr. John Marnham, J.P., of Boxmoor, the treasurer of Herts Baptist Union, the site being purchased by the church. Rev. W. Robinson conducted a devotional service in the morning; Rev. Charles Brown (Ferme Park), preached in the afternoon, and the donor presided at a crowded meeting in the evening. The church has for four years met in the Public Hall, and goes to its new and handsome home free from debt.

Methodist.

Primitive Methodism is making considerable progress in Oldham. During the last five years new property has been erected at a cost of over £5,000, two more ministers have been called out, and congregations are much larger. The Connexional property in the borough is worth more than £30,000. There are 544 Sunday-school teachers, with 4,200 scholars, and 5,000 adherents.

Rev. James Flanagan, of the Primitive Methodist Mission at St. George's Hall, Old Kent Road, is one of the nominees for the new post of Connexional missioner. Mr. Flanagan was a lay missioner for fifteen years before his official call to the ministry. At Leicester he conducted a Sunday afternoon Bible class of 2,500 members. He has been at St. George's Hall for twelve years, and the strain of the spiritual and social work is beginning to tell upon him.

Rev. C. W. Andrews, in the Victoria Hall, Bolton, has given a public reply to some statements which Mr. George Harwood, M.P., had recently made on grocers' licences and the increase of drinking amongst women. Mr. Andrews subjected Mr. Harwood's sayings to a careful analysis. In 1879 the death rate amongst women from intemperance was twenty-four per million; in 1899 it was seventy per million. The head of a Home for Inebriate Women, with thirty years' experience, said he believed ninety per cent. of his cases were traceable to grocers' licences. The Lancet has published a strongly-worded document against women drinking, signed by 914 medical men. In 1872 there were 2,300 grocers' wine licences; in 1882, 3,742; in 1901, 6,540. Spirit licences have gone up from 2,600 in 1872, and 6,023 in 1882, to 9,746 in 1901.

Presbyterian.

In the Tower of London Presbyterian services are conducted in the famous old Norman church, St. John's Chapel, where a chaplain of the Church of Scotland officiates at times when there are sufficient Presbyterian soldiers on duty in the Tower.

Rev. Dr. Thain Davidson has invited Mr. W. King H. Macdonald, M.A., to become his assistant at Ealing, after leaving Westminster College, Cambridge, and receiving licence in June. Mr. Macdonald has accepted, and is expected to enter on his duties in July.

The annual missionary meeting, to be held in the Queen's Hall, W., on May 13 at 7 p.m., promises to be of exceptional interest. The chairman will be the distinguished missionary, Rev. Dr. Stewart, of Lovedale, South Africa, the Presbyterian Church of England Missions will be represented by Rev. Dr. Gibson, of Swatow, Rev. W. Campbell, of Formosa, and Miss Rolfe, of the Jewish Mission. For the first time in twelve years all who are to take part in the services of the evening, including the soloist, the singers, and the speakers, are Presbyterians.

The twenty-fifth anniversary of Rev. Robert Stewart's ministry on Tyneside has been celebrated. For twenty years his labours in Gateshead had been richly blessed of God. During that time he built and cleared of debt the fine Durham Road Church. Then came the call to Benwell, a western suburb of Newcastle, and there again he has converted what was a small mission hall into a magnificent church, which is now almost clear of debt. The Gateshead and Benwell congregations united in paying public honour to Mr. Stewart and his devoted service, and in signalizing the occasion by tangible tokens.

Society of Friends.

Bedfordshire Quarterly Meeting, held at Luton on the 16th and 17th ult., was more largely attended than for many years past. Some of the smaller meetings within the four associated counties were particularly well represented. Verbal reports on Adult School work in various centres provided an entirely new feature of interest at the Quarterly Meeting on Ministry and Oversight held on the evening of the 16th.

William Hobson held Gospel meetings at Chesham from Sunday, the 13th, to the 17th ult. They were felt to be times of spiritual blessing. On the 16th a lecture was given on "William Penn, Colonist and Statesman," the room being nicely filled, and the lecturer attentively listened to. Local interest was keen, in view of the proximity of Penn's burial place. The work in Chesham seems to be very encouraging.

In connection with Munster Quarterly Meeting, held recently at Cork, a meeting was held for H. Fennell White and Lydia Grubb, B.A. The former gave a most interesting account of her recent visit on religious service in Spain, in conjunction with Miss Spiers, who is actively engaged in Christian work in that country. Lydia Grubb spoke earnestly on the question of making foreign missions a subject of study as well as of earnest thought and prayer.

The many-sided Christian work which is maintained at Pontymoile, Mon., under the superintendence of Mr. Thomas M. Wintle, has passed through a year of mingled joy and sorrow, victory and trial. Early in the year the district was plunged into deep sorrow by that disastrous colliery explosion at Senghenydd, when eighty-two men lost their lives, leaving fifty-seven widows and 230 fatherless children. Day after day workers connected with the Undenominational Christian Mission visited the homes, ministering comfort and spiritual consolation to the bereaved families, and financially helping the most necessitous cases. In reviewing the work of the past year there is every cause for thanksgiving in view of the spiritual, moral, and social efforts put forth by the workers at the five mission stations which have been maintained with undiminished vigour, and on every hand signs of increasing blessing are manifest. The urgent call for help on behalf of the explosion sufferers diverted support from the general fund, and it is to be regretted that the year closes with a deficit of over £51.

Fallen Asleep.

Mrs. MILLMAN, wife of Rev. William Millman, of Yakusu, Congo. Mr. Millman had served the Baptist Missionary Society since 1897, and returned in January last year for a well-earned rest. In August he was married to Miss S. E. Langley, and left England in November for renewed work at Yakusu. They could only have just arrived at their home when the death of Mrs. Millman took place.—SISTER MARY, formerly of the West London Mission, has passed away at Sheffield, where some six years ago she commenced settlement work. Her funeral was attended by nearly 2,000 persons.—At Armagh, Rev. J. H. HANNA, D.D., minister of Tartaraghan Presbyterian Church.—At Belfast, AGNES, widow of Rev. Hugh Archibald, Congregational minister, aged seventy years.

Evangelistic.

The Railway Mission.

AN encouraging mission has been held at St. Andrew's Mission, Plymouth, by Mr. John Hawkins. Throughout the week the meetings steadily grew in numbers and power, not one night passing without God setting his seal to the faithful preaching of the Gospel by one or more seeking the Saviour. On Sunday, April 13, the meetings were all well attended, between 400 and 500 people being present at the evening service, where the power of God was abundantly manifested. In one case a railwayman and his wife left the hall so troubled that before they dare rest for the night they sought the Saviour. On the last night of the mission Mr. Hawkins gave the story of his life. The hall was crowded, and at the close there were again seekers after salvation.

Mr. Henry Thorne in Leeds.

Twenty years ago Mr. Thorne was the able and beloved secretary of the Leeds Y.M.C.A., and many old friends were glad to see and work with him once again in a ten-days' mission held at Belle Vue Chapel. The mission was undertaken chiefly in the interests of the young people connected with Belle Vue Sunday-school and Bible class, and as part of the National Mission to young people. From the first meeting Mr. Thorne won the interest and affection of these, and his gift of clear insight, of lucid interesting setting forth of Gospel truth, and of persuasive appeal were graciously used of the Spirit to lead many to the Saviour. The meetings grew in interest and in power to the last, and as a result of the mission more than a hundred young people, half of them over fourteen years of age, besides adults, have been brought to the feet of Jesus. W. B.

East Molesey Baptist Chapel.

Rev. J. T. Vine has just completed an inspiring eight-days' mission in the above chapel. Nightly the audiences were moved to tears, and many who were broken down under a sense of sin gave themselves to Christ. A special service for children was held on Saturday afternoon, and was a deeply solemn time. One little member of a family of Jewish children present resolutely gave himself to Christ, and when the meeting was held in the evening this lad stood out and boldly confessed his Lord. Many were much moved, and the incident helped to heighten the effect of a truly touching scene. Special features of the mission were the two highly interesting lectures given by the missioner. The closing service on Sunday night was a heart-searching and soul-moving occasion, and many will long remember Mr. Vine's visit.

John C. Dalrymple, Pastor.

At Lincoln April Fair.

Lincoln pleasure fair, held on the last week in April, attracts many visitors. Gospel temperance meetings are arranged for the Sunday by the Temperance Society, and this year's efforts surpassed those of previous occasions. The two special missioners were Mr. Fred Sykes, of Huddersfield, and Mr. Bob Johnson, the converted "minstrel." The proceedings opened with a prayer meeting in the Friends' Meeting House, Mr. H. Wyatt, J.P., presiding. An open-air meeting was held on the fair ground, the front of one of the shows being lent for a platform. Earnest Gospel addresses were given, and many hundreds of people stood and listened attentively to the melodies and addresses. In the afternoon a large congregation attended a meeting in the Corn Exchange, and in the evening an enormous crowd gathered in the market-place, when Messrs. Johnson and Sykes gave powerful addresses, and held the attention of the people until the close of a long and effective gathering. The day's meetings were full of encouragement; much good seed was sown.

Mr. W. H. Jude's Missions.

The well-known preacher-musician, Mr. W. H. Jude, has been conducting a series of most helpful services at Stockton-on-Tees and Darlington. At both these places his thoughtful and manly addresses have been eagerly listened to by crowded and appreciative congregations. The missioner's idea is that music of a sufficiently easy character to enable the congregation to join at least in the choruses, must be the means of uplifting the people. With this aim in view, he has set many cherished hymns to appropriate and charming melodies, varying the music to the changing sentiment of the words Of this class particular mention may be made of "Art thou weary?" which was rendered most effectively by the choir of the Greenbank Church, Darlington. The other descriptive hymns and solos were taken from Mr. Jude's volume, "Music and the Higher Life," and were all highly appreciated, especially, perhaps, the setting of "Onward Christian Soldiers." The various musical items were interspersed with Bible readings and short, pithy addresses. F. O.

Mr. W. R. Lane at Eastwood.

A ten-days' mission has been conducted by Mr. W. R. Lane at Eastwood, Notts., with gratifying results. The interest manifested by the large congregations which assembled for the first meeting of the mission increased so greatly during subsequent services that many were unable to gain admittance to the concluding gatherings. Mr. Lane's presentation of the simple Gospel message was marked by singular attractiveness and great spiritual power. It is impossible to tabulate the results of what must undoubtedly prove a memorable series of meetings; for, although large numbers passed through the inquiry room, many more were deeply moved and impressed without making any open profession of decision. In addition to the ingathering of new converts, it is already manifest that the spiritual life of all the churches united in the mission has been quickened and revived; the churches themselves have been drawn into closer fellowship; and the spirit generated for more hopefully aggressive evangelistic enterprise and Christian activity. R.

The Boy Preacher.

During the past week the mission conducted by Mr. Jack Cooke at the Westbourne Grove Baptist Church (Rev. George Freeman's) has attracted very large audiences. On the week evenings, with but one exception, the building has been crowded, and there have been many inquirers.

On Lord's Day last the edifice was crowded in the morning, when Mr. Cooke gave a helpful address to believers. In the afternoon it was estimated that over 1,200 were present at a meeting for men. Mr. Cooke spoke with telling effect to the deeply interested assembly on some of the responsibilities of life. He enlarged upon the Divine provision for the spiritual needs of man, and concluded by urging his hearers to seek salvation. There were a number of responses, and some were helped in the inquiry room. At night many hundreds were unable to gain admission. The thoroughfare was blocked, and some remarkable scenes were witnessed. Mr. Cooke spoke with power, and Mr. Freeman and Rev. J. R. Coutts were busily engaged in superintending the work in the inquiry rooms.

The mission at Westbourne Grove concludes on May 2, and Mr. Cooke begins a second mission at the Great Assembly Hall, Mile End Road, E., on May 4.

Mr. and Mrs. Alexander at Ashford.

Under the auspices of the Ashford Sunday School Union, a fruitful ten days' mission, conducted by Mr. and Mrs. Alexander, of Ilford, has been held. The various Sunday schools of the town and district united in large gatherings in the Baptist Church, on the afternoons of the 6th and 13th ult. The week-evening services took place in the Congregational Church, two afternoon Bible readings were given in the Wesleyan Church, and one in the Friends' Meeting House. During their stay the missioners took a Sunday evening service at each of the churches, the Baptist Church on Sunday last being crowded, the large congregation listening with breathless attention to Mrs. Alexander's powerful appeal from the words, "Thy sins are forgiven." At the farewell meeting there was a large attendance, and in the course of the gathering the missioners presented those who had signed the decision cards with a copy of one of the Gospels or an epistle. Mr. Alexander's earnest addresses, and Mrs. Alexander's effective and winsome appeals, exercised a strong influence over their listeners. The inquiry-rooms were quickly occupied at the close of the meetings, and many have been brought to decision. S.

Mr. George Attwood, of the Evangelization Society, has recently conducted a fruitful mission at the Baptist Tabernacle, High Barnet. Much spiritual profit has resulted, and hearty co-operation was evidenced. W. A. C.

A large number of theatrical women were present at Mr. William Forbes' meeting on Thursday last at Orange Street Chapel, Leicester Square. Addresses were given by Rev. A. Fleming, of Belgrave Presbyterian Church, and Mr. Brunning.

A most happy and helpful mission has been held at Consett by Mr. James Wharton. The workers held open-air meetings nightly in the main street, with the result that the meetings were well sustained. Quite a number professed conversion, several backsliders were restored, and in services held for the Sunday school several were led to decision.

Mr. Samuel Mendelsohn, late of Jerusalem, has held an eight days' mission to Jews in Zion Chapel, Whitechapel, E.—April 22 to 29. Several ministers and laymen co-operated with him.

Mr. W. R. Bradlaugh has concluded an eight-days' mission, fraught with encouragement, at Swinton, Yorks. He spoke earnest words against various forms of error, and his Gospel addresses were telling. The largest place of worship in the town was crowded when, on the closing Lord's Day evening, Mr. Bradlaugh told the story of his conversion. J. H.

A correspondent writes: "Blessing is attending the mission at Trinity Church, Effra Road, Brixton, S.W., conducted by Mr. Leonard Weaver. Sunday night last was a time long to be remembered; the church was packed, and the inquiry rooms filled to overflowing with men and women seeking Christ."

Rev. F. B. Meyer addressed two meetings at the New Town Hall, Pontypridd, on Tuesday, April 22. The meetings were promoted by the local Christian Endeavour Union and Young Women's and Young Men's Christian Associations. At the evening meeting the hall, which seats some 1,500 people, was filled. Much good must result. An open-air meeting was announced, but the heavy showers drove the people into the porch of a chapel, where a very interesting meeting was held.

A gracious revival has been experienced in the mining town of Broxburn, Linlithgowshire. A mission conducted by Mr. Samuel Mackenzie has aroused much attention. Blessing has been received by Christians, and the unconverted have been awakened to a realization of their lost condition. The apparently respectable have entered the kingdom along with those who had been openly profane. A remarkable feature was the number of young men and women who decided for Christ while the evangelist was delivering his message.

Mr. Bob Johnson writes of a visit to Epsom Downs, his spiritual birthplace, during the recent race meeting:—"On the course, especially around the royal enclosure, where thousands were waiting to welcome the King, I distributed Gospel literature, which, with the word that accompanied it, was respectfully received. Many old acquaintances asked me to explain to them the meaning of the large pearl letters on the black finger plate of my banjo—'John v. 24'—so that I found myself taking short services and discoursing on this illuminating verse."

Requests for Prayer.

For blessing on open-air work in the villages around Pembroke.

For a four days' mission to children, May 6-9, at Sermon Lane Mission, Islington, to be conducted by Mr. Dudley.

For missions to be held in Wales and England during May and June by Rev. J. Worthington Atkin, M.A., of Cork (missioner to the Daily Prayer Union).

Cage Lane Mission.—The twenty-second anniversary of Cage Lane Mission, Plumstead, was celebrated with much enthusiasm on Thursday. At the evening gathering Mr. John Wood, secretary of the Evangelization Society, presided, expressing his joy at knowing that the Mission owed no man anything. Among the speakers who gave encouraging addresses were Sir William Stirling, Mr. Lydall, Colonel Sage, and Rev. J. K. Quarterman. In the course of the annual report of the Mission, Mrs. Anderson records her gratitude to all who have laboured so devotedly to bear a faithful witness to the Cross. The numerous branches of the Mission have been maintained with much self-denying exertion on the part of the workers. Not the least encouraging sections are the Sunday-school and Band of Hope, both of which have yielded cheering fruit. Mrs. Anderson's address is 1, Thames View Terrace, Plumstead.

About Books.

REV. F. B. MEYER'S "JEREMIAH."

On the personal life of Jeremiah more light is shed in Scripture than is the case with any of the other prophets of the Old Testament; and consequently it has lent itself more readily to inclusion in Rev. F. B. Meyer's excellent Scripture Biographies. In the new volume—Jeremiah, Priest and Prophet (2s. 6d. Morgan & Scott)—of the attractive reissue of this series, it is justly pointed out that "for some reason there is a great amount of ignorance of the life and times of Jeremiah which contrasts remarkably with the veneration with which the Jews have always regarded him." The career of this reproving, weeping, and suffering prophet is graphically and interestingly traced from his call to service while yet "a child," through the terrible experiences which would make it appear that, so far as his outward lot was concerned, his life was one of such unrelieved sadness as fell to no other prophet.

We have in this volume a most useful handbook to the study of the history of this period of Jewish history, and a lucid adviser and guide to the understanding of the two books bearing the prophet's name; but above all it is eminently what it professes to be, a biography. The character of this born leader of men is skilfully analysed. We see how this timid and shrinking youth, conscious of his helplessness, yearning for a sympathy and love he was never to know, was yet, because he possessed the circumcised ear and the loyal obedient heart, chosen as the instrument through which the Word of the Lord should come to that corrupt and degenerate age. Then we are shown how this tender, timid, and sensitive man proved himself to be the most suitable to stand alone against princes, priests, and people, because he was filled with the Spirit of the Lord.

The lesson taught to the prophet by the potter's wheel is brought home with power to our everyday circumstances and needs. The Rechabites appear as the rugged old-fashioned Puritans that they were. The fearless denunciation of Hananiah and the other popular false prophets stands out even among heroic records, and many another lesson is shown to be meant not for one age but for all time.

Two pleasant and readable "popular stories" are Hope Deferred (2s. 6d.), by E. J. Mead, and Dorothy's Novelist. (2s. A. H. Stockwell.)

The sermons brought together by Rev. B. A. Millard (Walsall), under the title Optimism and the Vision of God (2s. 6d. net. A. H. Stockwell), are such as are building up strong earnest Christian character in our Nonconformist congregations.

The sketch of the life of the late Mr. T. Sidney Cooper, R.A., published in our issue of April 3, under the title Memories of a Great Artist has been republished in neat booklet form (6d. per dozen; 3s. 6d. per 100. Morgan & Scott). The author is Pastor Frank H. White, who received much of his information from the widow of the distinguished artist.

The Century Bible has been enriched by an excellent volume on 1 and 2 Corinthians, by J. Massie, M.A., D.D., Yates Professor of New Testament Exegesis in Mansfield College, Oxford. It would be difficult to conceive a more useful treatment for students; while scholars will find the results of wide reading and independent thought made accessible for reference in a neat little book. The general editor of the series, W. F. Adeney, M.A., D.D., Professor of New Testament Exegesis, New College, London, has edited the tenth volume—Thessalonians and Galatians. On some points the opinions expressed will excite criticism; but the work is thoughtful and compendious. As is well known, the series gives the A.V. and the R.V., edited with introduction and copious notes. (2s. each volume. T. C. & E. C. Jack.)

Bishop Lightfoot's famous essay on The Christian Ministry has been brought out in a handy volume by Macmillan & Co. (3s. net.) Originally appearing in Dr. Lightfoot's Commentary on the Epistle to the Philippians, and being included afterwards in a volume of "Dissertations on the Apostolic Age," this is a work of great and wide interest, and deservedly held in high esteem among evangelical theologians. In response to frequent applications, the trustees of the Lightfoot Fund decided to issue the essay in this form, just as it was left by the Bishop. They have included three appendixes, short but very valuable: (a) Extracts explanatory of the essay, selected for this purpose by the Bishop himself; (b) a note on the subject from his preface to the Didaché; and (c) a passage explaining the Bishop's change of opinion regarding the much-discussed Ignatian question.

Notes & Comments

The May Meetings. In this issue we give reports of many of the May Meetings, which are now engaging the hearts and minds of large numbers of Christian people in London. We are obliged to hold over accounts of several gatherings. Next week we hope to give extra pages, and place before our readers reports of other meetings.

The Keswick Convention. On page 14 will be found the invitation issued by the Keswick Trustees to the forthcoming Convention. It is a cheering fact that each year affords increasing evidence that those who have received blessing themselves are anxious to extend the means for others to attend the Convention. In regard to foreign missionaries, Mr. Albert Head (Corrie Lodge, Wimbledon) is the almoner of funds given for this purpose, to whom donations and applications should alike be addressed. Similarly, on behalf of clergymen and other home workers, Mr. J. T. Budd (23, Pembroke Crescent, Hove, Brighton) writes :—

> Few things touched me more, just preceding last year's Convention, than the kind thought of some friends—strangers to myself—who expressed a wish to assist clergy and ministers to get to Keswick, or to send substitutes there! The sums sent to defray their expenses were given in the most unostentatious manner, and must have been pleasing to Him who still watches all gifts cast into the treasury. Already I have more applications for hospitality than last year's entire total! I shall be very glad if I may again have the privilege of arranging for hospitality for some clergy and ministers in the homes of friends now forming parties. If I am to be a channel, however, it must, I fear, be within the next fortnight, as subsequently I shall be engaged with duties I can neither postpone nor delegate.

The Queen's Hall Coronation Services. The other duties to which Mr. Budd refers are in connection with the meetings for thanksgiving and prayer, of which announcements have already appeared. He writes further to "emphasize the necessity of very early application for reserved tickets, owing to limited accommodation of the hall, and the enormous number of friends expected in London during the Coronation week."

"A Whole-Souled Missionary." In the literature of foreign missions, a high place must be accorded to James Chalmers: His Autobiography and Letters. (7s. 6d. net. Religious Tract Society.) A man of noble purpose and consecrated energy, "Tamate" exemplified his own phrase, "a whole-souled missionary." Whether labouring among the drunkards of Rarotonga, or the cannibals of New Guinea, he was an inspiring character, and his friend, Rev. Richard Lovett, M.A., has presented the available records, with the recollections of friends and acquaintances, in a deeply interesting manner. There is no doubt that we have here the real James Chalmers, and no fancy picture; and upon a story so honest and true we may invoke the blessing of the God whom the devoted missionary served in difficult fields for over thirty years.

An Unanswerable Argument. We could wish that every intelligent person in the kingdom might read the very striking apology for the Gospel which Principal Fairbairn delivered on Wednesday last before the Baptist Missionary Society. Dr. Fairbairn's visit to India, and his study at first hand of Eastern religions, have produced within his mind a clearer line of demarcation than ever between these religions and the message of the Gospel—and the extraordinary supremacy of the latter was wonderfully demonstrated. This line of defence is necessary at a time when so many talk glibly of comparative religions, without having really studied them. The lazy habit indulged in, we are sorry to say, by too many professing Christians, of repeating catch phrases about "the beauty of Oriental religions," is responsible for much indifference towards missionary effort. Dr. Fairbairn's conclusion is unanswerable—if Jesus is not God, and the Gospel is not the only means of real redemption for men, then the history of two millenniums is not only meaningless, it is a gigantic contradiction and a lie.

Chinese and the Gospel. It is gratifying to learn that there is a real change of attitude among the Chinese towards foreigners since the war, and that one of the reasons for this is to be found in the good conduct and self-restraint, on the whole, of the foreign troops during the occupation of North China. War is at the best a horrible thing, but its methods have been greatly humanised among Western (i.e., Christian) peoples; and it is well that its less cruel side was shown in the recent struggles, for the sake of the future of civilisation, and especially of Christianity in the country. The Boxer movement, designed to crush the new faith through the martyrdom of its adherents and the expulsion of its teachers, has resulted, in God's providence, in opening a still more effectual door to the preacher and the missionary. There are great qualities in the Chinaman, and when these are won for Christ, and transformed by the Gospel, there is a noble prospect before that vast people.

An Evil Alliance. The Opium question, unhappily, appears to have dropped out of sight lately. Speaking recently at Bristol, Sir Matthew Dodsworth referred to the State recognition of the manufacture of opium in India as a distinct danger to England and to the English character. The effect upon the Indian Administration of the receipt of revenue from such a source, is just as deadening and demoralizing as that of the drink revenue upon the Home Government. In each case it is not merely a moral blunder, but a persistent adherence to an immoral and injurious method. In this matter of opium Japan takes a higher platform than Christian England, just as other countries set us examples of drastic dealing with the drink curse.

Unbusinesslike Ministers. The Baptist President's insistence in his address on the importance of business habits in the minister, received a feeling endorsement from his audience. There is a point in which some of the best ministers fail conspicuously. At a recent "county union" meeting strong remarks were made about the difficulty of extracting replies from popular preachers when asked to do a service for country churches. Doubtless correspondence is one of the minister's chief trials; but that is no reason for shirking it. Punctuality, method, and order are as invaluable in the work of the Kingdom of Heaven as in carrying on State or business affairs on earth. Much harm is done, and disappointment created, by the ministers who fail to consider their engagements sacred.

Young Men and the Ministry. The earnest words uttered by Rev. J. R. Wood, appealing to young men of good social standing, of undoubted ability, and possessing flattering worldly prospects, to give themselves to the ministry of the Word of God, come at a timely moment. The bishops have for long been making a similar appeal, in view of the diminishing number of candidates for the ministry. There seems a great disinclination on the part of many young fellows of the class named to devote their entire lives to the work of the Gospel in direct service, the reason often being frankly given that "the ministry offers no career to a man." Of course, if a man regards the ministry as a "profession," it is much better for himself and everybody else if he keeps out of it, whether it offers a career or not. But if a man has a vocation for it, and he refuses the Divine call in favour of worldly advantage, it is a very serious thing indeed—for him. And it is to be feared that many men have spoiled their whole lives through disobedience to the call for service. Surely our Lord is worthy of the best that family or culture can offer to Him!

Tests of the True Ministry. Many explanations are given of the steadily decreasing numbers of candidates for Holy Orders, and for the ever-lessening proportion of schoolmasters who take them. Besides "poor worldly prospects," the hard work involved, general unsettlement in matters of faith among young men nowadays, &c., are familiar pleas. Rev. John Gamble, writing on "The Standard of Orthodoxy in the Anglican Church," finds a deeper cause in another direction. He affirms that a large number of men shrink from the test which is now put on the Christian teacher in the direction of experience. He quotes the late Bishop Creighton, who said in one of his sermons :—

> The help that the Christian can give to his fellows can never go further than the call: "Come and see what the Lord has done for my soul."

In increasing measure, the old standards of authority, the appeals to Scripture, or to the collective experience of the Church, are not accepted as valid by hearers; they demand that the preacher should proclaim no doctrine, and make no appeal which has not been verified by experience in his own life. All the greater need, therefore, that the preacher should "examine himself."

Experience and Trust as Elements in Preaching. Admirable as the demand for an experimental religion is in all those who undertake to evangelize and edify their fellow men, the test must be carefully applied. It is, of course, impossible to remit it in its essentials. A preacher must be a converted and redeemed man; else how can he preach conversion and redemption to others? But is a man to wait till he has put all Divine truth to the test in his own life ere he can speak of it to others? In that case this life is too short, and spiritual growth is too slow a process to qualify any man to be a true minister of Jesus Christ. Even the preacher's experience is limited and cumulative. And yet he is called on to preach a "full Gospel" from the first, and his right method is to preach the essentials that he has tested and found true as the immovable basis of his appeal, while proclaiming the entire counsel of God as set forth in the Holy Scriptures, and verified in the experience of the great company of the faithful in all generations.

First the Individual. The re-issue of a volume of the late President Finney's Gospel sermons has called forth some adverse criticism on the part of certain "Broad Churchmen," to whom the truths of the Sovereignty and Government of God are, in their own phrase, "antiquated" by comparison with the modern emphasizing of the Divine Fatherhood. The truth also of the soul's personal refuge in Christ is regarded as "antiquated" as compared with the notion of a "renewed society." This kind of teaching is very common, but it is very fallacious, because it is entirely one-sided. Why not tell the whole truth, and say that the redemption of our Lord applies first to the individual, dealing with him as such, putting away his sin, and granting to him the gift of salvation; and that the "renewed society" can only come as the individuals composing it are renewed? Men are renewed singly, and the congregation of the renewed becomes the new society. Formerly possibly, preachers were occupied too exclusively with the individual; to-day many are going to an opposite extreme. The whole truth is a blend of these two things, and should be proclaimed as such.

Waiting a Call. There is a hint to would-be evangelists in Rev. Dr. Parker's remark that "there is absolutely no limit to the accommodation which the open air affords. It lies within any man's power to stand upon a stone and tell what he knows of the Kingdom of God." Dr. Parker speaks on this subject with the authority of experience, as he commenced his long service as a preacher at the age of eighteen "in the open air at a blacksmith's door from chairs borrowed from neighbours' houses." When the simple Gospel is declared, there always will be listeners.

The Heat of Controversy. In the Education controversy it is of the utmost importance that illogical ex parte arguments should be avoided on both sides. Misrepresentations of an opponent lead to recrimination and rejoinder. Charges of "sectarian jealousy," "bigotry," "hysteria," and such-like epithets, do not advance an argument; they only tend to embitter a dispute, and lower the tone of a great discussion. There is no region in which injustice and extravagance are more to be deplored than in the discussion of religious questions and differences. There has on both sides been a great deal of hard hitting already, and the conflict threatens to become more and more heated, day by day. There is an increasing call for self-restraint and charity of judgment. The leaders of opinion should set this example to their followers.

Mountains and Molehills. Results certainly do not seem to testify to the practical value of Royal Commissions. In only too many instances a pigeon-holed blue-book is all that can be pointed to, after months of sittings and considerable expenditure of public money. Unhappily it is to be feared that the Betting Committee will afford another illustration of this system of shelving legislation, for it has leaked out that the members have agreed not to recommend the registration of bookmakers, or any interference with racecourse betting. Street betting, doubtless, will be made the scapegoat, a trivial result in face of the great evils which, it was hoped, the Commission would boldly deal with. Like other disorders, betting is eating its way into the life of the nation; and, meanwhile, Parliament can spend all-night sittings in the consideration of finicking points of procedure.

The Father of the Man. Canon Fleming has urged that "God's best gift to the nation is the children." From statements recently made by Mr. Asquith at a meeting of the "State Children's Association," it appears that there are no fewer than 50,000 little ones in England "who through the misfortune or misconduct of their parents are practically orphans and without the restraints or stimulus of home life." For these the State has to make itself responsible, and the question of their training is one of vital moment to the country. Starting life so "fatally handicapped," it cannot be wondered at that numbers of them degenerate physically and morally, and become paupers or criminals. Unhappily the battle still wages around them between the conflicting plans of barrack schools, village communities, and scattered homes. The evidence, however, is strongly in favour of the last-named plan, a child under that costing only £18 per annum as compared with £33 under the second, or £29 under the first plan, and the results being infinitely superior. Yet it is stated that the guardians of one London district are about to expend £120,000 in providing for 600 children under the first-named and decidedly objectionable system of barrack schools.

"Who is My Neighbour?" "What do we know of the myriads around us? What do we know of the sickness and death in the houses near at hand; of the children whose lives are fading away for lack of loving care, of fresh air, of space to breathe in—for want, it may be (and often is) of a proper quantity of nourishing food? What do we know of the 67,000 occupants of workhouses, lunatic asylums, hospitals, prisons, and reformatories? What do we know of the causes which brought them there? What do we understand of the tragic struggle which many of them maintained so long against disease, against poverty, and against temptation? What do we know of the occupants of the 149,524 one-room tenements; what chance have they? What prospects have the children, born as they are to such foulness and misery? Thomas Ashe touches the heart of the matter in one of his 'London Lyrics':—

> Life scarce can tread majestically
> Foul court and fever-stricken alley."

With such pregnant words does the St. Giles' Christian Mission address its summer appeal to its friends, to which they will do well that take heed—and that quickly.

Sowing Iniquity. In a lecture dealing with the economic aspect of the temperance question, Mr. Thomas Whittaker, M.P., has estimated the amount of money spent upon intoxicating drink in England during the year ended March, as 189 millions, or an average of £4 11s. 2d. for each man, woman, and child of the entire population. As, however, there is a huge army of abstainers, and a still larger one of temperate people, there is good ground for the opinion that a great number of working-class families spend an average of over £17 every year in drink. Yet, in face of such facts, we have fiscal legislation, intended to press lightly upon the brewer and the distiller, and their accomplice, the publican, while the burden is made heavier for those who already have to maintain the gaols, and asylums, and workhouses, which the drink traffic necessitates.

Evening Communion. In face of the recent action of the Bishop of Durham in taking part in an evening communion at a Kensington church, and of the fact that several of the bishops are in favour of the Lord's Supper taking place after evening service, it is noteworthy that the Bishop of Chichester should recently have stated:—

> I cannot sanction evening communions, believing them to be quite as much a breach of Church order as the ceremonial use of incense.

This view has been questioned by the Rector of St. Leonards, who has asked the Bishop to permit him to be the defendant in a case which could be discussed before any tribunal that has condemned the ceremonial use of incense. The result of this application will be awaited with interest. Meanwhile, the evening communion, free from the music and ritual which now mark the morning administration at so many churches, will continue to be regarded as one of the most solemn of the believer's privileges.

A Salutary Lesson. The recent French elections have brought to light one incident which offers a salutary warning to all who try to exploit the public in their own selfish interests. One astute candidate, who has probably done more than any other man in France to stir up strife, and preach hatred against the Jews and the English, has, happily, been "hoist with his own petard." In order to ensure his return, his friends purchased electors' cards, and so disfranchised a great number of voters. The Government, aware of this, suddenly dissolved the municipal council, and cancelled all the electors' cards, new ones being issued; with the consequence that the candidate has not been returned. No friend of France or of England will be sorry that this fanatic is excluded from the New Chamber, and all who love purity of public life will be grateful for the object lesson given by the Government. The hope of France, as of every country, lies in having honest, peaceable, and God-fearing men at the head of affairs. Wire-pullers cannot be tolerated at all.

SALVATION AND CHARACTER.—I.

WE heard recently of a Christian parent who, in lamenting the inadequacy of certain pulpit teaching, made the curious remark: "I want my children saved; I don't care about their characters!"

It is not likely that the thought thus crudely expressed conveys fully what was in the speaker's mind. Probably it was that children—and adults—must accept Christ as Saviour, before they can worthily serve Him as Lord; they must become subjects of the Kingdom ere they can obey its laws. Regarded thus relatively, the sentiment is a true one; treated literally, it would reveal a sadly cramped conception of the Divine plan.

It is gloriously true that "The Good Shepherd giveth his life for the sheep." But it is no less true that "He putteth forth his own sheep" to face the world, and "goeth before them." "The Lord is my Shepherd. . . He leadeth me." Christ as the one and only Saviour, needed by all, must ever be the predominant note of all our faith; but we must not neglect also to "follow his steps." Ethical teaching cannot save our children; but we should, nevertheless, impress its beauty upon their hearts and minds. "Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit" (John xv. 8).

But someone may ask:—"Are we to refrain from, what we may call, moral teaching, until after those under our care are converted to God?" By no means, though the claims of Christ to the heart's allegiance must ever stand first—"This is His commandment, that we should believe on the name of His Son, Jesus Christ" (1 John iii. 23); and we must urge that good deeds cannot be fully acceptable to Him until his command has been obeyed.

A father may bid his son to do a certain thing; the lad may neglect this duty, and, in its place, may warm his father's slippers, or perform other thoughtful acts; and yet these cannot win the appreciation they would otherwise deserve. "To obey is better than sacrifice" (1 Sam. xv. 22), and "They that are in the flesh cannot please God" (Rom. viii. 8). This must be made unmistakably clear.

But on the other hand, the mind may be made the servant of the heart. "The beauty of holiness" should be so portrayed as to inspire a wish for its attainment; so that the child may become "willing to do His will." Moral teaching should ever keep this object in view, and it is of little worth if it does not lead up to such a desire.

LAYING FOUNDATIONS.

The child must be taught the virtues of truth, uprightness, perseverance—and the evils of all wrong-doing and evil-speaking—from his earliest infancy, so that his youthful imagination may be kindled with high ambitions and ideals; then, when he does yield himself to Christ, the foundation of character already laid will be a priceless aid to the growth and development of a truly Christian life. In this sense, ethical teaching is like building material placed ready for use, even before the structure is ripe for erection. Home training should be constructive, as well as instructive.

We believe that the neglect of this explains the disappointment and grief that some godly parents experience. We know families whose junior members are so frequently "cornered" by well-meaning visitors and friends, to urge their decision for Christ, that they dread the sound of the front-door bell, and a strong distaste for "religion" results. This is due, perhaps, to the means employed, rather than to the principles involved. It is like making bricks without straw, unless the beauty and attractiveness of a Christian life are reasonably and sympathetically set forth. Abstract truth requires concrete illustration, alike in the conduct of parent and friend.

The truth that "Virtue is its own reward" needs to be urged. The charm of goodness for its own sake, and the fact that wrongdoing causes distrust and dislike, will often appeal to young minds, when other arguments beat the air in vain.

Then again, "Thou shalt not!" is too often the burden of parental training, until the child-heart grows weary of continual prohibition. We know instances of children, now grown to man's estate, who declare that, as they review the past, they see no reason why their youth should have been spent so ill; they were not "bad from choice," but frequent scoldings "raised the devil in them;" and (they affirm) had they been more intelligently treated, and been shown the intrinsic beauty of being good, the better side of their character would have responded; and they would have gladdened their parents' hearts, instead of being a constant source of anxiety to others, and misery to themselves.

CHILDHOOD'S GRIEVANCES.

Think of the petty injustices that sometimes children have to bear—little martyrs to the superior strength of those to whom, perforce, they have to yield. How many parents, scanning the years of their own childhood, can recall occasions when they were misjudged, misunderstood, or, perhaps, wrongfully punished! One day they were blamed for some thoughtless act, and told they "ought to think"! On the morrow, having (with the best intention) done something which they thought was right, but which turned out wrong, they were scolded again, and told they "had no business to think"! Ah, the scars left on childhood's memory, that years cannot remove! Put a twist in the sapling, and it shows in the tree. Make a dent in the child-nature, and it remains there for life.

These are pressing questions. Every parent, teacher, child, has his own individuality to face. The human heart, no doubt, is ever ready with plausible excuse, and the tendency to blame others is present with us all. Yet it is well to study even a child's point of view, if by any means we may guide their feet to Christ.

Finally, should these lines be read by any young people who have grieved under a sense of injustice—real or supposed—in their home treatment, let them make allowance for the daily anxieties which, perhaps, their parents have been passing through; and remember that even injudicious correction emanates from a fond heart, and a care for their eternal welfare; and, above all, that the true refuge from every storm is found in the tender mercy and redeeming love of Christ, who embraced the young, and "died, the Just for the unjust, that He might bring us to God." Every young man and woman should read DREAMS AND REALITIES. Fourteen Practical Papers on important subjects of daily concern. Helpful and useful also to Christian workers in any sphere. (Cloth, 1s. Morgan & Scott. Or any bookseller.)

Among literature likely to be useful to workers engaged in the National Mission to Sunday Schools and otherwise among young people, we invite attention to THE CHURCH AND THE CHILDREN (2d. Morgan and Scott), in which have been reprinted a series of articles from our columns. The contributors include Rev. E. Griffith-Jones (Balham), Rev. Alexander Smellie (Carluke), Rev. James Mursell (Clapton), Rev. W. H. Griffith-Thomas (St. Paul's, Portman Square), Rev. Thomas Champness (Rochdale), Mr. Newton Jones (S.S. Union Evangelist), Mr. W. Monro Collings (Gosport), and Rev. Albert Swift (Dulwich). In a hearty preface, Canon Christopher (Oxford) advises all teachers to lay to heart and habitually act on the very helpful practical teaching given.

To Whom Does It Apply?

AT your missionary meetings in the homelands, especially when there are a number of men and women on the platform returning, or going for the first time, to the field, it is difficult for many to realize how very much need there is, even now, to pray the Lord of the harvest that He would send out more labourers.

If friends would withdraw their minds from the few missionaries before them, and try and take in the vast needs to be met, earnest prayer for labourers would most certainly be the result. Indeed, it might result in much earnest heart-searching, to discern whether the Lord may not still be waiting to hear the response: "Here am I, send me"—of some heart, to whom He has long been speaking.

Let Christians grasp, and ponder over, a fact like this:—Twenty-four years ago, a missionary journey was taken in the Province of Yunnan, from the capital to Ta-li Fu. It consisted of thirteen stages, and each day cities, towns, villages, and hamlets were passed, with their thousands of inhabitants. Off the main road, too, these thousands might have been multiplied by hundreds, and even thousands. In no part of this wide district could he have found any Protestant missionary. A few weeks since the same missionary has been permitted to travel the same road. In twenty-four years, work has been opened in the capital, and also in Ta-li Fu; but all along the thirteen stages the cities, towns, villages, and hamlets are still entirely without workers—no permanent witness residing in any of them, and the people are left as far from God and Christ and hope as when, twenty-four years ago, the missionary passed that way before.

Will the Lord's people wonder, then, if we say that we must remind them again and again, and yet again if needful, that they and we may continue, more earnestly than we may have been doing, to pray the Lord of the harvest that he would send out labourers to these still needy fields?

PHYSICAL AND SPIRITUAL NEED.

Through all this journey there was abundant evidence, too, of the physical distress in which so many of the people drag out a miserable existence. A good deal of it is the result of opium-smoking and other vicious practices, depriving them of proper nourishment—much of it from their insanitary surroundings—and a large percentage also suffering from goitre and other kindred diseases. Altogether, a wide field for the invaluable help which a wise, Christian medical man, fully qualified and with experience for such work, could so easily give, and which would prove in such hands a most Christ-like service.

One could not but wonder if consecration, in many cases, might not mean that many such Christian physicians—who are ready for their work, or who have a profitable practice to give up; who have bright prospects, and a career of usefulness before them at home—should leave all, and, following the Saviour—rather, going with the Saviour—minister, as He did, among those who need the service most. Before now we have had a Harold Schofield in China. Looking at things from the borderland of another world on his death-bed, our brother praised the Lord for permitting him to labour in China. Is he the only physician of well-known eminence called to go with the Master to care for the souls and bodies of men and women in this needy land? Why should young and immature men be so frequently urged to go and fill the most difficult posts?

Brother, if consecration spells for you the giving up of a lucrative practice, it will also mean for you such fellowship with the Lord as you have never had in the past—a knowledge of the grace that is in Christ Jesus, such as worlds could not purchase, but which He reveals by his Spirit to those who follow Him where He leads.

Samuel and Saul.

A Remarkable Colloquy.

(1 Sam. xv. 12-35.)

By Rev. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

AN intimation of Saul's lapsed obedience was made in the secret ear of Samuel in the dead of night, when God came near to him and said, "It repenteth Me that I have set up Saul to be king, for he hath turned back from following Me, and hath not performed my commandments."

God requires literal obedience, and when that fails the results are as though He had changed his purpose or repented, but this is in appearance only. As a matter of fact, God cannot repent or change his purpose. Man may frustrate the working out of his plan, but He will achieve it by some other method.

Happy are they whom God can trust with his confidence, appealing to them to watch with Him. "Shall I hide from Abraham the thing that I do?"

The faithful soul of Samuel was deeply moved. Those who are true to God cannot but feel indignant when his purposes are frustrated, his grace outraged; when the door of usefulness which He had set wide in front of a chosen servant is shut and barred by some act of careless or wilful disobedience. "He cried unto the Lord all night." Ah, how much we owe to the Divine Friend, and to human friends, who when they see deterioration at work within us, take no rest, and give God no rest. How many a son, now leading a reckless and profligate life, in his still hours, or when his evil courses have cast him on a bed of sickness, and debarred him from the active pursuits of life, comforts himself with the thought that, in some lone cottage, his mother does not cease to pray for him; and he secretly hopes that her prayers may avail against the vehemence of the fiery passions by which his soul is driven.

Samuel travelled some fifteen miles to find Saul, following him from Carmel to Gilgal, where this remarkable colloquy took place.

Saul.—It was commenced by the King, who, seeing the Prophet coming towards him, advanced to meet him with an unctuous phrase upon his lips, "Blessed be thou of the Lord," and, with great complacency in his demeanour, added, "I have performed the commandment of the Lord." Whether Saul was blinded and did not really know how far he had deteriorated, or whether he desired to palliate his failure, and to appear as a truly obedient son, so as to deceive the prophet, we cannot tell; but that "Blessed be thou of the Lord," from his lips, and at such a moment, has an ugly sound. It reminds one of certain persons who interlard their business talk with references to religion, so that they may put the unwary off their guard, and enable their user to take a mean advantage, under the appearance of a high code of morals. It is the sin of Judas who betrayed his Master with a kiss.

Samuel.—At that moment the sheep began to bleat, and the oxen to low. It is an unfortunate occurrence when, just as a man is becoming loud in his protestations of goodness, some such untoward incident suddenly takes place, and the lowing of the oxen and the bleating of the sheep belie his words. I lay down general principles, and leave my hearers to apply them for themselves. With sad irony the Prophet said, "What meaneth this bleating of sheep in mine ears, and the lowing of oxen which I hear?"

Saul.—The King excused himself by bringing in a third party—"They have brought them from the Amalekites; for the people spared the best of the sheep and of the oxen, to sacrifice unto the Lord thy God." Notice the subtle effort to conciliate the prophet by the emphasis laid upon the word thy—"thy God; and the rest we have utterly destroyed." It was unroyal and contemptible to lay the blame upon the people, and it was an excuse which could not be allowed.

Samuel.—The royal backslider would probably have gone on speaking, but Samuel interrupted him, saying, "Stay, and I will tell thee what the Lord hath said to me this night." Then the faithful old Prophet went back to the past. He reminded Saul how insignificant had been his origin, and how he had shrunk from undertaking the great responsibility of the station to which God had summoned him. He reminded him how he had been raised up to the throne, and how the Almighty King of Israel had delegated to him his authority, requiring that he should act as his designated vicegerent. He reminded him also that a distinct charge had been given him, and that the responsibility of determining his line of action had been transferred from himself, as the agent, to the Divine Being who had issued his mandate of destruction. In spite of all, Saul had allowed his greed to hurry him into an act of disobedience. He had flown upon the spoil as a hungry lion upon his prey, and had done evil in the sight of the Lord.

A COWARDLY EXCUSE.

Saul.—The King reiterated his poor excuse: "Yea, I have obeyed the voice of the Lord, and have gone the way that the Lord sent me, and have brought Agag the king of Amalek, and have utterly destroyed the Amalekites. But the people took of the spoil, sheep and oxen, the chief of the devoted things, to sacrifice unto the Lord thy God in Gilgal." It was as though he had said, "You have judged me wrongfully. If you would wait for a little while, you would see the issue of my act of apparent disobedience." He may even have cajoled himself into thinking that he meant to sacrifice these spoils now that he had reached Gilgal; or he might have mentally resolved there and then that he would sacrifice them, and so relieve himself of the complicated position into which he found himself drifting.

Samuel.—In answer to this last remark, God's messenger uttered one of the greatest sentences in the earlier books of the Bible, a sentence which is the seed-germ of much to the same purpose in the Prophets, which was repeated in different forms, and to which our blessed Lord gave his assent—"Hath the Lord as great delight in burnt-offerings and sacrifices, as in obeying the voice of the Lord? Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams." Whatever Saul might be leading him to infer, as to his intention to offer the sacrifice, there could be no doubt that up to that moment, at least, he had disobeyed God's positive command; and, in point of fact, the whole attitude of his soul was towards disobedience and rebellion, the assertion of his own will and way against God's.

A FEARLESS REBUKE.

Then, tearing the veil aside, the old man showed the enormity of the sin which had been committed, by saying: "Rebellion is equally vile as the sin of witchcraft, and stubbornness is as idolatry and the teraphim." These sins were universally reprobated and held up to the contempt of good men, but in God's sight there was nothing to choose between them and the sin of which the King had been guilty. Then, facing the monarch, and looking at him with his searching eyes, the Prophet, in the majesty of his authority as God's representative, pronounced the final sentence of deposition, saying, "Because thou hast rejected the word of the Lord, He hath also rejected thee from being King."

Saul.—In a moment the King realized the brink of the precipice on which he stood; and not as a penitent, but as a fugitive from justice; not hating his sin, but dreading its result; eager at any cost to keep the crown on his brow and the empire in his hand; afraid of the consequences which might ensue if his leading men detected any break between himself and the Prophet—he cringed before Samuel, saying, "I have sinned." There is a great difference in the accent with which men utter those words. The prodigal said them with a faltering voice, not because he feared the consequences of sin, but that he saw its heinousness in the expression of his father's face, and the tears that stood in the beloved eyes. Saul, however, feared the consequences rather than the sin, and that he might avert the sentence he said, as though Samuel had the power of the keys to open and unloose, to pardon or to refuse forgiveness, "Pardon my sin."

Samuel.—The Prophet saw through the subterfuge. He knew that the King was deceiving him with his words, and he turned about to go away. Then Saul, in the extremity of his anguish, in fear that in losing him he might lose at once his best friend and the respect of the nation, seems to have sprung forward and seized the collar of Samuel's cloak, and as he did so with a strong masterful grasp, as if to restrain and draw back to himself the retreating figure of the Prophet, it rent. When Samuel felt and heard the tear, he said, "The Lord hath rent the kingdom of Israel from thee this day, and hath given it to a neighbour of thine, that is better than thou." And then, referring to Saul's effort to turn him back, as though he would reverse the sentence which he had pronounced, he said, "Remember that the Strength of Israel will not lie nor repent; his sentence is irrevocable. The word is gone out of his lips and cannot be called back. There is no opportunity of changing his mind, though thou shalt seek it bitterly and with tears."

THE KING'S FATAL ERROR.

Even at that moment, had Saul thrown himself at God's feet and asked for pardon, he would have been accepted and forgiven. Even though his kingdom might have passed from him, as a man he would have received pardon. But there are moments in our lives, irrevocable moments, when we take steps that cannot be retraced, when we assume positions from which we cannot retreat, when results are settled never to be reversed.

Saul.—Again the King repeated the sentence—"I have sinned," but his real meaning was disclosed in the following words: "Yet honour me now before the elders of my people, and before Israel, and turn again with me, that I may worship Jehovah thy God." His inner thought was still to stand well with the people, and he was prepared to make any confession of wrong-doing as a price of Samuel's apparent friendship.

Finally, Samuel stayed with him, that the elders might not become disaffected, and that the people generally might have no idea of the deposition of the King, lest the kingdom itself might totter to its fall before his successor was prepared to take his place. He stayed therefore. The two knelt side by side before God, but what a contrast! Here was darkest night; there, the brightness of the day. Here was the rejected; there, the chosen faithful servant.

At last, the old man summoned Agag, the King of the Amalekites, to his presence, and Agag came to him "cheerfully," hoping without doubt that he would be spared; and saying, as he advanced, "Surely the bitterness of death is past—there is no reason for me to fear it." Then Samuel, strengthened with some paroxysm of righteous indignation, seized a sword that lay within his reach, and hewed Agag in pieces before the Lord—emblem, this, of the holy zeal that will give no quarter to the flesh; and we are reminded of the words of the Apostle, "Make not provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof." To Amalek, we can give no quarter.

May God help us to read deeply into this tragic story. Whensoever God our Father puts a supreme test into our lives, let us at any cost obey Him. Everything hinges upon absolute obedience. If you cannot obey, you cannot command. If you do not obey, you are not fit to be an instrument in God's hand. Walk wisely, redeeming each opportunity, that God may make the most possible of you, and that, above all, you may not become a castaway.

"Our Daily Bread."

SUNDAY, May 11. Leviticus xvi.

THE ritual of the great Day of Atonement, as described in this chapter, was very significant. In almost every prescription we catch some new glimpse of Calvary, either by contrast or by similarity. There is, of course, an infinite contrast. Before Aaron could make an atonement for the people, he must needs make it for himself and his house (11). There was no such need in the case of our High Priest. He needed not, we are told, to offer up sacrifices first for his own sins (Heb. vii. 27).

But how many points there are of similarity. The cloud of incense which covered the mercy-seat, reminds us of the much merit of his obedience unto death (13). The sprinkled blood reminds us of the plea of his wounds, as He ever liveth to intercede (15). The necessity of making an atonement, even for the holy place, because of the uncleanesses of the people, reminds us that it is only as we are hourly cleansed by the blood, that we may walk in fellowship with God (16). His loneliness and the simplicity of his attire remind us that our Lord emptied Himself when He stooped to the death of the Cross, and trod the winepress alone—the winepress of his unknown sorrows (4, 17). The imposition of iniquities and transgressions on the head of the live goat, which bore them into a solitary land, reminds us that the Lamb of God has borne away the sin of the world (22). The burning of the sin-offerings without the camp, reminds us that He who was made sin suffered without the gate (27).

And yet we turn from it all so thankful that we have passed from the shadow into the substance. (Heb. ix. 24-28).

MONDAY, May 12. Leviticus xvii.

Very earnest insistence is laid on the prohibition of blood as an article of food, and so drastic was this prohibition, that the man who dared violate it was doomed to death; and presently the reason for this stringency is revealed in the repeated announcement that the life (or soul) is in the blood (11 and 14). It is noticeable that this statement has been abundantly verified of late years. We know that two sets of minute bodies, called corpuscles, float in the current of the blood; of which the red, like little barges, bear the oxygen from the heart to the extremities, where it unites with the waste tissues, and promotes animal heat; while the white, which are invisible to the eye, have a most important function in combating disease. They gather around the microbes that might spread poison through the entire system, and render them innocuous. It may even be established that the constitution of the blood has an important relation to the soul-life—the idiosyncrasy—of the individual.

What a striking light is cast by these thoughts on the great doctrine of the Atonement, the constant reference to the Blood of Christ. He poured this out unto death. His life stood for our life, his self for our selves, his sufferings instead of ours. He did what was necessary to meet the just claims of a broken law, and by his suffering unto death we are for ever emancipated, liberated, and blessed.

TUESDAY, May 13. Leviticus xviii.

What a mirror this chapter lifts before poor human nature, reflecting the awful possibilities that lie concealed in its depths like poisonous gases under the smooth surface of a stagnant pond. We are all capable of these sins, and they have been committed by those who once seemed as far removed from them as we are now. Let us never count ourselves secure. Let us watch and pray; and may the Lord keep us from making shipwreck of our souls.

The basis of prohibition is written clearly in our conscience and in the Divine Word. Let others do as they may, let our evil desires be as strong as possible, let Satan tempt us never so vehemently, there is one clear and inviolable law which must determine our behaviour: "My judgments shall ye do, and my statutes shall ye keep, to walk therein." Our King has issued his mandate, and loyal subjects have no alternative save to obey. If it be difficult for them to render obedience, they may claim grace to help them in their time of need.

Notice, however, that though these commands are given under the most solemn sanctions (such as the constant repetition of the majestic refrain, "I am Jehovah" 2, 4, 5, 6, 21, 30), they are not arbitrary. It is only by obedience to the laws of purity that men can enjoy the best life, or a nation continue to thrive (5, 27, 28). The excesses which are being practised in all our great cities, under the cover of night, are much more to be dreaded than the armies of hostile nations. The great nations of antiquity have rotted to their destruction when the purity of the home-life has been no longer respected.

WEDNESDAY, May 14. Leviticus xix.

The holy man is a whole-hearted man, and therefore it was necessary to teach him to apply the principles of the religious life to all the circumstances and incidents of daily living. It is most urgent that we should not live in water-tight compartments, but that our whole existence should be one, ruled by the one principle of love to God, and inspired by one spirit of life.

Because we love God, we must observe the courtesies and tendernesses of the home life, must turn from idols, must exercise a wide and large-hearted benevolence to the poor, must not commit even petty frauds, must not violate the law of strict truth-speaking in business transactions, must not ridicule bodily infirmities, nor circulate stories to the detriment of others. Instead of cherishing feelings of malice, or meditating revenge against those who have insulted or injured us, we are bidden to remonstrate with those who have done the injury, and endeavour by calm and kind reasonings to bring them to realize and acknowledge their faults. Our religious attitude must affect our treatment of our beasts, and the sowing of our fields.

We must not suppose, however, that any of these commandments, by which even Christians would do well to test themselves, are based on arbitrary caprice. There is a reason in them all. Take, for instance, the prohibition of garments of mingled wool and cotton. Science has proved that wool, when combined with linen, passes its electricity more quickly away from the skin. In hot climates the mixture is also said to exhaust the strength more readily, and even induce blisters. Again, every gardener knows that fruit-trees will thrive all the better if their blossoms are plucked off for the first three years of their growth. Even the dressing of the hair was dealt with in this searching code, because certain fashions savoured of the idolatrous customs of Egypt. Nothing, then, is to be counted as too trivial for consideration beneath the holy light of consecration to God.

THURSDAY, May 15. Leviticus xx.

Molech was the god of the Ammonites. His statue was of brass, his head adorned with a crown, and his arms were stretched out to welcome those who approached him. Children were dedicated to him by being passed through the flames. Such recognition of idolatry was to be visited by the death-penalty; and even when the nation itself was too implicated in similar crimes to execute the Divine sentence, God Himself would assume the office of executioner (4, 5). How many of the sudden deaths which cut off swearers, drinkers, and men of impure habit, may be due to the infliction, by unseen hands, of deserved penalties!

The death-sentence was to be also inflicted on those who practised witchcraft, dishonoured their parents, or committed adultery. Various penalties also were assigned to other unnatural sins, which must have been very rife amongst the Hebrews, or they would not have been so minutely and carefully specified. From all such crimes the people were to be separated, because of their relationship to the Holy God. All his loving arrangements on their behalf would be rendered null and void, apart from personal holiness.

What a tender sentence is that in which God explains that He had severed his people from other nations, that they might be his (26). It is as though the Divine heart yearns for some who may be peculiarly and specially set apart for Himself. Let us be very careful lest we who have been designated as his own possession invalidate his ideal by allowing ourselves to be contaminated by the corruption which is in the world through lust.

FRIDAY, May 16. Leviticus xxi.

The priestly office was carefully guarded from everything that would violate its purity or dignity. As contact with a corpse, or even with the place where it lay, would cause ceremonial defilement, debarring from the tabernacle, the whole priestly order was enjoined to abstain from all approaches to the dead, except in cases of supreme relationship. The priest's conjugal alliances must be of the purest and holiest nature; and any personal defect or infirmity was deemed sufficient to exclude from participation in priestly duty, though not from the allowance meted out equally to all the priestly order. Everything in the priest's life was subordinated to the thoughts that the anointing oil had been shed upon his head, and that he was called to handle "the bread of his God."

Every child of God is a priest. We are born priests, by right of the new birth; we are one with Him who is a Priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek. Nothing can ever alter or disturb this primal fact. The babe in Christ may not be able to eat of the wave breast and the heave shoulder, but is undeniably a priest. Notwithstanding this, however, as in the case of the sons of Aaron, so of ourselves, it is true that if we defile ourselves with the dead, or are dwarfish in stature, or are blemished, we shall not be permitted to go in unto the vail, or come nigh unto the altar. "To be the child of God is one thing; to be in the enjoyment of priestly communion and priestly worship is quite another." We are often deprived of the enjoyment of our high, holy privileges by moral defilement and spiritual defect. Salvation is one thing, but communion quite another. Yes, it is of supreme importance not to grieve the Holy Spirit of God, so as not to forfeit the full enjoyment of all the possibilities of position and privilege.

SATURDAY, May 17. Leviticus xxii.

1-9. What a multitude of restrictions, you say! Why so much care? Why must the priest be under such a rigorous supervision? Let us take great care to read these chapters prayerfully, that we may be reminded of the many spiritual sins, negligences, and ignorances which will hinder our usefulness, and our peace. There is constant need to resort to the laver, where we may wash and be clean (6).

10-16. The sacrifices were assigned for the use of the officiating priests and their families, but a temporary guest, or a hired servant, was not at liberty to eat of them. A priest's daughter even, who had married out of the priestly tribe, was debarred, unless as a widow she had returned to her father's home. Thus the whole family of the priests needed to walk circumspectly, lest the taint of impurity should be spread to the entire people (16).

17-30. We must give God our best. Too many are disposed to reserve some worn and defaced coin, which would not pass the tradesman's hand, for the collection. Any such behaviour, which would palm off on God what we would not think of giving to the tax-collector, is utterly abhorrent to Him (Mal. i. 8). We must always mingle tenderness and humanity in our gifts. It will not please God to give Him what has violated the law of considerateness (26, 27). Above all, it must be remembered that God loves a cheerful and willing giver (29, 30).

Do you despair of meeting the Divine claim? He who says, "I will be hallowed among the children of Israel," adds, "I am the Lord which halloweth you." Let us ask Him to make us holy, by indwelling us. F. B. M.

The Christian Temperance Campaign.

AIRDRIE.

DESCRIBING the Airdrie mission of Rev. Dr. J. Q. A. Henry, Rev. Alex. Mann writes: "As the memorable week is reviewed, the words of Scripture at once come to mind, 'The Lord hath done great things for us, whereof we are glad.' The local work of the previous seven months has been consolidated, the hearts of temperance workers have been quickened, and over 1,400 new pledges have been secured.

"There were local holidays on the Monday and Wednesday, but this fact did not make a great difference to the size of the gatherings. By the Thursday night the large hall was densely crowded. On the Friday evening Mr. and Mrs. Barclay, Edinburgh, gave earnest assistance. Dr. Henry's lecture was a fine piece of persuasive eloquence.

"On the Thursday afternoon a meeting was held for women. The hall was crowded in every part. Mrs. Colville, widow of the late Mr. John Colville, M.P., took the chair, and many distinguished ladies of the district were present, amongst them Lady Carrick-Buchanan. Dr. Henry spoke with great power.

"A unique service was held on the Friday afternoon with the policemen of the burgh. Accompanied by Hon. Sheriff Adamson, Bailie Henderson, Councillor Knox, Mr. Shanks, and Rev. Alex. Mann, Dr. Henry delivered a peculiarly appropriate address to the men in the Burgh Hall. There were seventeen present; two were already total abstainers, but the remaining fifteen signed the pledge before leaving. When the significant victory was announced at the evening meeting, it was received with applause and waving of handkerchiefs. Dr. Henry then proceeded to address 1,000 children for a few minutes.

"Dr. Henry promised a prize to the boy and girl who, during the week, would bring in the largest number of new pledges from the outside. On Friday evening it turned out that one boy had brought in 116, and another boy ninety. The girl who stood highest brought in sixty. These three received a marked copy of the New Testament, in handsome binding, from Dr. Henry at the public demonstration.

"Dr. Henry said that he had not met with such effective temperance work in the United Kingdom as had been done in Airdrie. Some of us believed before the mission began that Dr. Henry's visit, at such a momentous time in the history of the community, was nothing short of Providential. That belief we hold much more firmly now that he has gone."

EDINBURGH.

The mission at Edinburgh, April 26-29, was highly encouraging. On the 26th (Saturday) an afternoon meeting was held at the Café, where the B.W.T.A. members were "at home" to the teachers of public schools. Mr. J. Gulland presided, and Dr. Henry gave information with the object of stimulating the interest of teachers in their ability to communicate temperance teaching to the children of the public schools. Subsequently Dr. Henry addressed an overflowing audience in the Carrubber's Close Mission Hall.

On the Sabbath, two largely-attended meetings were held in the Synod Hall, that in the afternoon being presided over by Mr. David Lewis, and that at night by Dr. P. A. Young. In the afternoon, Dr. Henry dealt with the question of the responsiblity of the Church in dealing with the evil of drunkenness, while at night he showed some of the abounding evils arising from strong drink.

A brilliant lecture on "The Future of the Anglo-Saxon Race," given on the Monday evening, was full of instruction and stimulus. On the following afternoon, Dr. Henry paid a visit to the Congregational Union. At the time, the Union was convened for its first business meeting, and the number of delegates drawn from all parts of Scotland nearly filled the body of Augustine Church. Business was suspended for about ten minutes to hear Dr. Henry, who made excellent use of the short time at his disposal, and laid the cause of temperance from the point of view of the churches forcibly before the delegates. His short address was greatly appreciated by his sympathetic audience. The next address was at the annual meeting of the Band of Hope Union, which was held in the Music Hall, Bailie Brown presiding. Some hundreds of pledges were secured during the Edinburgh campaign.

METROPOLITAN TABERNACLE.

Returning to London, Dr. Henry spoke at the meetings of the Baptist Total Abstinence Union, held at the Metropolitan Tabernacle on April 30, and his vigorous pronouncement against the iniquities of the drink traffic were received with hearty approbation.

FUTURE MEETINGS.

Church; 6.30, Dowanhill; 26, Ladies' Association of the Church of Scotland, Edinburgh; 27, Church of Scotland Temperance Breakfast, The Café, Edinburgh; 28, 11 a.m., Mildmay Conference Hall; 8 p.m., East London Tabernacle, Burdett Road, E.; May 31-June 6, Belfast; 8, Sheffield; 10, Maryport; 29, Sheffield.

Letters to the Editor.

Practical Temperance Work.

Dear Sir,—I have read to-day (April 20) with much interest, as I generally do, your "Notes and Comments." On page 10, under the heading "Practical Temperance Work," you refer to a movement in Berlin to provide halls for workpeople to hold meetings in without using publichouses. No doubt the plan is an excellent one, and might well be copied in this country. But why ask some of our total abstinence associations to take it up? Are not their hands already full with what they deem the most practical way of dealing with the drink problem? Would it not be better to appeal to the thousands of people who say they are "just as desirous of promoting temperance as any total abstainers," but seem never able to find out a better way. Here is a nice little scheme for such to work out.—Yours truly,

J. Wycliffe Wilson.

The Morals of Workshops.

Dear Sir,—In a recent issue, I read with pleasure some remarks on the above subject. I think if employers of labour were seriously to take up the question, much good might be done. There is no doubt that "in many workrooms and factories the conversation indulged in by both sexes is degrading in the last degree;" but I think to a large extent the responsibility for this state of things lies with employers.

I am anxious on this occasion to state my own experience during twenty-seven years as an employer of labour. Prior to commencing business, my partner and I had this question before us, and we were anxious to do our best to meet it. After consideration, we decided to distribute every week among our workers (along with their pay) some high-toned periodical, and our choice lay in The Christian and "Spurgeon's Sermons." We gave them their choice. The result was, the majority for The Christian. The number distributed every week would vary from sixty to eighty.

The effect of this on the workrooms was the elimination of all immoral literature; and we can testify that during the twenty-seven years we were in business we heard or saw nothing that could be objected to. We received no complaints on that score from our various superintendents, and, indeed, there was a decidedly healthy moral atmosphere pervading all our workrooms. I am very anxious to let these facts be known, for I am confident that if something in this line was universally followed, there would be a great change for the better in the morals of our workrooms.—I am, yours truly,

Charles J. Hodge.

Keswick Convention.

It is our privilege again to invite God's people to the annual Convention at Keswick. Those who have been in the habit of attending will need no words of explanation as to the nature of the Convention; but there are many every year, who come up for the first time, for whom some information may not be unnecessary. And we venture to think there are others who, though they have attended more than once, still need to have clearly set before them the great purpose of our coming together.

The Convention is emphatically a meeting of God's children, whose first object is to draw nigh unto Him unitedly in Spirit and in truth. We meet together before Him as those who have been redeemed by the precious blood of Christ, not from the penalty of sin merely, but from its power—"from all iniquity"; who have been redeemed unto God, that we "might serve Him without fear, in holiness and righteousnes before Him, all the days of our life." As we look back upon the Conventions that have been already held, we rejoice to know that many of God's children have been brought to realise here, at Keswick, the inestimable privileges of an experienced deliverance from the dominion of sin, and the joy and liberty of the Spirit-filled life. It is this we would set forth as the great purpose of our coming together in Christ's Name at this Convention. Conversion to God, we need continually to be reminded, is only the starting point—not the goal. We are redeemed that we may be "conformed to the image of his Son;" we are saved to serve—and "that we should be holy and without blame before Him in love."

If to-day we rejoice in the gifts that salvation bestows, do we also at the same time recognize the claims that our privileges involve?

There are the claims that come upon us from the unsaved—at home and abroad; there are the claims which belong to us as members of Christ's Church; and above all there are the claims which God has upon us—the claims of Him who has given Himself for us. It is good that we should be aroused to a deep sense of all of these. But this alone is not enough. Let us see the Divine way of meeting these responsibilities. It is where God reveals to us his provision to meet all our weakness, inability, and deficiencies, as well as our unworthiness, that we may face our responsibilities without anxiety, without despondency, and without fear of disappointment.

Let this be our confident expectation as we come up to the Convention. He will reveal Himself to us afresh and still more fully; we shall behold his glory, and in that glory we shall see the answer to all our need.

These blessings are no mere spiritual luxuries; they are the essential equipment for service, the Divine preparation for trial, and conflict, and the stern realities of life. We seek this enduement that we may be fitted for all our duties.

With these privileges in view, and in the calm confidence that God is able to do for us even more than we ask or think, we invite you to come up to this Convention. It is God who calls us—"Gather my saints unto Me." "I will be sanctified in them that come nigh Me, and before all the people I will be glorified." "Father, glorify thy name."—We are, your brethren in Christ Jesus, The Trustees.

Convention Lodge, Keswick.
May, 1902.

Mr. John Postlethwaite, Eskin Place, Keswick, will again kindly act as hon. secretary, to whom applications for information as to lodgings or hotel accommodation may be sent, stating particulars of what is desired.

As many missionaries to the heathen desire to attend the Keswick Convention this year, a special fund is needed to assist them in their expenses. Contributions towards this important object will be gratefully received and acknowledged by Mr. Albert A. Head (Keswick Convention), Corrie Lodge, Wimbledon, S.W. Missionaries to the heathen desiring assistance will oblige by writing, enclosing a stamped envelope with full address, to Mrs. Albert Head. The fund raised is to aid missionaries to the heathen only.

For information regarding the "Special Guaranteed Train" from London and the South of England to Keswick, on Friday, July 18, as well as for the arrangements concerning "Certificate Tickets" from all other parts of the United Kingdom, apply, enclosing three penny stamps for the "Key to Keswick," to J. T. Budd, Rockville, 23, Pembroke Crescent, Hove, Brighton.

Other Lands.

Cheering Sights by the Way.

DELHI, one of the most celebrated of Indian cities, with its magnificent palaces, tombs, and mosques, its large areas of ruined towns, truly impressed us as the city of the living and the dead.

The English Baptists have a good work here. At the Zenana Mission Schools examinations were just going on when we called. The lady in charge, Miss Thorne, has been in the work for about twenty years. Among others of her helpers we met Miss Gange, the daughter of the esteemed pastor of Regent's Park Chapel, whose zeal and efficiency were spoken of in terms of high appreciation. She has laboured in India for the last twelve years. From Rev. J. T. Haslar, recently returned from his furlough, we learned that cordial relationships existed between the Baptists and S.P.G. and Cambridge Mission at Delhi. This seems worth noticing, as in some places these two organizations keep themselves very much aloof from other churches.

AGRA.

Agra is celebrated for its "dream in marble"—the Taj Mahal—a tomb of unequalled beauty, erected by Shah Jehan to his favourite queen; but it also has a splendid college in connection with C.M.S., of which Rev. J. P. Haythornthwaite is the principal. The Baptist Mission is also doing excellent work. At a distance of a few miles is the Sikandra Mission, which was founded subsequent to a terrible famine in 1837. A printing press was started with the purpose of teaching native orphans a trade, but during the Mutiny the whole was wrecked and devastated.

When, however, in 1861, another famine broke out, the Government and kind friends assisted in restoring the mission property, and the work has progressed ever since. It is carried on on a dual basis. The gentlemen of the staff are C.M.S., while all the lady helpers are sent out by the Berlin Ladies Society. Rev. E. T. Pegg speaks very highly of the ability and devotion of the German sisters.

CAWNPORE.

Our next move is to Cawnpore, where a large industrial mission is carried on by the S.P.G., among whom the Westcott brothers are prominent. Dr. Hoskins, of the M. E. Mission, manages an industrial department for joinery and cabinet work, in which at present he employs thirty-six natives. He desires to extend this work as soon as the necessary means are at hand. Since our visit there we have learned that at the second convention and exhibition of the Indian Christian Association of the North-West Provinces and Oudh (from February 22-24) some beautifully finished pieces of furniture from the M. E. Mission, Cawnpore, were conspicuous, while a handsome rug from the American Marathi Mission, Ahmednagar, took the first prize.

The Indian Witness, the excellent Methodist organ, in the number for February 27, reports that the Commissioner of Lucknow, Mr. Thomson, who presided at the opening session, spoke most appreciatively of the enterprise and ability of the Association as shown in this practical way. Referring to the view held by some that industrial work did not lie within the scope of missions, but should be provided for independently, he declared emphatically that the duty of providing boys and girls with the means of obtaining an honest livelihood was as important as education, and the best way of laying the foundation for an industrious, self-respecting Christian community.

Mrs. Hoskins, as president of the W.C.T.U. of India, exerts her gifts on behalf of the temperance cause. She has an excellent assistant in Miss Dunhill, of Bangalore, who is the national organizer of the Union. We hear that at the Indian National Convention at Cawnpore, October 19, 1901, the establishment of a Home for Inebriates of both sexes was resolved upon, and that it is to bear the name of Frances Willard. Poona was chosen as the most convenient location; but the Home will not be opened until the sum of at least 3,500 rupees for its annual support is guaranteed. The various divisions of the Union have made some brave efforts towards realizing this.

LUCKNOW.

Lucknow is the stronghold and centre of M.E. Mission activity among the natives, as well as among the English and Eurasian population. Rev. J. W. Robinson, pastor, told us that there were thirty-four Sunday-schools in connection with the mission scattered throughout the city. The Home for Deaconesses is at the same time a refuge for the suffering and the abandoned. The handsome college for girls is a fitting monument to its founder, the late Miss Isabella Thoburn, who will continue to live in the affection of all who knew her. Her sudden death during a cholera outbreak last year was a great loss to the Mission.

The Reid Christian College under the principalship of Rev. C. L. Bare, M.A., B.D., was founded thirteen years ago through the efforts of Rev. B. H. Badley. His son, Mr. B. F. Badley, recently joined the missionary ranks on the College staff.

In 1893 a business department was opened for the purpose of imparting to students the knowledge of book-keeping, type-writing, shorthand, &c., and so preparing them for remunerative employment as soon as the prescribed course of studies is completed. "The same facility for obtaining work does not offer itself in other departments of education," says Mr. J. N. West, B.A., S.T.B., who is the manager of this department, and very enthusiastic as to phonography, which he considers the future mode of writing, time-saving, easy to adopt, and the only one befitting the twentieth century.

The advantage which Mission Schools possess over Government establishments is that the former never need to be in quest for a text book on morals, for they have the best authority on these matters in the Bible, the study of which is generally made the subject of the first hour in the day.

ZENANA BIBLE AND MEDICAL MISSION.

We also visited Lady Kinnaird's Memorial Hospital. Dr. Pailthorpe, the lady in charge, looked as bright as a sunny morning. Her heart is evidently in her work. Nearly all the beds were occupied, and every patient, no matter of what age, was nursing a doll. To my astonished "How is that?" the lady laughingly explained that this was a new departure in Christmas presents. Much jealousy having been shown in former years by those who were not the happy recipients of dolls, it was decided that in order to make offence impossible, they should all be treated alike and have the same presents. And now they are all contented!

The Victoria Hospital in Benares, in charge of Dr. Kate McDowell, is a gem of its kind. Here, as in other mission hospitals, the Bible is taught to in and out patients, and the days open with prayer in the wards. The mission of these hospitals is two-fold; firstly, to get hold of native women and influence them for Christ, and secondly, to train native Christians as nurses.

Sunday Newspapers in Italy. — In Italy almost every daily newspaper is published seven days in the week, that is to say, it comes out on Sundays as on week-days. Besides the daily paper, there are quite a number of special Sunday papers, mostly illustrated. It is too much to hope that these latter will be suppressed, but there is an agitation among the newspaper men in Italy to stop the publication of the ordinary dailies on Sundays. This agitation has received a valuable impulse by the action of what is called the Book Federation. This Federation has passed a resolution that its workmen, who are occupied in the getting out of newspapers, ought to have the Sunday as a day of repose. The newspaper proprietors of Venice have approved of the cessation of the Sunday issue of their papers, and are corresponding with other newspaper proprietors on the subject. The idea is to make this change, like that of Sunday shop closing, universal.—A. R.

Young Men in Colombo.

FOR some years past a very interesting work among young men has been carried on in Colombo in connection with the Y.M.C.A. New headquarters have, of late, been urgently needed, and the Government having agreed to lease to the Association a desirable site, plans have been approved of a structure adapted to the requirements of the institution.

Mr. Louis Hieb, general secretary of the Association, a warm-hearted friend of young men in Ceylon, has come to England in search of rest, but still more resolved upon seeking help for the work. He tells a story of devoted labour, attended with considerable prosperity. The Association exercises a great influence in the island, its membership including young men who are Buddhists, Hindus, Mohammedans, and Roman Catholics, as well as Protestant Christians.

The institution aims to give young men of all races and religions a moral backbone that shall tend to make them steady, useful and industrious. Colombo is the resort of young men from all the provinces of Ceylon; they go there to complete their education, or to take service under Government, in mercantile and other offices, or in other capacities. For such the institution will be invaluable with its open classes and recreation rooms, cheap restaurant, bedrooms to be paid for by boarders, and other advantages. For strangers and new arrivals from Europe, America, &c., the institute, with its rooms, always open, will be of great service, giving them the certainty of a friendly welcome, all possible information as to churches, boarding houses, and Christian friends in the city, and also as to such friends in outlying districts should they be intended for work in the provinces.

It is estimated that in all Rs. 75,000 (£6,000) will be required. Of this sum Ceylon will furnish one-third, and it is hoped that friends in Britain will subscribe another third, leaving American Christians to complete the total. Mr. Hieb will be glad to hear from persons interested in Ceylon, and work among young men there. He may be addressed to the care of Mr. W. H. Mills, Exeter Hall, Strand, London.

Awakening in Bulgaria.

FOR some time now, through lack of means, I have not been able to travel much, but our Father has opened a wide door for usefulness for me in several directions. In Philippopolis I regularly preach at our hall, also very often in the prisons and in the public garden, beside visiting shops, distributing tracts, and caring for the destitute and the sick poor wherever I find them.

By permission of the Minister of Justice, I have been preaching to the prisoners of the Black Mosque, where the political prisoners are kept. Visiting them in their cells, I found some of them very miserable. Yesterday I visited some of the well-to-do people, and got some clothing, also some books, which I distributed among the prisoners, for which they were very thankful.

Two or three years ago I wrote a pamphlet, "An Open Letter to the Bulgarian Clergy." It was composed of passages of Scripture, depicting the character and work of true and false teachers of religion, also the results of their influence. I prepared the pamphlet at the desire of some awakened citizens, and it was distributed all over the country. God has wonderfully blessed that endeavour. The Bulgarian clergy are awakening in many directions, and the Gospel is being preached in churches where it was never heard before.

Martin Hope Sutton Memorial.—A very hearty response has been made to the appeal by Mrs. Soole (Greyfriars Vicarage, Reading) for the erection of a hall in the parish of Greyfriars as a memorial of the late Mr. Martin Hope Sutton. It is intended to close the list of contributions on May 31.

Rev. John Parker,

MISSIONARY TO MONGOLIA AND WESTERN CHINA.

WHATEVER may be the history of missions to the Mongols in years to come, and however illustrious may be the names of future missionaries to that bleak land, it is safe to prophesy that one name will be for ever associated with the story of Christian work in Mongolia—the name of James Gilmour, who in 1891 laid down his life for the people to whom he had given twenty years of strenuous and loving service.

If James Gilmour be the "Apostle to the Mongols," then the subject of this brief sketch stands in true apostolic succession; for it was during a brief furlough of Gilmour's in 1889 that John Parker (then studying at Cheshunt College) came under the influence of his enthusiasm, and was led to offer himself to the London Missionary Society for work in Mongolia.

Mr. Parker's offer was accepted, and in 1890 he sailed for China. Born at West Bromwich in 1860, Mr. Parker was at this time thirty years of age. There was evidently a true missionary spirit in his family, for his elder brother had three years earlier been appointed by the L.M.S. to work at Benares, while a younger brother has recently been appointed by the same Society to take charge of its important educational work at Nagercoil, in Travancore. Some years of experience in the backwoods of Canada had given Mr. Parker a useful training for the life of loneliness and hardship he was now called upon to undertake, while a brief course of medical training in London had provided additional equipment.

It was in December, 1890, that Mr. Parker reached Mongolia, and settled at his station of Ta-tzu-kou, eighty-five miles to the south-west of Gilmour's head station at Chao-Yang, and some 250 miles to the north-east of Peking. For four months he had the privilege of Gilmour's presence and advice; then they proceeded together to attend the annual committee meetings at Tientsin. Here Gilmour was seized with an attack of fever, and on May 21 passed into the unclouded presence of his Saviour. It can be imagined what a blow this must have been to the young recruit.

On his return journey he was met everywhere with the question, "Where is Gilmour?" And the sorrow of the people at his answer was profound. This was only the beginning of the young missionary's troubles. In the following year (1892) the country was devastated by a large army of rebels, and Mr. Parker was compelled to flee for safety to Tientsin. During the course of the rebellion he suffered many hardships, and for some weeks it was feared that he had perished. A native preacher from Peking, who was sent to look for him, himself suffered much before he discovered that Mr. Parker had made good his escape.

This was indeed a "baptism of fire"; but Mr. Parker, nothing daunted, returned as soon as the rebellion had been put down, and resumed work in his old district. In 1893 he married Miss Ashburner, of the L.M.S. Mission at Amoy, and a year of quiet and promising work followed. But the interruptions were not yet ended. In 1894 the Chino-Japanese war broke out, and Mongolia was in such a disturbed condition that it was not thought prudent for Mr. and Mrs. Parker to remain in the country. Accordingly they were sent to do deputation work in Australia for five months, returning to Mongolia at the end of 1895. Now, at last, there was the opportunity for two or three years of consecutive work, and the results were full of encouragement. Three colporteurs were constantly employed, and found a ready sale for Gospels and tracts; native preachers were sent to the surrounding villages; the dispensary was reopened, and had a steady flow of patients, more than 3,000 being treated during the first year. A small day-school was organized under the mastership of one of the native preachers. Mr. Parker preached daily in the chapel or in the open air, and the Sunday congregations increased in a most encouraging degree. By the end of 1896 the Church members numbered 100, and there were many inquirers. In six years' time, in spite of all the troubles and disturbances through which the Mission had passed, the number of Christians had grown from sixteen to 100, whilst the area covered by the work of the Mission had been more than trebled.

REV. JOHN PARKER.

From Photograph by Mr. A. J. Elliott, 9, Oldham Street, Manchester.

It is hardly to be wondered at that Mr. Parker's health should at last give way. He came home on furlough. After some two years of rest—including a more than ordinary amount of deputation work, for he was much sought after by the churches—Mr. Parker was pronounced fit for return to work. But, in the meantime, the London Missionary Society had decided that its Mongolia Mission, which occupied an isolated position away from the Society's other fields of work, should be handed over to the Irish Presbyterian Church, whose mission was firmly established in the district.

His old sphere of labour being thus closed against him, Mr. Parker was appointed to the important mission in Western China, with its headquarters in the city of Chungking. It was no light thing to break with the past in this way, and to begin work afresh in a field so widely different. But Mr. Parker is still young, and has entered on his new work with an enthusiasm undaunted by all the sufferings and disappointments through which he has been called upon to pass. A great work is opening up in Western China; the movement towards Christianity at the present time in that district is full of promise, and in Mr. Parker the society has a missionary who may be relied on to prosecute the work with energy and discretion.

The Indian Famine.

THE position of affairs in India is becoming increasingly grave. It has been our duty from time to time to call attention to the keen distress which prevails in large and important districts, particularly Rajputana, parts of the Punjab, and Gujarat. Appeals of a pathetic character which continue to reach us from missionaries and others show that there is an urgent call for large-hearted measures of relief in order to cope with widespread suffering.

NO RAIN FOR A YEAR.

Trustworthy information from Ajmere says that immediate aid is necessary "in order to keep at least the thousands of poor Christians from wandering from their homes and utterly perishing. In some places no rain has fallen for a year, there is literally nothing to eat, and the distress is daily increasing. Many Christian people are at the point of starvation." Already many new waifs have been taken into orphanages. Weavers and farm hands are out of work, and funds are urgently required to open relief works.

STARVING WEAVERS.

A further communication from an important centre in Rajputana says:—"The short rainfall of last year raised the prices of food stuffs very much. In the district to the south especially the distress is severe among the lower classes. Last year's rain crop—the poor man's crop—failed them. Their wells did not contain enough water to irrigate the winter crop. . . . In the very worst famine-stricken part I have about one hundred Christians. They are poor weavers, who also in the rains sow a coarse grain in the common land round their villages. They, with the rest, lost their rain crop last year. Their trade is at a standstill, for the villagers around, who cannot get a full day's food, are contented with rags. There is no capitalist among them to give them work. The non-Christians around do not throw work in their way. They have no seed corn for the coming rains, and no money to buy it with. The corn dealers would charge them something like 75 per cent. for an advance. After paying this and the land rent, what would there be left? These 100 Christians, who have recently come out from heathenism, live in thirty or thirty-five houses. Fifteen shillings to each home for seed corn would be a great help."

AN APPALLING OUTLOOK.

A devoted missionary at Ahmednagar writes: "Famine is pressing us sore. There are more than 400,000 persons on famine relief, and the number is increasing steadily: 25,000 persons died last week of plague, which is also on the increase. Here at Ahmednagar we have been spared from another attack of plague, but have been sorely hit by the Famine. The official estimate of the grain crop of this district, with its 900,000 people, is but ten per cent of an ordinary crop. Our poor people were bankrupt long ago, and have nothing whatever to buy with."

"In some parts of our district," writes another worker, "the crops totally failed, and hundreds of people have commenced to wander in search of food and employment. Many women are clothed in rags; the children are naked. Great scarcity will reign for months."

We shall be pleased to receive and forward the gifts of readers for this crying need. Donations should be addressed to the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN, care of Messrs. Morgan and Scott, 12, Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C.

The May Meetings.

Church Missionary Society.

THE special circumstances in which they were placed caused the Committee of the Church Missionary Society, contrary to their usual custom, to place financial matters in the forefront of the general review presented at the annual meeting, held in Exeter Hall, on Tuesday. With much thankfulness they announced that the £327,000 received for general purposes had exceeded the income of the previous year by £13,500, and therefore of all previous years. The result was a much smaller deficit than had been feared, namely, including that brought forward, £27,600. It was, however, urged that each year should pay its own way; and this could not be done without an increase of some £50,000.

The number actually added to the staff in the past year, after training, was seventy (thirty-one men and thirty-nine women), or seven less than the preceding year. But as the total number of applications and inquiries has not decreased, the Committee believed that there is no cooling of devotion to the Master's service. The present number of missionaries, European and Colonial, is 942—viz., 421 clergyman, 146 laymen, 375 single women; and, adding 363 wives, the total is 1,305. This includes sixty-four qualified doctors, of whom fourteen are women. The native clergy number 374, lay teachers 7,927, Christian adherents (including adherents) 290,225, and communicants 20,617. The 2,522 schools have 103,137 scholars. The medical missionaries have had at their command 1,713 beds, where they treated 13,871 patients, in addition to visiting 786,642 others.

FIFTY-SIX BAPTISMS PER DAY.

Special attention was called to the rate at which native Christendom increases by the natural growth of population and the addition of new converts. In 1900 the Society's clergy, European and native, baptized 8,142 adult converts and 10,941 children of Christian parents. Although the returns for 1901 are not yet complete, there is no doubt that these figures have been exceeded. So far, the corresponding figures are 9,586 and 11,007. Roughly speaking, it may be said that twenty-six adult converts and thirty children are baptized, on an average, every day in the year. Uganda again stands first, with 4,067 adult baptisms; India has 2,830; China, 859; Japan, 485. Among the most interesting cases are the first four converts at Mr. Peck's Eskimo Mission at Cumberland Sound, and the first Pygmy from Mr. Stanley's great African forest.

Gratitude was expressed for great and unlooked-for development of the two quite modern departments, Medical Missions and Women's Work. To these the achievements of the past few years are, under God, largely due, and both seem destined to wield still more extensive influence in the future. Educational and industrial missions, as well as literary and translation work, equally need to be vigorously developed. But there is even greater urgency for the training of native clergy, evangelists, and teachers. The Society's Divinity and Training Schools are everywhere doing excellent work, but need to be more adequately manned. If Africa is to be evangelized by Africans, and Asia by Asiatics, this is the department that above all others seems to call for reinforcement.

FAITH TRIED BUT MAINTAINED.

The great audience was deeply moved by the statement submitted by Prebendary H. E. Fox (secretary); and as the chairman (Right Hon. Sir John H. Kennaway, Bart., M.P.), proceeded to point out the lessons of the past, along with the calls which come from many quarters for that expansion demanded by the success attained as well as by the opening of new doors, it was evident that a vision had indeed been granted to very many of the coming Kingdom. Though there is much that remains to be done, he declined to add with men of the world, "so little done. We thank God, as one year of opportunity and blessing follows another, for the seal of his approval placed upon our labours, for the men He has given, for the men He has provided, and for the unabated confidence of our supporters. He put our faith to the trial, but He helped us to maintain it so that while we doubted and prayed, He did not suffer us to fall into blind panic or to make hasty changes which we might afterwards have cause to regret."

Speaking as one who had himself, owing largely to circumstances of early training, been brought more into touch with the sister Society, the Bishop of London described the loving admiration with which he had watched the development of the work and output of this Society. It had therefore been a joy to come, "and I do not find you any less red hot than I expected." He had made up his mind to try and turn London into the greatest missionary diocese in the world—like the heart which pumps blood to the very extremities of the body—and thus warm the hearts of the missionaries in the farthest parts of the earth. In a stimulating address he dwelt on (1) the fact that the object of the Church is to convert the world; (2) that those who have gone in the name of the Lord have had the Lord working with them, with signs following ("Your mission to Uganda alone would convert me to foreign missions"); (3) the extraordinary happiness of every missionary he had ever met; and (4) the great fact that these 800,000,000 of heathen are yet unconverted ("Yet every one of these could be trained to be a Christian").

INDIAN OFFICIAL'S TESTIMONY.

Very warm testimony was borne by Sir W. Mackworth Young, K.C.S.I., to the value of the work being done in India by the Society (formerly Lieut.-Governor of the Punjab), who has been for thirty-eight years associated with the Government there. He had taken full advantage of many opportunities to observe the methods employed, the attitude of the people towards the missionaries, and the effect of the teaching, "and I am thankful to be permitted to proclaim my conviction that God is blessing the work, and preparing a way for the spread of the Gospel among these teeming millions. The Lord Jesus Christ is the Saviour of the East as well as of the West." As to the political effect of the work, he expressed the belief that our position in India depends more upon the goodwill of the people than upon the strength of the garrisons, "and for that we depend upon the Christian missionaries. Their character and conduct have placed the administration under a deep debt of gratitude." Summing up much that he had seen and heard, he said the cry on every hand is, "Wanted, a religion. How can we best take advantage of this crisis? The mission schools and colleges supply an important answer. The people prefer them everywhere to the Government schools."

The pressing needs of Western Canada were presented by the Bishop of Caledonia; yet he looked forward hopefully. "We can afford to see churches in flames, if hearts are made to burn more brightly also. We can rebuild edifices, if at the same time hearts are built up in faith."

Mighty doings by the hand of the Lord in Japan was the burden of the story told by Rev. Barclay F. Buxton. "We have a field that has fewer hindrances than I suppose any other in the world. We thank God that He has been able to do something that has set our hearts rejoicing in Him." A vivid description was given of open-air meetings and marches in search of the souls of the heathen.

From his own work among the students of India, Rev. G. T. Manley brought a message of praise, accompanied by a touching request for more helpers.

EXTENSION AND INTENSION.

In the closing address the Bishop of Durham followed up what had been said by an appeal for "a fresh realization by the power of the Holy Spirit of the grandeur and glory of the missionary message — that is to say, Jesus Christ." He found himself compelled to face the fact that there is a suspense and slackening in the tide of work for God both at home and abroad. "The great remedy for all this is a wider proclamation, strong, and true, and Biblical, of the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. If we would have Church extension and intension, we must have Him glorified. To have this preaching, and to do it, we must have Him made glorious to our own hearts first. We need the zeal and love which came in the spring showers of 1885 and 1886 renewed. Let us ask for Christ made glorious to us as the message of God, then we are sure to have a thirst for the souls of others. What is it with which we go to the non-Christian world to carry? It is to bear a Name in which abides the life eternal. Let us not rest till this has arisen brighter than ever as a motive for our missionary enterprise."

New Babylonian Discoveries.—Important discoveries have recently been made through the excavation of a series of mounds on the site of Babylon by a party of German explorers, of which an account is given in Harper's Magazine, and more are expected. The site of Nebuchadnezzar's palace has been located—that palace of the "handwriting on the wall" in which Cyrus lived, and in which Alexander died. The great temple of Marduk-a-Bel has also been identified, containing limestone blocks bearing an inscription of the name of Nebuchadnezzar, as well as the temple of E-sagila, "the lofty house," with its eight-storied tower, the traditional Tower of Babel.

Missionary Baptists.

AFTER the opening gatherings referred to in our last issue, the various meetings of the Baptist Spring Assembly and allied Societies were largely attended, and marked by deep interest and enthusiasm.

The Bible Translation Society reported encouragingly as to progress in the final revision and electrotyping of the Bengali Bible; and satisfactory statements were also received as to translation work in Orissa and Ceylon.

The public missionary soirée on Tuesday evening was presided over by Sir HERBERT ASHMAN (Lord Mayor of Bristol), who found much cause for praise in the progress made during the past year. "Our friends the missionaries, our friends the workers, and all those who are interested, are asking for blessings, they are asking for extended usefulness, and for greater opportunities. God is not deaf; we just get that which we so fully expect to get in our prayers. And as Baptists we have been blessed, extraordinarily blessed; we have had our prayers answered.

A FRUITFUL FIELD.

"I remember that it was only in 1877 that Stanley emerged from the Congo, having traced that mighty river from its mouth. The work commenced, as far as we Baptists were concerned, back in 1879, and yet in this short space of time—twenty-three years—Wathen has reached the splendid growth that it has to-day—eight churches, gathered from tribes of heathens, many of them cannibals. When we read of schools belonging to Wathen Station containing 1,507 scholars, when we read of the boarding of 263 scholars at the station, when we read of the training at one station of from eighty to 100 native Christians as teachers of cleanliness, as teachers of comfort, social duties, home life, duties to the State and to the country, and various duties of civilisation and Christianity; then, I think, we might well be astonished that so much has been secured in so short a time. The report speaks of a good deal of building that has been done. It also speaks of the temperance work, and gives the fact that the year opened with 1,000 members, that there has been a further extension, and thus it closed with 1,512 members. The translation work of the Bible is also being carried on. With regard to the statistics at Wathen Station and its neighbourhood, there are 355 church members, a day-school of 1,507, a Sunday-school of 807, and so on. Were there ever such opportunities given to a Christian people as there are given to us in this work?"

THE CENTRE OF BUDDHISM.

Opportunities enjoyed during the past year of visiting a number of mission stations enabled Rev. J. G. GREENHOUGH to make a scathing denunciation of Buddhism, as he had seen it "reduced to practice. That is the thing of which you have heard the glories chanted for twenty years, and of which you have been told that it is only a stage lower than Christian faith and doctrine. I do not know what it is in other parts of the world; I only tell you what it is in Ceylon, where I have seen it; and I declare that there is no false religion of the world that needs more washing out and re-creating with the cleansing of Christ and the baptism of the Holy Ghost than this.

"It is among these people exclusively, so far, that our work is going on. It is a slow work, necessarily, for great and terrible are the hindrances, and there is much rubbish to be removed. Sometimes you hear complaints that mission work has failed in Ceylon, and at times even you yourselves become impatient when you read the yearly records of results. "'Nearly a century of work, and so little to be seen.' I tell you that there is far more to be seen than you think, and unspeakably more that cannot be seen, yet which is like the bread cast upon the waters. You speak to some of the European laymen, the devout Christians in Ceylon, about the failure of mission work there, and they will look at you with surprised eyes, and with a little flush of indignation; and they will tell you there is no part of the Eastern world in which the truth of Christ has made more progress than there.

It will surprise you to hear that one-tenth of the population avow themselves of the Christian faith. There are many sorts of Christians, I must confess. The majority of them are Roman Catholics. Still, allowing for all that, can you point to any part of the Eastern world or Africa where the proportion of converts is so great? The night which has brooded over this lovely island for thousands of years will not turn suddenly into complete morning. Buddha holds the people with an iron grip—iron that has been forged round them, and riveted on their consciences and minds for long generations.

"I believe in my deepest heart that before the end of this century comes, Ceylon will be a Christian island; and the effect of its Christian life will be felt in India, and over all the Buddhist world—for you must not measure the missionary importance of Ceylon by counting the population. Remember, it is the central stronghold of the Buddhist faith; it has become a vast commercial centre; people are passing to and fro from all the Eastern lands. It is in touch with all the Eastern world; and the light which is kindled there will shine more or less over many lands and peoples."

GOING TO THEIR OWN PEOPLE.

Africa was represented by Rev. J. R. M. STEPHENS (of the Lower Congo), who said the Congo Mission was never in a stronger and a better position that at the present time. The station at Wathen was responsible for an area of about 500 square miles, and here the method employed was to send round to all the towns and villages this large district contained, and get a boy and girl from each, put them into the boarding-school, and there teach them how to read and write. And at the end of three or four years, these went back to their own towns and villages again, and became evangelists and teachers to their fellow-townsmen. In the early days it had been found very hard indeed to get these Congo folk to allow their boys and girls to go to school at all; but in the boarding-school at the present time there were a greater number than ever before, for they had 200 boys and about sixty or seventy girls, representing 170 towns and villages of the district.

Speaking of the peculiar needs of India, Rev. GEORGE S. WILKINS (Berhampore) recalled that as far back as 1849, 250 acres of land were granted to the Missionary Society on behalf of the famine orphans whom they had adopted. The agricultural settlement was shut off from the outer world by a number of hills; it was then jungle land, wilderness. Now, when once inside the belt of hills, they found, in place of the jungle, fruitful fields; where once was the wilderness was now a garden, and thirty families were supported on the rice that was grown there.

International Bible Reading Association.

IN connection with the annual gatherings of the Sunday School Union, a crowded meeting took place in the City Temple on Tuesday evening of last week, under the auspices of the International Bible Reading Association. An interesting statement as to the work of the Society was made by Mr. C. WATERS, who mentioned that the gathering marked the twentieth year of service and progress. In the first year they had thought it a good thing to enrol 11,000 members, but last year 50,000 were enrolled, bringing the total to 740,000. The United Kingdom included 650,000 members, connected with 9,300 branches. London has 120,000 members. The Association included some 40 denominations, with 10,000 voluntary workers.

The chair was taken by Mrs. GEORGE CADBURY who, in a happy speech, referred to the world-wide character and influence of the Association. She herself had joined the society some years ago when teaching a class of girls, and if only each member would persuade others to join, their numbers would show an even greater increase. They should not only read the passages set down for each day, but read the Bible intelligently, and seek to know its history, how it has been preserved and handed down to us.

Mrs. Cadbury proceeded to urge the reading of various editions and comparing the translations, and gave numerous instances of Wycliff's and Tyndale's quaint renderings.

Other speakers included Revs. R. Culley (Wesleyan Sunday School Union) and Rev. J. E. Newell (L.M.S., Samoa).

Protestants Demonstrating.

ONE of the most important of recent Protestant gatherings was the annual meeting of the National Protestant Church Union, held at St. James' Hall on April 29, when there was a large rally of well-known supporters of the Protestant cause.

The Right Hon. J. W. MELLOR, who presided, said that the Reformation has given us two blessings, an open Bible and liberty of conscience, and we must take care not to lose them. The question arises, to whom are we to appeal in order to put a stop to the present state of lawlessness in the Church? Unhappily, the lawbreakers have been promoted to high offices, and it appears useless to appeal to the Church authorities or to Parliament. It is appalling to think that, in the National Church of this country, English people cannot have the services performed according to their own consciences and according to law. The only way to obtain redress is to go through the country explaining to the people what is going on, in order to obtain sympathy and support, and ultimately to win the co-operation of members of Parliament.

Rev. Prebendary WACE, who followed, contended that the only effectual remedy for the prevailing perversions in the Church of England is to be found in a renewed and deeper apprehensiveness on the part of both clergy and laity of the main principles of the Reformation, as contained in Holy Scripture, and taught alike by the Primitive Church, and by the Reformed Church of England. He said that this view answers the question propounded as the subject of that meeting—"Disloyalty in the National Church: What is the remedy?" He pointed out that a large body of very earnest and learned men are setting themselves with all the force of their mind and heart to repudiate the principles on which the Reformation of the English Church was conducted in the sixteenth century.

After recognising that in spite of many difficulties good progress has been made by the Society, Bishop INGHAM, the next speaker, went on to say that the result of the Lambeth hearings and of the Round-Table Conferences has been to make the Evangelical position more unassailable than ever.

Other speakers included Revs. Canon MCCORMICK, Prebendary WEBB-PEPLOE, and Sir C. ROBERT LIGHTON (secretary).

Convention at Portsmouth.—As the usual Convention is not this year being held at Southsea, it has been decided to hold one at the Welcome Mission, Portsmouth, during Whit-week. The Bible readings are to be given by Revs. F. Paynter, J. Gregory Mantle, and A. D. Cope, and Mr. R. C. Morgan. The preliminary meeting is to be conducted by Mr. Paynter, on Saturday evening, May 17.

Help for the Suffering Poor.—Few records of the work of Christian philanthropy sound so pathetic a note as the annual report of the Mission of Help to the Suffering Poor. Miss Annie F. Perram, the secretary, has many saddening stories to relate. In its work of relief the Mission of Help comes into close touch with men and women hannted by the skeleton of hunger from year's end to year's end, forced to live amid surroundings of the most uncongenial nature, yet withal are leading upright, godly lives. At present the work is limited to helping those who, through no fault of their own, have fallen below the "poverty line," aged, and sick. The Mission has now forty weekly pensioners. The clothing store proves an immense boon to many of the poor, whose earnings leave no margin for replenishing their scanty wardrobe. Copies of the annual report may be obtained from Miss Perram, 90, Darenth Road, Stamford Hill, N.

Barbican Mission to the Jews.

A SPIRIT of prayerful interest in all that concerns the evangelization of Israel was manifested at the annual gathering of friends and supporters of the Barbican Mission to the Jews on Thursday last. The meeting was held in the Church Room of St. Paul's, Onslow Square, S.W., and the proceedings were under the direction of Prebendary Webb-Peploe, president of the Mission.

The summary of the year's operations, presented at the meeting, indicates a year of consistent progress. The extensive and more suitable premises provided in the erection of the Gordon Calthrop Mission House imposed new obligations and opened the way for enlarged effort. The working staff was strengthened, and with this expansion has come a richer experience of Divine favour.

PROGRESS IN EFFORT AND RESULT.

Every department at home has been blessed of God, and has grown in a marvellous way. The reading-room is still the attraction to the Jew. The Saturday services and daily Bible instruction classes have grown in numbers and interest. From time to time a goodly number have become regular inquirers after truth, and thirty-three have been admitted into the Home for Converts, for further instruction, with a view to baptism. In the house-to-house visitation the missionaries meet with Jews who are not any more friendly than those who attend at the mission. They often come face to face with the most heart-breaking misery and poverty among the people still "beloved for the fathers' sake"; and it is gratifying to witness the astonishment and gratitude manifested when, through the generosity of friends constrained by the love of Christ, the missionaries are able to administer relief. The work abroad has been carried on with energy.

The first address was given by Sir Robert Anderson, who touched upon the various difficulties experienced in prosecuting evangelistic work among Israel. The element of indifference common to the human heart was manifested among the Jews. Another difficulty with the Jew is the treatment his nation has received, and the attitude of Christians of the present day towards them. The Barbican Mission, continued the speaker, was particularly deserving of the confidence of Christians, because all such elements were minimised or eliminated.

A forcible appeal was made by Prebendary Webb-Peploe on behalf of the Mission. The work is growing rapidly; God and man are calling them to go forward. On recently visiting the mission house, he found twenty or thirty young men in the reading-room, to whom a Gospel message would be presented. Referring to the present position, the speaker announced that the whole amount required for the building had been subscribed. In answer to a recent appeal, a Christian lady had volunteered to meet the deficit at the end of the year, with the result that the mission had now a balance in hand. The committee are anxious to secure permanently the land adjoining the Mission House, at present held in trust, for use as a preaching ground, which will prove a valuable adjunct to present efforts. A sum of £2,000 is needed to carry out this project.

Rev. A. A. Isaacs (Bath), in the course of some remarks on the work of Jewish missions, spoke of two points which commended themselves to his conviction: (1) He had never known a time when the clouds overshadowing the Jews were darker than now; yet (2) never was the prospect of the Jew so stimulating as at the present time, both from a religious and social standpoint. Never was a time when the Jews carried out such energetic and successful work among their own people.

Dr. E. W. Bullinger, in a brief address, referred to the need for a medical mission, which the committee are anxious to inaugurate as soon as circumstances will permit.

The Secretary, Prediger Lipshytz, added some words of appeal, and cited instances of the noble sacrifices which converts to Christianity from Judaism have not hesitated to make.

The Boys' Brigade.

THE annual demonstration of the Boys' Brigade was held at the Royal Albert Hall on Wednesday evening of last week, when some of the results of the work of this useful organization were witnessed by over 2,000 lads in uniform and their friends. Contrary to a somewhat natural impression, the Boys' Brigade does not teach the "art of war," but simply employs military organization, drill, and discipline as the most stimulating and interesting means of securing the attention of a volatile class, and promoting self-respect, chivalry, and Christian manliness. Primarily a religious movement, its aspiration and effort are to lead the boy to that crowning act of human life, a personal surrender to Jesus Christ and his service. The Brigade appeals to lads at an age when the Church finds it most difficult to retain its hold upon them, and has thus supplied a link in the chain of Christian work which hitherto was missing. The boys represent almost every denomination, and are banded together in companies, under duly qualified Christian men as officers. The methods employed for attaining the object of the Brigade comprise Sunday services, Bible classes, Scripture Reading Union, drill meetings, ambulance classes, and instrumental bands.

Wednesday's gathering was under the presidency of the Earl of Aberdeen, and the proceedings commenced with the buglers sounding their "General Salute," and the singing by the vast audience of "God bless our native land." Prayer was offered by Rev. R. W. Allen, and a hearty welcome to the boys was voiced by the Chairman. In the course of a brief address he remarked that sympathy bestowed on the Brigade was well merited, since the movement was both religious and patriotic.

The Bishop of Hereford also addressed the gathering in commendation of the objects of the Brigade, an institution which England owes to Scotland. It was a joy to know that the movement had grown out of a Sunday school. Dealing as it does with boys from twelve to seventeen years of age, its influences are brought to bear upon them during the most critical years of their lives. Speaking to the boys, the Bishop offered some timely counsel in pursuing their ambitions to be considered manly. No text was more worthy to be taken as a motto for their lives than St. Paul's words, "Quit you like men; be strong." Manliness is not roughness, but strength of character, purity, and moral courage.

A varied programme of gymnastic displays, physical drills with arms, dumbbell exercises, &c., was gone through. One of the most praiseworthy performances was the ambulance display by the North London Battalion, when the practical skill and smartness of the boys was demonstrated in attending to the results of cycle gymnasium accidents.

Y.W.C.A.—A monthly prayer meeting for Christian workers, presided over by the Rev. W. Horne, is held on the first Tuesday in each month, 11.30 a.m. to 12.30, at the Y.W.C.A. premises, 340, Brixton Road. Addresses are given by the local clergymen and ministers.

Kilburn Protestant Evangelical School and Mission.—On Wednesday last, in the presence of Rev. Dr. J. Lawson-Forster and other trustees, the following Scripture repetitions took place:—Fifty-one of the children repeated the whole of John i., ii., and iii.; thirty-six repeated John xiv., xv., and xvi.; twenty-five repeated John xx., xxi.; Rev. vii. 9 to 17; and Psa. ciii.; eight repeated Matt. vi. and vii., and John xvii.; six repeated Gen. i., Psa. cxxxix, Isa. xii., xl., and liii, and four repeated Rom. viii, 1 Cor. xv., 1 Cor. xiii., and Gal. iii. In 1894, there were only three; 1895, twenty-one; 1896, twenty-eight; 1897, thirty-nine; 1898, forty-five; 1899, sixty-four; 1900, ninety-four; 1901, 117; and this year 130. It will be noticed that since Mr. Joseph Peters, to whose generous help, aided by some good Protestant friends, the School and Mission has been built and supported, first offered a special prize for Scripture knowledge, the number of competitors has increased from three to 130! The total average attendance of scholars is 360.

Christian Colporteurs.

THE devoted workers of the Christian Colportage Association are evangelists as well as salesmen of Gospel literature, and in their double capacity assuredly exercise a widespread influence upon the towns and villages of England. On Thursday last they rallied to Exeter Hall for a conference and public meetings, at which they rendered deeply interesting accounts of their assiduous labours.

The gatherings were in every way encouraging. At the annual meeting, held in the afternoon, Mr. H. D. Brown presented a lucid and informing report. The sales during the year have amounted to 68,330 Bibles and Testaments, 470,561 books, 379,200 magazines, and 316,438 Scripture text cards, of the total value of £17,216 17s. Besides this, 800,000 Gospel tracts have been distributed from house to house. This makes a total during twenty-eight years of nearly twenty millions of Bibles, Testaments, books and magazines, and four millions of Scripture cards sold, of the total value of £309,248, and fourteen millions of Gospel tracts distributed free.

More than 2,000 villages are systematically visited every month by the colporteurs, with the farmhouses and scattered cottages lying between. A typical instance of blessing is that related by one of the workers, who, after selling a book to a young man, found that the buyer "had become converted through reading it; then he lent it to his brother, and it was the means of his conversion also. Since then another brother has been brought to the Lord through the life and testimony of these two.

An important feature of the work is its usefulness to domestic servants, a very large class whom it is extremely difficult to reach by any other means, and to whom the visits of the colporteurs with their packs have proved an untold blessing. Not a few, even young girls, profess to be infidels and read infidel literature, while betting and gambling are rife, especially in the wealthier houses. One of the colporteurs writes:—"I was greatly cheered today by meeting a servant girl to whom I had often spoken about her soul. She had been away for some time, but came here for a few days, and wanted to see me. She told me that 'Grace and Truth,' which she bought from me about six months ago, had been the means of her salvation. She now wanted to do something for others, and she bought four 'Marked' Testaments."

Many of the colporteurs have market stalls, by means of which much helpful literature is disseminated, while public-houses are regularly visited. An extract from a letter reads:—"In the village of ———— I called at a public-house and sold two Bibles to two of the landlord's daughters. A month later I called again, and sold them two 'Songs and Solos' and some text cards. I then asked them if they were saved. They both said 'No,' but one of them said she wanted to be; so I showed her from the Word of God how willing and ready God was to save her for Christ's sake, who had made atonement for our sins on the cross. After a time the light seemed to shine into her heart, and she said she would trust Christ."

Sir Robert Anderson, who presided, followed with an earnest appeal, in which he spoke of the spiritual darkness of the masses, and pointed out that to meet the needs of the times the colporteur is exactly the right man, for, while the vast majority of the people will not come to hear the Gospel, he takes the Gospel to the people. He is able to deliver his message effectively, for he is a converted man. After a spirited defence of the Bible against "the attacks of those ingenious and trifling idlers the critics, who spend their time in discussing the 'dress' of Christianity," and who fail to realize truth and common sense, the speaker dwelt on the vast field for Christian effort outside the regular work of the churches, and pointed out that in view of the obvious fruitfulness of the colportage work, it has strong claims upon the support of Christian people.

Other speakers were Rev. F. Trevelyan Snow, Commander P. Wolfe Murray, R.N., and Sir George Williams.

The Gospel in Bible Lands.

THE arduous task of evangelization in the Bible Lands, which is being carried on with an increasing measure of fruitfulness by various useful agencies, has necessarily an especial claim upon the sympathy of believers. The Bible Lands Missions Aid Society has for years done excellent work in furthering the Gospel cause in those deeply interesting countries, and the report of past years' operations, delivered by Rev. W. A. Essery, hon. sec., at the annual meeting at Exeter Hall on Friday last, gave rise to feelings of thankfulness for the advances which have been made.

In European Turkey and in Asia Minor the grants to missions were considerably increased. Aid is now given to the cluster of six or seven organized churches with native pastors, very much in the region of the apostolic "Seven Churches of Asia." In the Central Turkey Mission a grant is made, chiefly for evangelistic enterprise, in connection with the Marash Theological College for training a native ministry. Eastern Turkey and Persia have also been remembered. Syria and Palestine receive assistance, but chiefly the first-named land. Good tidings have been received from Egypt and Arabia. The outstanding feature is the widespread cry for more native pastors.

Spiritual awakening and progress has been recorded in several places. Dr. House writes from Salonica:—"God, in his providence, has ordered it so that the distress of the people seems to have turned their thoughts more than ever towards spiritual things, so that we have greatly rejoiced to find inquirers in unlikely places." From Dr. Tracy, of Marsovan, comes this message:—"The help which your Society gave us for an evangelist along the coast and inland has supported the most fruitful and promising work. One town and village after another is being awakened. I have never seen more lively apostolic work than we have among the Greeks in our field." Rev. H. K. Wingate describes a quickening in the school at Talas:—"It seemed to come spontaneously, and although our school work goes on as usual, the interest has grown steadily. The boys, of their own accord, keep up morning and evening prayer meetings. With but two exceptions, I think every boy in the boarding department has declared his intention to live an earnest Christian life."

The work of the Holy Spirit in Aintab, according to Dr. Fuller, may be spoken of as a widespread revival. "We have had great joy and hope in noting a steadily-growing religious interest in the Protestant community in Aintab. At the same time the remarkable interest among the young people of the Gregorian community has gone steadily forward, till, during the week of prayer, these distinct but mutually sympathetic movements have together attained an extent and power that fairly put the whole work among the most marked, widespread, and fruitful revivals that Aintab has ever enjoyed. The fruits have appeared in troubled inquirers, in broken hearts, penitent confessions, and the beaming faces, songs of praise, and altered lives of converted men and women. Thousands week after week assemble to hear the Gospel and for prayer. In Adana over a hundred young men have handed in their names to the pastor of the church, professing conversion and asking special instruction in the Christian life." In conclusion, Mr. Essery spoke with much satisfaction of the general and largely spontaneous efforts which are being put forth to render the native churches and schools self-supporting.

Speaking from the chair, Lord Kinnaird (treasurer) gave an earnest address in support of the work. Rev. Thomas Currie, of Clapham, who followed, said that the attitude of the Jewish people towards Palestine is one for earnest consideration, and should lead to the strengthening of Christian organizations, so that, in the event of Israel returning in numbers to their ancient land, they may be turned into the right path.

In a pithy address, the next speaker, Rev. J. W. Ewing, gave a vivid description of his recent visit to the Bible Lands, and told of the excellent work of, among others, the American Presbyterian Mission at Cairo, the Baptist Missions that centre in and around Nablous, the Presbyterian work at Damascus, the British Syrian Schools at Baalbec, and the American Presbyterian College at Beyrout—practically a Christian university which is influencing the whole of the East. The meeting concluded with a vigorous address from Rev. T. F. Touzeau, of Brixton, who dwelt upon the responsibilities of Christians for the evangelization of that part of the world in which the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ had its birth and won its first triumphs.

The National Refuges.

EXETER HALL presented a picturesque spectacle on Tuesday afternoon of last week at the annual festival of the National Refuges for Homeless and Destitute Children. The great platform was filled with young people from the various institutions; groups of little lassies in neat brown costumes, were in front of a phalanx of sturdy lads whose bright, intelligent appearance bore witness to the excellence of their training. The contingent of young sailors from the Society's ships, Arethusa and Chichester, and the strong band of the Shaftesbury Home with yellow-braided uniforms added a vivid dash of colour. The programme was lengthy, but the eager attention of an overflowing audience was easily held from beginning to end.

In telling words, Mr. H. Bristow Wallen set forth the aims and reviewed the operations of the Society. Five large homes for lads are maintained, in addition to the two training ships, and two for girls, besides emigration depôts in East London and South Wales. In all, over 900 young people are sheltered and educated. The boys in the shore institutions are trained in various useful trades, and the girls receive a thorough instruction in all that has to do with domestic service. That the young folk are admirably taught in their regular schooling is shown by the golden opinions recorded by government inspectors. The highest importance is attached to religious teaching. The spirit of the homes is, indeed, essentially evangelistic, and Mr. F. Roscoe, who has examined the children in Scripture knowledge, reports that in every institution the scholars showed "keen interest in the subjects, and a high degree of intelligence in their answers."

Words of encouragement followed from Rev. Canon Fleming, who said that the Society has done splendidly in the past, and that its future is rich with promise. Its friends may well sing "Now, thank we all our God." There are two things necessary to success in such work, reverence, and love for child life. Maintained as they are under wise direction, such institutions as the National Refuges bring blessing to the community at large, since formation is better than reformation. The prophet says that "a man shall be more precious than the golden wedge of Ophir," and every child trained for God is as a nugget of gold in a nation's treasure.

Mr. Frank T. Bullen, the next speaker, recalled the day when, between nine and eleven years old, he wandered the streets of London destitute. Proceeding, he spoke of the still-existing need for the rescue of street waifs and, in advocating the cause of the institution, said that he had sailed with lads from the Arethusa, and could bear hearty testimony to their excellent character.

A Children's Protestant Story.—Under the title of "By Me Kings Reign," Mr. W. Stanley Martin has written the story of the King's Coronation Oath. The narrative reveals the author's well-known aptitude for securing the attention of little folk in momentous questions, and stimulating their interest in lofty and noble principles. In view of the coming ceremony, the book will be welcomed by parents for placing in the hands of their children, from whom questions touching the Protestant succession are more than likely to come. Sunday-School Progress.

THE report of the Sunday School Union records with gratitude to God "that the first year of the new century has been one of the years of God's right hand, a time of encouragement, increased activity, expansion, and blessing." In connection with Lord Radstock's scheme for distributing Bibles in India, as a memorial of Queen Victoria, and for the furtherance of the Gospel, the part taken by the Union has resulted in the sending of 215 Bibles, 2,142 Testaments, and 90,380 Gospels, each signed as a personal gift from some one in this country to a fellow-subject in the East. The outstanding feature of the later months has been the inauguration of the National Mission for Sunday-scholars and other young people, which is now proceeding. Grateful recognition is made of the reception given, in almost every quarter, to the Mission, and the conviction expressed that such co-operation in the salvation of the young promotes that unity in the Spirit for which our Lord prayed, and impresses the world with the central truth which the Church exists to proclaim.

The annual gatherings last week extended from Monday evening to Thursday evening. Among other subjects under consideration were "Literature for the Young," introduced by Rev. Alexander Smellie (Carluke, N.B.); "Discipline," Mr. H. Beales (Manchester); "The Minor Duties of the Superintendent," Mr. Arthur Pye-Smith (Highgate); "School of Method," Mr. Deputy Cuthbertson; "The Secretarial Duties," Mr. Edgar R. Tanner (Bristol); "School Organization," Mr. A. W. Payne (Clapton); "Open Letters" (1) From a Minister to a Superintendent, Rev. W. B. Selbie; (2) From a Superintendent to a Minister, Mr. J. E. Balmer (Manchester); "Method in Teaching," Miss Edith Castell (Liverpool); "Reform in the Sunday School," Mr. Robert Whyte. The other speakers included Pastor Kaiser, Rev. J. H. Jowett (Birmingham), Mr. F. W. Warrington, Rev. R. Culley, Rev. J. E. Newell (Samoa), Mr. Albert Spicer, Mr. George White, M.P., Mr. T. G. Ackland, and Mr. Hope Morley.

A call for constructive teaching.

Among other facts mentioned by Mr. F. F. Belsey (president-elect for 1903)—at the public meeting held on Thursday evening in the City Temple—were the inauguration of an extension campaign in unoccupied districts under the care of Mr. James Rutherford, that the International Bible Reading Association has now enrolled nearly 800,000 members, that nineteen missionaries are at work on the Continent, and that the Indian Sunday School Union has under its care over 300,000 children.

In his address from the chair, Rev. F. B. Meyer spoke with enthusiasm of the marvellous success which had crowned the week's conference. The present time he believed to be the most difficult in the history of the Christian era in which to live and serve God; and he described the teachers who are going forward as solving the problem of the working classes, because they already have under their control the future generation. "You must bring Jesus Christ into contact with your boys and girls, and be yourself the embodiment of Him of whom you speak."

The necessity for more attention being given by the Church to the teaching of the young was driven home in strong terms by Mr. George Hay Morgan, who found the secret of successful work in this sphere in warm love of them, seeing that the children are to be our ideals, and not we theirs, in spiritual things.

An interval having been set apart for news of the progress of the National Mission, messages of a most encouraging character were received from many quarters.

A rousing address was given by Rev. C. Silvester Horne, who declared that the perennial expectation of "a good time" when Christ's claim upon the children and the children's claim on Christ are under consideration, is invariably fulfilled. "In the Sunday school the supreme efficiency is love. . . . I want the children to be identified with the church life."

Helpless and Orphaned.

NOT only to Methodists, but to a far wider community the noble work carried on at the Children's Home, Bonner Road, E., commends itself with increasing interest—an interest which was demonstrated afresh at Wesley's Chapel on Friday evening. The occasion was the annual meeting of the institution, and a large number of its friends and supporters gathered to express their continued concern for the welfare of the helpless, afflicted, and wronged little ones for whom the Home is a shelter.

The principal, Dr. A. E. Gregory, in the course of his annual statement, sounded a note of thanksgiving to God, prompted by the hearty support which has been accorded to the work during the thirty-third year of its history. From a financial standpoint the year has been one of progress, closing as it does with a balance in hand, the advance of income being £1,638.

INTEREST OF THE COLONIES.

In acknowledging the labours of the great army of voluntary workers, in this country and other lands, who have aided the cause of the orphans, particular mention was made of increase of donations collected in the colonies, especially in South Africa. A curious contribution from China was a number of pairs of stockings, knitted by Chinese children. One of the most important features of the year was the opening of Chadwick House at Alverstone for invalid children. "Our mission," continued Dr. Gregory, "is not only to those who need us, but those who need us most, and we propose to make provision in the new home for 100 children in the worst condition possible."

Among the cases being cared for, the speaker mentioned that of a boy of three years, who lost both legs in a street accident. Another patient, afflicted with a spinal disease, when first admitted was frequently heard to be swearing, but soon he began to learn of better things, and commenced a new childhood of innocence, though somewhat late. Another boy of thirteen is hopelessly lame, has lost one eye, and is losing the use of the other; while another child is deaf, dumb, blind, and paralyzed, the only means of communication being a kind of telegraphy arranged by the mother by touches upon the little one's cheek. A new home for invalids has been opened at Chadlington, and a receiving home for urgent cases will, it is hoped, be inaugurated in a short time. Due emphasis was given to the fact that the committee never counted creed, but need, as the one question to be considered in admitting a child.

CHARITY NO REFLECTION.

Speaking from the chair, Mr. J. Compton Rickett, M.P., referred to the obligations which Nonconformists, as a whole, owe to Methodism. The work of rescuing children was one which allowed of no controversy. Men and women who owed their training to a charitable institution carried about with them no taint. Charity is the love of God expressed through and by the love of man, and none need apologize for having felt the loving touch of the Church of Christ expressed through his servants in caring for the children, when it was not in their power to help themselves.

Dr. W. T. Davison followed with words of hearty commendation of the various branches of the institution. He contended that there was no more effective way to arrest the disintegration of society than by supporting agencies which cared for the helpless young. Referring to the catholicity of the work, he said it was a joy to find that it was supported by gifts from all parts of the world, and met the needs of children, from whatever land they might come. Addressing the children from the Home, the speaker reminded them that getting on in the world is not the only thing worth living for. The whole universe cannot make men happy. God has made man for Himself, and man's heart is restless until it finds rest in Him.

Dr. Brook (president of the United Methodist Free Church) expressed the pleasure it gave the members of his denomination to contribute towards the Home, and went on to speak of the great change in the attitude of the nation toward child-life which had been witnessed in the last century. In modern times men have been influenced more than ever by the Spirit of Jesus Christ, and led to see the charm of childhood. Such a revelation has been brought about through the spread of the teaching of Him who set a little child in the midst of men, declaring, "Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven." Addresses were also given by Rev. F. Cowle, Dr. Wenyon, and others.

Gray's Yard Ragged Church.

AFTER a history of sixty-seven years, the workers at Gray's Yard Ragged Church and School find no diminution in the need for their efforts. At the annual meeting held on the premises (23, Duke Street, Manchester Square, W.), on Wednesday of last week, Mr. Alister G. Fraser referred to the perplexing circumstances in which the work is at present placed. A full share of attention has all along been given to laying hold of tramps and others belonging to the casual class; and the use of a portion of the premises as a lodging-house—with sixty-four beds—made it possible to do so more effectively in many cases. This has suddenly been closed by order of the London County Council, because it was inadequately lighted, although the requirements as to cubic space were amply met. In the meantime the hold on the men is materially loosened, and no solution of the difficulty has as yet presented itself. Several very striking instances were mentioned of men who had been found in the lowest depths, and had begun a new life after visiting Gray's Yard. "We do not see much fruit," said Mr. Fraser; "we do not see many men converted to God here; but thank God we do see some changed, and we do not know what is going on in the men's hearts when they go away." Letters were read giving instances of true gratitude felt in after years for a friendly hand held out in the time of need.

On the question whether the poor were reached, it was mentioned that, on an average, over 1,000 persons go in and out in the course of Sunday; and that the word "ragged" is no misnomer as applied to those who come. Twice all comers to the "casuals" services are supplied with tea and bread, while the message of salvation is made known. The mothers' meeting has an attendance of about 110; and, in addition to other services indoors and in the open air, regular visitation is carried on by a city missionary and Bible-woman.

Every effort is made to lay hold on the rising generation, and many agencies are in operation for their benefit at every stage in their career. During the past year an important development has taken place in connection with the Girls' Club, which deals with a class whose condition is often sad indeed. One girl was in delirium tremens in the room recently; another said that the arrangements for Easter Monday kept her sober for the first Bank holiday she could remember. On Boxing Day a condition was made that no girl who entered after three o'clock must leave till after the public houses were closed at 12.30, that for that day at least they might not be able to get drink.

The entire cost of the work (including £125 for rent) is met by £400. Additional personal help is much required on Sunday at 11 a.m. and 3 p.m. in handing out the tea and bread, as well as in teaching the Sunday school classes. Another opening not filled up is the charge of the children's play hour on Friday evening.

Hearty testimony was borne by the chairman (Colonel Douglas Jones) to the pleasure and blessing experienced through being able to take some part in the work. An address full of encouragement and stimulus was given by Mr. Eugene Stock, warning against the motto, "faint yet pursuing." He showed that while it is better to pursue though you are faint, than to faint and not pursue, it is better not to faint. Two reasons for ever pursuing with hearts lifted up in the ways of the Lord were found in 2 Cor. iv. 1, 14-16.

Railwaymen Evangelists.

THE annual gathering of the Railway Mission is invariably one of the brightest of "May meetings," and this year's festival, held on Wednesday, April 30, vied with its predecessors in heartiness and that quick appreciation of the primary value of spiritual things which is so marked a characteristic of the Society's meetings. A report fraught with encouragement was submitted by Mr. R. Nixon. Ten new branches have been added during the year, including one at the important centre of York, where from tent meetings a flourishing mission has grown, one feature of which is a mess-room meeting attended by 500 men. Many branches of the Mission are now provided with suitable and commodious mission halls, in which the work is being developed and extended. A number of these have been placed in the Mission Trust Corporation, which has been formed and registered to hold property in trust for the purposes of the Railway Mission. The permanent use of the halls for the object for which they were originally erected is thus provided for, and over a thousand meetings are held each week.

WITNESSING IN WORKSHOPS.

The devotion of the men to the work of evangelization is shown by many items in the report. One meeting, for example, was conducted by seventeen converted engine-drivers, and another by thirteen converted clerks. A report from one centre says:—"We began by holding our Tuesday evening cottage meetings in one home, now we are obliged to have two, and, judging by the numbers last Tuesday, it will soon have to be three, as there were twenty-six squeezed into one room, and twenty in the room of the other house! Praise God, with the increased numbers has come increased power and liberty in prayer, and we have had many glorious answers. I mention the prayer meetings first, as these are the 'heating apparatus' of the whole thing. Another branch of the work which gives us much joy in its progress, is the Sunday morning Bible class. The lads, too, rejoice our hearts; we have a band of eighteen, from fourteen to eighteen years of age, and some of them saved from the depths; although so young several of them were constant visitors to public-houses, and were both gamblers and swearers. Now they are witnessing daily among their ungodly mates in the workshops."

The Convalescent Homes at St. Leonards and Southport continue to be a great blessing to the men, many of whom have been benefited spiritually as well as physically. The need for this branch will be more keenly realized when it is remembered that, on an average, no fewer than 15,000 men are injured each year.

INDIAN AND JAPANESE RAILWAYS.

Mr. Thomas Pollock, who is at work as railway missionary on the East Indian Railway, has been engaged during the year in visiting the various stations on that important system for the purpose of conducting services for the railway people, reports:—"The work has been the preaching of the Gospel, the establishing of regular meetings for prayer and Bible study, the advocating of temperance, and the helping of Christians in the Divine life. The attendance at these services has been most encouraging. The people are grateful for the opportunity of worship, and respond to the invitation in a way which is altogether cheering." The work in Japan, which is carried on among the railway people by Miss Gillett, who devotes her life to it as an honorary worker, and by our missionary, Mr. Akiyama, has borne rich fruit, and many conversions among the railway people have been recorded.

Mr. Gurney Sheppard followed with a breezy address, in which he reminded his hearers that the mission is celebrating its twenty-first birthday and, while pointing to various opportunities for advance and development, called for a larger measure of public support. A note of praise was sounded by Lord Kinnaird, who presided, and Archdeacon Madden and Pastor Charles Spurgeon gave addresses rich with spiritual stimulus. During the evening Miss E. H. Froste, of Dublin, sang Gospel solos with sweetness and power.

FLOWER-MAKERS IN LONDON.

I WISH I could have taken all Uncle Tom's "Searchers" with me the other evening to the Crippled Girls' Branch of the Watercress and Flower Girls' Mission in Clerkenwell, though I do not know how we should have all got in!

This useful mission was started in 1866, by Mr. John Groom, with the sympathy and help of the late good Lord Shaftesbury. The misery and hardship of these watercress and flower-sellers' lives (which thirty years ago was keener than it is to-day) forced itself upon Mr. Groom, and the kind thought that came into his heart grew into words and deeds, which have been growing ever since. What a deal of good one kind thought may do, if it is allowed to grow!

Well, the seed (which was a desire to help these girls and women) has now become a beautiful tree with many branches. One branch is an Orphan Home at Clacton-on-Sea; others are convalescent and holiday homes; another is a branch busy with cups of tea and coffee, and slices of bread and butter, which spreads its leaves near the flower markets—a pleasant one to be under in the early hours of the morning when you are all asleep. A very tiny branch is a Babies' Home at Clacton, where, amongst others, twin sisters of ten days old, left orphans, found shelter.

But the branch I want specially to tell you about is the Industrial Training Home for Cripples. Now this sounds as if it might be a very straight, plain branch, with little beauty about it. But that is far from the case, for on arriving at Sekforde Street, Clerkenwell, I was shown into a room ablaze with flowers of every description, and though the girls who were making the flowers were all cripples, as one could see at a glance, they looked so bright and happy, and were working so deftly, that one forgot all about their deformity, and thought what a bright, busy lot of girls they were.

Then, adjoining the workroom, are the houses where the girls live, or I should have said "homes," for the idea is to make them as much like home as possible. A matron is in charge of each house, and the girls are well cared for. Every one receives two years' training, after which she is able to earn her own living, and then boards with some Christian family, and comes daily to her work, in this way making room for new comers.

Every case is received on its own merits, and there are, oh so many, desirous of entering that Home. When once a girl has learnt the trade, she is allowed to keep for herself anything she can earn beyond 5s. (which goes towards her board and lodging); and you can imagine they try hard to get beyond that! Ah! but if you and I could see into the secret story of some of those girls' lives, we should realize something what such a Home means to them.

Let me tell you a little about E——, who is one of the most industrious flower-makers there. She was born and bred in a London slum, surrounded by crime and misery. From her earliest years she had been a cripple, and the disease spreading through her frail body at last necessitated the amputation of both her legs. Think what that would mean! the dreary existence day after day; the utter sense of helplessness; the constant association with things that were unlovely, and people who were unloving; the long nights full of pain and weariness; the waking in the morning hungry and cold, and the thought that this life must go on day after day. Do you wonder that she wished to die?

Sometimes a little brightness would come into her life; kind ladies brought her flowers and picture-books, and once one brought a bath-chair and took her out into the park, where she saw the most lovely flowers she had ever beheld. She could manage to get about a little on her crutches, but the children in the court were rough, and she was timid; and, oh dear, it made her so tired to toil up those stairs when she came home, so that she generally stayed indoors among the dirt and squalor.

A darker day came yet into her life. Her father and mother died, and, as E—— lay sobbing her heart out, there crept over her a great despair. Steps were heard coming up the rickety stairs. It might be the lady who had brought her the picture-books, and who had talked to her. What did she care about picture books now, when starvation was staring her in the face? But the steps came nearer, and a gentle arm was drawn round the sobbing figure, and little by little she realized that the lady was telling her they had found a Home to which they could send her, where she would learn to make as beautiful flowers as she had seen in the park.

She listened, but she was so stupefied by grief, and so wearied by suffering, that the news scarcely moved her. She might as well go there as anywhere, and it might be better than the workhouse! As to her making flowers, or doing anything beautiful, why it was simply beyond her comprehension, for people had always told her how helpless she was, and this idea had become part of her life.

Well, Mr. Groom took her in. The stuffy attic was exchanged for a bright bedroom; the atmosphere of coarseness and crime for one of love and gentleness, and she became less afraid to get about on her crutches. No one suggested to her that she was helpless and useless, but, instead of that, they gave her certain materials and instruments, and showed her how to use them. She found that other girls, who were more afflicted than she was, were getting quite clever. One sitting next to her, with only one hand, was even taking her share in the work.

E—— was very frail, and at first could do but little, as she often had to go and lie down and rest. But by degrees with good food and care she got stronger, and the happy, healthy surroundings brought new love and hope to her heart.

One day, what do you think happened? After much patient plodding, and many mistakes, she made her first rose! She laughs at it now, it was such a poor, clumsy thing, but it was her first attempt to make anything beautiful, and to think that she, deformed, miserable, had been able to do anything good was worth many bottles of medicine to her! But better than all this, Mr. Groom and his helpers taught her that if she would let the beautiful and perfect Rose of Sharon be her pattern, she might not only make good things with her fingers, but her own life might become good and beautiful, too. She listened, and learnt to love and follow Christ, so that she is now one of the brightest and happiest girls in the Home, and I think you would find it hard work, even with your two legs, to get about more quickly than she does on her crutches.

That is only one case of many hundreds that are passing through the Homes, all with a sad history behind them; and many more are waiting to enter whose lives are now full of shadow and misery. Will you see what you children can do to bring gladness and hope to these afflicted ones?

There is a chapel attached to the Homes, a Sunday-school, a C.E. Society, singing classes, and many other agencies for cheering the lives of the inmates. Entering such a haven of rest the girls learn how to live truly and in the fear of God. A new hope and a new strength becomes theirs. They feel they can earn a living for themselves and are no longer dependent upon others for support. Surely it is well to help others to help themselves, thereby developing strength of character, and in some measure lessening the sense of pain and misery.

Of course the money obtained from the sale of the flowers helps to keep the Homes up; but we must remember there is a large outlay required to train and feed the inmates until they can keep themselves, and many of them are often sick and ill and need tender care. I am sure if you write to Mr. John Groom (Sekforde Street, London, E.C.), he will give some more interesting particulars of his work, and tell you how you can help him.

Oh, what can little hands do
To help the King of Heaven?
The little hands some work may try
To help the poor in misery;
Such grace to mine be given!

Epiphany Stars.

(Copyright.)

Mysterious star of the King of the Jews,
Announcing to Gentiles his birth, heaven's news;
Fit emblem, because of "the True Light" it told,
"Which lights every man, coming into the world;"
It guided to worship Him Magi of old,
Be all men so led by his banner unfurled!

Those sons of the East, to Jerusalem come,
Not knowing the place of the Royal Babe's home,
Were helped by the heavenward wayfarers' chart,
God's sure "Word of Prophecy," lamp for this night,
That Jesus have homage, his due from each heart,
Let none lack that guiding star, Scripture, man's right!

Rouse, favoured ones; "light of the world," hear your Lord;
"A lamp lit is set to give light," was his word.
No Christian but, star-like, must let his light shine—
At home manifesting, or telling afar
To people in darkness the tidings Divine,
Our "light of life" Gospel. Become such a star!

The Living Bread (John vi. 22-35, 48-58).

ONE chief object in taking food is to repair waste. The body is a building of many bricks, which are always crumbling away, and must be replaced as fast as they are pulled down. Life cells must take the place of death cells. Food is turned into blood, and blood puts in fresh bricks to repair the loss of the others, of the exact material and size which are required. However fast our frame is worn down, it is renewed, and the renewal is done by the blood, which not only manufactures the material out of the food we take, but carries it to the very spot where it is needed.

So in our souls a wearing down capacity is always on foot, and hence we need to go to Jesus and feed on Him, so that He may be built into our inner life, and become the new strength for every fresh demand. You cannot be doing much work for God, and you cannot meet the power of temptation, unless you are constantly reinforced from the fulness which is in Christ Jesus. The camel in the desert may live on the hump of its own fat, but we have to worship Christ, to think of God, to open the soul to the blessed Spirit, that these may become the nutriment of our heart,

Another object of food is to generate heat. The nitrogen food repairs our waste, the carbon supplies fuel. Children crave sweets, and in the Arctic regions the Esquimaux eat blubber; each of these keeps up the normal temperature of the blood at ninety-eight degrees. What warmth is to the body, comfort and peace are to the soul. For these we must go to the Lord Jesus, whose flesh is meat indeed. We need to have the passion of love burning always within us that the temperature of the soul may not deteriorate to the arctic winter around. Feed on the love of Christ; meditate on his humility, gentleness and patience; consider Christ. Ask Him to create in you a spirit of love by infilling you with his own love, then the fire on the altar will never go out.

Food must be assimilated. Grass becomes milk. Milk reinforces the blood, and blood will make brain, nerve tissue, muscle, and all the variety for which our different organs call. But the assimilation of food is absolutely necessary. It is useless to receive food into our nature if the power of assimilation is not healthy. And it is of no use to hear of Christ, to read his words, or to hear the glowing tributes to Him of his followers and friends. We must digest for ourselves. We must not always live in a hurry, but give time for the assimilation of the blessed Lord. Assimilate his death, and you will become a sacrifice. Assimilate his resurrection, and you will rise into the things of eternity. Assimilate his forgiveness, his peace, his patience, and his prayerfulness, and each of these will reappear in yourself. You cannot get rid of sin by merely resisting it. That at the best is but the fence to keep the goats from browsing on the tender green. You must do more; you must nurture the growth of the Christ spirit, the Christ love, the Christ patience, and the Christ prayerfulness.

It is remarkable how greatly we are influenced by that which we assimilate. Take our own red linnet, feed it on hemp seed, and the beautiful pink-coloured breast disappears; feed it on canary and rape seed and the rich colours reappear. And so if we feed amiss, if we allow any light literature, or even thin devotional books, to take the place of the Bible, our whole character is apt to degenerate. Nothing so soon shows the effect of these dire mistakes in food, as our inability to assimilate the Bread of God. Just as the assimilation of oatmeal, wholemeal bread, and such like foods, build up the strength of brain, muscle, and body, so does the resolute and constant feeding upon Christ build up the full glory of noble manhood and womanhood.

It is not at all certain that our Lord was referring to the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper in these words, but as often as we partake of the bread and wine we are reminded of the deep and profound lessons of this chapter. It is not enough to feed on the outward; our heart must be replenished; and it is quite possible for those who are deprived of the joy of sitting with their fellow Christians at the Lord's table, so to eat and drink of the living Christ that all may bear witness to the symmetry and strength of their character.

Bishop Miraglia.—Writing from Chiasso (Canton Ticino, Switzerland), Miss H. Eardley Ward gives an interesting account of one of the services being conducted by Bishop Miraglia. The saloon of the hotel was crowded, almost entirely with men, "perhaps one-half of them atheists or freethinkers." It is regretted by many that he still uses "the Missal and other books of the Roman Liturgy," though he proves from them to the people that such practice as auricular confession is not taught even there. Some men were overheard next day saying that if their priests preached like Miraglia, they would believe in God.

The Early Christian Missionaries (Acts xiii. 1-12).

Golden Text: Matt. xxviii. 19.

THE first two labourers in the world's great mission-field—Saul and Barnabas—stepped forth from Antioch in Syria, and the first missionary tour lay by way of Cyprus (the home of Barnabas) to the shores of Asia Minor, and so on to Antioch in Pisidia, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe. Then, back again they came by the same route (omitting Cyprus) to Antioch in Syria, which thenceforth became the headquarters of organised effort for the spread of the Gospel throughout the world. The period covered by this first missionary journey was about a year and a half, from A.D. 47 to end of A.D. 48.

A Genuine Consecration Meeting is described in verse 2. Practical in results. Hearts quiet enough to hear the voice of God, and ready to obey his command "at any cost." Some to go forth as labourers, and some to stay at home as helpers, by prayer and offering; while the willingness of the Church to give up two of her most valued teachers, with the solemn dedicatory service at their send-off, was a pattern to other churches for all time.

WHO CHOSE THE MISSIONARIES?

WHO CHOSE THEIR FIELD OF LABOUR?

Not the Church. Not their friends. Not themselves. But God the Holy Ghost. "Separate Me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them" (v. 2). Then, when they had been duly consecrated by prayer, fasting, and the laying on of hands, they were "sent forth by the Holy Ghost" (v. 4), and their every step watched and guided; for we read later on "they assayed to go unto" a certain place, "but the Spirit suffered them not"—"forbidden of the Holy Ghost to preach the Word in Asia" (Acts xvi. 6, 7).

Their success under such a leadership was assured. The work was the Lord's, not the Apostles', save as it and they were his. They, also, were willing to be guided, as we note in Paul's grand acknowledgment of God's gracious direction in 1 Thess. iii. 11.

NO ONE HAS A RIGHT TO GO AS A MISSIONARY UNLESS HE OR SHE IS CALLED OF GOD TO THE WORK.

No man can appoint himself ambassador for his king. The king calls him, appoints him, invests him with his own power, directs him where to go and what to do, protects him (officially), is responsible for his expenses, and rewards him for faithful service.

We are ambassadors for Christ, "called to be an Apostle" (1 Cor. i. 1), "not of men" (Gal. i. 1; 2 Cor. v. 20; Eph. vi. 20), or teacher.

Missionary Experiences.

1. Opposition.—Always, and ever will be; wherever the good seed is sown, the enemy will be sure to sow tares. "In every city bonds and affliction await me," was the witness of the Holy Ghost to Paul, but he was not disturbed (Acts xx. 23). Opposition never stops the work of God, any more than pails of water put out the fire described in "Pilgrim's Progress," because, as there was a stream of oil coming from behind to feed the fire, so the power of God is always behind his own work to supply needed grace.

2. Success.—By the blinding of Elymas, the proconsul saw the power of God. When Saul was blinded he saw Jesus. Elymas' blindness only lasted "for a season." Did he ever see Jesus? Ask, "Do I see Jesus, by faith as my Saviour?" If so, He calls me to witness for Him, and He will give me his Holy Spirit's power for his work. The Word of God must prevail.

Personalia.

Herr Inspektor Stursberg, of the Neukirchen Mission Institute, Rhenish Prussia, is starting this week for British East Africa, to visit mission stations. The Neukirchen Mission carries on a deeply interesting work among the tribes on the Tana river. Herr Stursberg knows the field from previous inspection, and his impending visit is the subject of prayerful anticipation on the part of the workers and their friends in the Fatherland.

Mr. B. W. Ranken, Secretary of the South American Evangelical Mission, is at present in London, seeking opportunities of addressing public or private meetings in the interests of missionary work in South America. The S.A.E.M. carries on work in Argentina and Brazil, with headquarters in Liverpool. The efforts put forth at home during the past five years have been used of God to draw into the ministry of intercession some ninety prayer circles, the members of which meet regularly to pray for the manifestation of the power of God among the forty millions of South American peoples. Mr. Ranken's address while in London is 7, Bruce Grove, Tottenham, N

Scriptures for India.

NOTWITHSTANDING the hearty response already received to the appeal for Bibles, New Testaments, or Gospels to be given to our fellow-subjects in India, who have learned to read, but do not possess copies of the Word of God, only a small portion of the field has been touched. The following letter from Lord Radstock explains the present position of the movement:—

"Since I wrote, I have been receiving a steady stream of requests for Scriptures, from different parts of India, from missionaries. By last mail, I have got a letter from a committee of missionaries in Bombay, saying they have applications for about 400 Bibles and 1,100 Testaments and 2,500 Gospels. To all of these I have to return the sad answer that all our copies are allotted. It does seem, not only sad, but solemn that, with all the wealth of England, there should be about 3,000,000 children and about 25,000,000 adults who can read, and who should be left without a copy of even a Gospel. The Scriptures hitherto given are about 2,500 Bibles, 15,000 New Testaments, 120,000 Gospels."

Readers will remember that special English Bibles and Testaments have been prepared, in attractive bindings, as memorials of Queen Victoria. To facilitate the carrying out of the scheme, special labels for the volumes may be obtained through Messrs. Morgan & Scott (12, Paternoster Buildings, E.C.), on sending remittance—for each Bible 5s., New Testament 1s., Gospel 2d. Donors may inscribe their names and addresses, leaving blank space for those of the receivers to be added by the missionaries. When the labels are returned, the books will be forwarded to India.

The Factory Helpers' Union.

TWO NEEDS.

"YES, I should like to help, but I could not do any definite work, or take a responsible post, I have had so little experience, and feel I need training."

This is the kind of answer workers among factory and working girls often get when they ask for help in carrying on their work.

Again, anyone who has lived and laboured among our toiling sisters in large towns, can tell of a sometimes inarticulate but very real cry, "Come and help us, we need it."

Under the bold exterior and noise, and often joyless laughter, is a longing which ever and again makes itself felt to be better and purer.

With bright exceptions, friends of their own calibre cannot help, and it remains for her who has been brought up in a refined atmosphere, who has a real love for girls, and a devotion to our Lord Jesus Christ to come to the rescue. To meet these two needs the Factory Helpers' Union is opening a Training Home, where gentlewomen can be trained to work in girls' clubs and missions. While in training ladies will assist in an established club, where very interesting work is going on.

All information can be had on application to the Secretary, Factory Helpers' Union, 26, George Street, Hanover Square, London, W.

The Coronation Service in Westminster Abbey.—Mr. Henry Frowde has issued, from the Oxford University Press, The Form and Order of Service and Ceremonies to be Observed in the Coronation of King Edward VII. and Queen Alexandra, in Westminster Abbey on June 26. It is beautifully printed. (Buckram, 2s. 6d.; paper, 6d. net.)

"Willing Hands Society."—This Society has been formed to give an opportunity for helping to those who are desirous of doing something towards sending out the Gospel to China. It helps towards the support of two missionaries in China, one in connection with the Church Missionary Society (Rev. A. Hickman), and the other in connection with the China Inland Mission (Miss E. Drake). This little Society gives an opportunity to many young ladies who are unable to go out themselves to the mission field, but can aid in the spread of the Gospel by their "Willing Hands." Mrs. Mayne Wade, St. Thomas' Vicarage, Trowbridge, and Miss Polhill-Turner, 37, Brunswick Place, Brighton, co-secretaries, would be glad to receive the names of those who feel led to join this Society.

Obituary.

MISS EDWARDS (SISTER MARY).

THERE is mourning in many homes in Sheffield on account of the death of Sister Mary, who was for some time connected with the West London Mission, but six or seven years ago went to commence settlement work in the Woodside Lane district. She has lived amongst the poor, and been a real sister to hundreds of people. She laboured alone for one year, and then, in consequence of the success of her work, and the great need of the district, she was joined by Sister Agnes, of London. As a highly-trained nurse, her work amongst the sick poor was invaluable. By charming ways and winning disposition she won for herself a place in the hearts of the people that is given to few, and the keenest sorrow is felt in the homes where she was known and loved. Her illness had been long and painful; for months she had been laid aside from her work, and she herself welcomed the prospect of release.

MR. JOHN BELLOWS, GLOUCESTER.

The death occurred, on Monday morning, of Mr. John Bellows, one of the most prominent and respected of Gloucester citizens. Since returning from a visit to America last summer, Mr. Bellows has been in failing health. He was born at Liskeard, Cornwall, in 1831. After beginning his apprenticeship there, and completing it with a London printer, he went to Gloucester nearly fifty years ago to work for a local printer. He soon set up in business for himself, and gradually formed the great printing works associated with his name in the Eastgate. Mr. Bellows had a world-wide reputation as a printer. One of the most remarkable of his productions was the well-known pocket French Dictionary. This took him several years to compile. Numberless students and travellers have had cause to be grateful to him for his labours. Mr. Bellows was an elder of the Society of Friends; a kind and considerate employer; an authority on certain antiquarian subjects. For his labours he had conferred upon him the degree of M.A. honoris causa by Harvard University. As a philanthropist Mr. Bellows was more widely known. He was one of those selected to dispense the fund raised by the Society of Friends for the relief of the starving in Paris at the time of the Franco-German war. He was also a commissioner to distribute relief to persecuted Armenians, and he assisted in the emigration of the Dukhobors from Russia.

The Churches.

* The Editor will be glad to receive "post-card" notes for this page, of* SPIRITUAL PROGRESS AND EFFORT in the Churches. They must be prompt, reliable, and NOT TRIVIALITIES; and be accompanied by sender's name and address.

Church of England.

Rev. H. P. Kelly, vicar of Christ Church, Hoxton, has announced his intention of resigning his benefice on the ground of his advancing years.

Much regret will be felt at the impending resignation, through long-continued ill-health, of Rev. W. T. M'Cormick, vicar of St. Matthew's, Brighton. Mr. M'Cormick went to Brighton twenty-one years ago, and has done excellent work on strictly evangelical lines.

Rev. F. D. Stammers, of St. Luke's, Walthamstow, E., is in charge of a district containing a population of nearly 10,000 people, mostly toilers in London, with only a room seating about 150, and crowded out as a centre in which to carry on the work. Mr. Stammers has been able to erect a church room, and is now pushing on with the church proper, which is to seat about 700. The effort has the warm sympathy of evangelical leaders.

Rev. B. J. Moffat, vicar of Friston with Snape, Suffolk, maintains an evangelical work, in spite of much difficulty, in the two parishes. In addition to other services an evangelistic meeting is held on Lord's Day evenings, and is largely attended. Mr. Moffat is aiming to erect a mission room and bungalow, the sites for which are secured. "Our hands," he writes, "will then be more free, and we shall go forward in the good cause with renewed courage, that Christ may be magnified."

The annual meetings of the South Midland Protestant Union were held on April 29, in connection with Holy Trinity Church, Tewkesbury. The subjects of speeches and papers included—"Transubstantiation, and what it leads to," "The Jesuits," and "Diocesan Funds." In addition to Revs. E. H. F. Cosens, vicar (hon. sec.), and D. G. Douglas, curate, Revs. T. Houghton (Bath), E. Brewer (Oldhill), T. Davis (Harborne), G. N. H. Tredennick (Sparkbrook), General Morton, and other friends, took part. Rev. A. J. Begbie gave a few modern testimonies, chiefly Roman Catholic, about Jesuits and their influence. There are now, he said, sixty communities of Jesuits in the United Kingdom, and we must endeavour to meet the plague by a more systematic circulation of Gospel truth. Mr. Cosens had prepared the way by a sermon on "Contending earnestly for the Faith," and Rev. John Kaye, of Lincoln, had dealt with the introduction of "whispered confession to a priest," showing that it has no support from the Holy Scriptures, the Thirty-nine Articles, or primitive custom. The meetings were of an instructive and encouraging character.

Congregational.

At High Street Church, Deptford, recently, the 240th anniversary of the foundation of the church, the fortieth of the present building, and the twenty-seventh of the pastorate of Rev. S. Sabine Read, were celebrated. Mr. Read is the tenth minister in the 240 years since the church was founded.

A new hall, which is to be the headquarters of a Mission movement, under the lead of Rev. Stanley Rogers, was opened last week in the North End of Liverpool. Among those who took part in the ceremony were Revs. Dr. Horton and Dr. Guinness Rogers, Colonel Pilkington, and Sir Edward Russell.

Baptist.

Rev. Charles Williams has consented to devote twelve months' service to assist in raising the income of the Baptist Missionary Society, by a visitation of the churches.

Methodist.

Rev. R. W. Burnett, General Missionary Secretary of the Primitive Methodist body, has been ordered by medical advisers to relinquish all work at once. Mr. Burnett has served four terms as a missionary on the West Coast of Africa, and it is stated that his disease is the result of his African labours. At the Quarterly Missionary Committee meeting held in Leeds, his resignation was received with deep sorrow, and a vote of condolence was accorded him.

Presbyterian.

Miss Meredith Brown gave a very instructive lecture in the church hall of St. Columba's Church, Cambridge, recently, on her work in the West End slums and in thieves' kitchens. A number of excellent lantern slides deepened the vivid impression given by the lecturer's earnest words.

During the last few years the cause at West Hartlepool has grown in many directions. First there was the manse so generously given by Lady Grey, then the new hall at Sandringham Road (where a good work is being done), and now an extensive scheme of improvement and enlargement at the church in Park Road is approaching completion.

At a recent communion service at East Ham (being the first after the settlement of Rev. T. G. Murray, some six weeks since) forty-two names were added to the church roll, bringing the membership up to 120. The services are being attended by increasingly large congregations considerable difficulty is being experienced in finding seating accommodation, and the new church is urgently wanted. A Christian Endeavour Society has been formed, and all the various organizations of the church are in vigorous working order. The Sabbath school is steadily growing, and much useful work is being accomplished.

The new Presbyterian church at South Shields, worshipping in the Stanhope Road Board Schools, is evidently going to flourish. They have begun with a roll of 188 members, 166 of whom took communion on Sunday evening last. They have also a very promising Sunday school, with a membership of 170 scholars and sixteen teachers. The attendance at the services has been very gratifying and the financial outlook is hopeful. The congregation are very anxious to set about the building of a hall, &c., and have decided to ask the Synod at its meeting to give the Newcastle Presbytery its sanction to raise it to a fully ordained charge whenever they deem it expedient.

Society of Friends.

Steps are being taken to re-establish the Meeting at Watford, Herts, where for over a century the work has been in abeyance. Watford is now the largest town in Hertfordshire.

By invitation of the warden and residents of Chalfont House, between thirty and forty Friends gathered recently at 20, Queen's Square, W.C., to hear a lecture by Theodore Neild, B.A., on "The Effect of Alcohol on the Mental Powers." Frank Dymond took the chair, and the company listened with close attention to this excellent lecture, following which there was a lively discussion, several M.D.'s and others taking part.

By invitation of Croydon Preparative Meeting, William Littleboy attended a series of special meetings from the 19th to the 22nd ult. inclusive. The object of the meetings was to help the spiritual life of the members and attenders. On the 21st and 22nd, mid-day Bible readings were held, and also evening meetings, at which our Friend spoke impressively on "The Promise of the Spirit," and on "Faith." The meetings were felt to be extremely helpful by the fifty or sixty Friends who attended them.

Salvation Army.

Mrs. Bramwell Booth has offered to find situations for any of the Glasgow barmaids who may be thrown out of employment by the recent decision of the Glasgow licensing authorities.

Despite much persecution, the Army's newly-established work in Cork, Waterford, and Bray is making considerable progress. A recent convert was drawn to the Army through witnessing the stoning of the officers by the mob.

Drunkards' Friends Brigades have now been established in most of the leading provincial cities. The leader in Glasgow is a Salvationist who, in his unregenerate days, endeavoured to pawn his wooden leg to obtain drink.

Victoria House, Thundersley, Essex, is the Salvation Army's home for male inebriates. A booklet, which has been issued by the Army, states that "the house, an old mansion, has been thoroughly renovated, and provides pleasant and comfortable accommodation for twenty-five male patients. The officers have been carefully selected, and are only concerned to secure good results in saving those who are desirous of reformation and cure. The object of Victoria House is to blend that authority with the higher and moral suasion upon which we rely for success in the treatment of those entering the Retreat." Address Colonel Lamb, as above.

The annual report of St. Winifred's Institute and Mission, Rotherhithe—an evangelical and unsectarian work founded in 1888 by Mr. H. F. Morris—has just been issued. During the past year many young people have professed conversion, and the congregations have increased. An effort is being made to liquidate a debt of £63, and to reduce a mortgage of £500.

The National British Women's Temperance Association has sent a petition to the Lord Mayor of London on behalf of its membership of 100,000 women, urging that, in view of the untold evils arising from the drinking habits of the nation, all intoxicants may be banished from the banquet which His Majesty the King proposes to give to the poor at the time of his Coronation.

The evangelistic mission carried on at Shakespeare Street, Nottingham, for the past twelve months has been removed to Oxford Chambers, Heathcote Steeet, in the same city. The work continues to grow, the membership has increased during the year, and upwards of 100 have professed conversion. Pastor S. Aston Fox has laboured devotedly, conducting, on an average, eight services every week. It is intended to establish a permanent work if needed support be forthcoming.

Ford's Park Road Mission, Canning Town, E., is a vigorous cause which was commenced in a couple of parlours in a private dwelling-house. The work grew, and the accommodation proved far too small. Providentially, a suitable hall in the immediate vicinity became available and has been secured, the opening services being highly encouraging, and the new building filled. Some necessary expense has been incurred, towards which the members, who are mostly poor working people, have liberally contributed. A deficit, however, remains to be liquidated. The hon. superintendent is Mr. Alex. Smith, 79, Morgan Street, Canning Town, E.

The Herbert Street Baptist Mission, Nottingham—in future to be known as the East Nottingham Baptist Mission, under the pastorship of Mr. W. A. Coombs—has decided to go forward with the scheme for the erection of its new place of worship, to be called the Temple, situated in Robin Hood's Chase. The friends are seeking to raise £2,000 within the next two months, and as soon as £1,000 has been secured the building will be commenced. The resolution passed by the Church affirms that the edifice shall not be opened till free from debt. The annual report of this, the twenty-first year of this Mission, indicates that the cause accomplishes much good work.

The Murphy Memorial Hall, New Kent Road, was opened on Saturday afternoon last by Miss M. Morley. The building, which has been erected at the cost of £7,000, is estimated to seat 1,000 persons. It will be used in conjunction with a smaller hall adjoining to carry on the combined work of the late Rev. C. M. Murphy, as represented by the Borough Road Congregational Church and the Lambeth Baths winter meetings. At the opening ceremony Pastor G. Fuller briefly referred to the noble work which had been done in the district by Mr. C. M. Murphy. Miss Morley said she was pleased to identify herself with the work in which her father, Mr. Samuel Morley, took such a deep interest. She hoped that her opening of the door would be symbolical—that the place would always prove an open door to all that was highest and best. A dedication service followed, the hall being crowded.

Fallen Asleep.

Rev. T. H. GRUBB, of Tenby, has passed away suddenly from an attack of paralysis. He was a faithful worker, both as pastor and evangelist.—Mr. SAMUEL FOTHERGILL, of Darlington, a member of the Society of Friends. From comparatively early days he took a keen interest in social and moral questions, working for some time in connection with the United Kingdom Alliance. Subsequently he was associated with Mrs. Josephine Butler in her efforts for the repeal of the C.D. Acts. He held strong views against tobacco-smoking, and was a vigorous supporter of Peace principles. By pen and voice he advocated strenuously all movements that made for righteousness.—Mr. ROBERT NUTTALL, who for more than a quarter of a century had been a member of Kensington Congregational Church, and, in old days, was a member at Westminster, under Rev. Samuel Martin. Mr. Nuttall was for years a most acceptable lay preacher in the North and West of London.—The Penrith Presbyterian congregation has suffered a severe loss in the death of Mr. WILLIAM GLOVER, one of its elders.—Rev. T. RANGER LAWRENCE, mission chaplain, of Alexandria, at one time (1883-88) vicar of St. Stephen's, Bow, and prior to that curate at St. Mary's, Whitechapel. He was an enthusiastic worker in endeavouring to win the young for Christ, and took a brotherly interest in the welfare of young men.

Evangelistic.

Missions to Young People.

East Grinstead.

UNDER the auspices of the National Mission to Children and Young People, Mr. P. Russell Hurditch has conducted a mission at East Grinstead, in the Wesleyan and Countess of Huntingdon Chapels, the ministers uniting heartily in the effort. As the mission went on the numbers grew and the interest increased; on the last Sunday afternoon the chapel was filled with children and young people. Many have been won for Jesus, to the joy of their parents and teachers, and every department of the work in these two churches has been wonderfully helped and stimulated. Following the meetings for children, adult services were held, and the presence and power of God were realized. The closing meeting was held at the Queen's Hall, which was filled, many walking several miles to attend. After the missioner had delivered his message the workers were busy dealing with the anxious.

Redhill.

In connection with the National Mission to Young People, Mr. R. S. Bradbrook has conducted a ten days' mission in the Wesleyan Church, Redhill, April 12-22. The mission was organised by the Sunday schools connected with the Free Churches in the town, and the Wesleyan Church was kindly placed at the disposal of the committee.

A large number of the scholars were led to trust in the Lord Jesus Christ as their Saviour. Each evening at 6.30 a large number of boys and girls met together, and at 8 Mr. Bradbrook addressed meetings for adults. The addresses of the evangelist have resulted in much encouragement. The religious life of the young people and church workers has been quickened and strengthened.

Miss Glover at Linlithgow.

A fortnight's special mission, conducted by Miss Glover, Edinburgh, was brought to a close last week, in connection with the Congregational E.U. Church, with encouraging results. Miss Glover brought to her work a faculty of Gospel exposition and a power of pathetic appeal. Many were brought under deep conviction of sin, and led to Jesus as their Saviour. A supplementary mission was held this week in the neighbouring district of Kingscavil, to which many of the Linlithgow friends continued to flock, and a further ingathering of souls was the gratifying result. We believe that by the Divine blessing the "fruit will remain." J. Cameron, Pastor.

Rev. F. C. Spurr at Derby.

Rev. F. C. Spurr has concluded a nine-days' mission at the Osmaston Road Baptist Church, Derby. The Sunday congregations were very large, and the attendance throughout the week was good. Most of the Free Church ministers of the town attended the afternoon Bible lectures on "The Science and Mystery of Prayer," and expressed the highest appreciation of these helpful discussions of Christian doctrine. The week-night mission services deepened in interest to the close. Many were led to confess Christ during the mission, but that was only the beginning of the harvest to be reaped from such faithful sowing of the good seed. The whole church has been blessed, and Mr. Spurr's visit will be remembered with gratitude for years to come. S. H. James, Pastor.

Mr. Charrington's Work.

Another month's mission of a most helpful character has just been concluded in the Great Assembly Hall, Mile End, E. The evangelist was Mr. Henry Collins, of the Evangelization Society. Not only did he preach with power the Gospel of the grace of God, under which many were brought to a decision for Christ, but his addresses to unbelievers were most helpful and stimulating. The workers in the after meetings found plenty to do, and many were the interesting cases of those who professed to give themselves to the Lord. One evening a gentleman wandered in at the close of the service. Mr. Charrington approached him and asked "if he was on the Lord's side?" "No," he replied, "I have not attended a place of worship since 'the day I don't know when.'" After some conversation it was found that drink had been his curse. He signed the pledge, and has since attended the hall nightly. He volunteered the other night the fact that it was years since he could say he went home for three consecutive nights sober. Several backsliders have been restored, and the whole work of the month has been one of great encouragement. Mr. Collins' closing address, "A Disciple of Jesus, but Secretly," was a very solemn appeal to Christians to testify for Christ.

The Boy Preacher.

The mission conducted by Mr. Jack Cooke at Westbourne Grove Baptist Church concluded on Friday evening last with a meeting of a highly encouraging character. The body of the building, reserved for converts, was comfortably filled, while the general public crowded the galleries. Mr. Cooke's address was specially directed to believers. He also spoke words of wise counsel at a gathering for converts only, advising them immediately to take up active work as church members.

Mr. Cooke began a mission at the Great Assembly Hall, Mile End Road, E., on Lord's Day last, when there were renewed signs of interest, the meetings conducted in the same hall a short time ago by the young preacher being fresh in the memory of many. The attendances were very large.

Congregational Church, Dumbarton.

We have just been favoured with a visit from Mr. Chas. E. Barraclough. There were anxious inquiries in almost all the after meetings. There were some cases of exceptional interest. One bright and intelligent young man was convicted the first night he came to the meetings. He left rejoicing in Christ his Saviour. A young woman, whose mind had been poisoned by reading infidel literature, and who had become almost a Freethinker, was shaken in her unbelief. After careful reasoning, she renounced her scepticism, and accepted Christ as her Saviour. No undue pressure was brought to bear on anyone. The truth was allowed to take its natural course. So far as results can be judged, the mission has been the most fruitful I have had in the church, and I feel certain that the impressions made will be lasting.

J. Wilson Crawford, Minister.

Missions in Lanarkshire.

For a number of weeks since his great mission in Paisley, Rev. John McNeill has been holding forth the Word of Life in different towns in Lanarkshire. Hamilton, Bellshill, Wishaw, and Lanark have all been visited, and presently he is conducting meetings nightly in Rutherglen. Every place he has gone large crowds have been drawn under the spell of the preacher, and though Mr. McNeill does not "draw the net" in the sense of having after-meetings for personal dealing, the Word as preached by him cannot fail of result.

At Bothwell Park, a mining village situated midway between Bellshill and Uddingston, a fruitful mission has been conducted in the United Free Church, under the auspices of the Simultaneous Mission, by Mr. James Marshall, one of the assembly agents. The influence of the mission was felt in the mines, some of the men being led into the light while down the pit. Many entered the inquiry room, and some notable conversions are recorded. J. C.

Mr. J. J. Sims at Limerick.

The mission lately conducted by Mr. J. J. Sims at Limerick, at the request of the Y.M.C.A., brought blessing to many. The opening meetings in the Munster Hall were well attended, but, in order to reach a larger number of people, the work was transferred to the Theatre Royal. The first limelight service at the theatre attracted a very large audience, many being unable to gain admission to the capacious building. The service was listened to with earnest attention. The pictures thrown upon the screen were both effective and striking, and, with the address, exercised a deep spiritual influence. Interest in the mission was heartily sustained, with the result that the building was taken for farewell services, April 24-27, the mission thus continuing for three weeks, an unusual length of time for Limerick to command audiences which ranged from 700 to 1,000 nightly. Many Roman Catholics attended the services, led perhaps by the new way of illustrating Bible truths. Hearts were touched, and sinners led to the Saviour.

At the conclusion of the mission, Mr. Sims proceeded to Kilmallock for a few days' rest, but was pressed, while there, to give limelight services, which he did to full audiences, the people appearing deeply interested. Other requests from the same district followed, and quite a round of bright meetings ensued.

At Mr. Tennyson Smith's recent mission at Bagilt 356 new temperance pledges were taken.

Mr. Josiah Nix has just closed his winter campaign, which has been a busy and fruitful one, and is starting his special work among the Scotch fishermen this week.

Rev. J. Pandy Williams, of Derby, has just concluded a seven days' mission at Hope Church, Merthyr Tydfil, under the auspices of the local Free Church Council. The "Bible Hours," held in the afternoons, were most helpful and inspiring, while the addresses at the evening services were full of fervour and spiritual power. The children's service was highly appreciated.

The ten days' mission conducted by Rev. J. Tollfree Parr in Rye Bank Chapel, Sheffield, has been greatly blessed of God in quickening the Church and in bringing many of the unconverted to decide for Christ. No fewer than 125 found their way to the inquiry-room, nearly all being connected with the Sunday school and congregation. Each day the mission grew in power and influence in the church and in the neighbourhood. On the last Saturday night Mr. Parr delivered a lecture on "The Down Line," and on the Monday night he spoke on "Eight Years in Darkest London, or the Lights and Shadows of a Great City." R. H. Booth, Secretary.

The recent six-days' special mission held at the Congregational Chapel, Theale, Berks, by Miss Haddon and Mr. Peacefull has been productive of much good. The earnest endeavour of the missioners to win souls for the kingdom has been crowned with blessing. Some of the unconverted decided for Christ, and Christians, attending both at the above place of worship and the Primitive Methodist Chapel, have been stimulated and helped in the glorious work of rescuing the perishing. A weekly meeting is being held for the encouragement and help of the new converts. "To God be the glory; great things He hath done!" Y.

Mr. William Hill, evangelist, has just concluded a fifteen days' mission in the Seamen's Bethel, Eaglesham Street, Glasgow. The workers mustered well night by night for the open-air meeting. The inside gatherings, which were fairly well attended during the first week, increased during the second week both in interest and attendance. A few professed decision for Christ; but by far the greater interest was awakened among the Christians, many of the evangelist's messages being specially directed to them. This, it is believed, will cause increased heart searching, Bible study, and aggressive work. The greater fruit of the mission will be reaped in days to come.

The workers at Lord Street Mission, Stockport, are rejoicing in the results of a four days' mission conducted by Rev. A. Allan (of Manchester, and late of Johannesburg). The attendance and the effects of the Mission exceeded our hopes. Four Bible readings were given to Christians on the "Overcoming Life," and a Gospel service was held each night. Much earnest prayer prepared the ground. At the closing meeting many testified that they had definitely stepped out on some word or promise of God during the mission, and many gave the passage of Scripture that had been made to them the word of power. It was noticed that the text most frequently given was, "Sin shall not have dominion over you" (Rom. vi. 14). We praise God that the work of the Holy Spirit has been manifested among us. H. F.

Requests for Prayer.

For blessing on the open-air mission services at Chester Races.

That a clergyman may be restored to health and vigour, and preach the Gospel with increased fulness and simplicity.

For evangelistic services to be conducted at the Baptist Tabernacle, Porth, Glam., May 12-15, by Rev. A. T. Jones, of Newport, Mon.

That an Evangelical curate who preaches the simple Gospel, and seeks the winning of souls and building up of believers, may be found for an important seaside church where ritualistic influence is strong.

About Books.

In "The Ancient East" series of handbooks, No. IV. is: The Babylonian Conception of Heaven and Hell. It is from the pen of Alfred Jeremias, Ph.D., pastor of the Lutheran Church, and has been translated by Miss Jane Hutchison. Like its predecessors in the series, this book is a good example of multum in parvo work. (1s. David Nutt.)

No. 7 of "Strange Tales from Welsh Life" is entitled A Lump of Pudding; or, The Power of Kindness. The narrative, as related by Mr. Thomas M. Wintle, shows how a word of sympathy and a simple act of love can be used of God in awakening contrition in a repellant and stony heart. (1d. Morgan & Scott; Pontymoile: Bible Depot.)

The Life of R. W. Dale, of Birmingham, by his son, A. W. W. Dale, is a great book. It is gratifying to know that it has gone through several editions. We may thank God for a work so influential in the best sense. At length a new and cheaper edition has been issued, and in this form the book should enjoy a still larger circle of readers. (6s. Hodder & Stoughton.)

A book that will answer many of the questions that occasionally perplex Nonconformist ministers and church officers is The Free Churchman's Legal Handbook, including a summary of laws particularly relating to social questions. By E. C. Rawlings, solicitor of the Supreme Court. (2s. 6d. Thomas Law, Memorial Hall, E.C.) We have examined several of the most important chapters, and find them adequate in treatment and clear in language.

Between Life and Death: The Story of C.E.Z.M.S. Medical Missions in India, China, and Ceylon. By Irene H. Barnes. (3s. 6d. net. Marshall Bros.) A deeply interesting volume, from a sympathetic heart and a practised pen. The importance of medical missions is made clear, as also are some of the blessed results of the work. There are many illustrations, highly finished, and helpful to an understanding of the subject in its varied details.

Popery Portrayed in New Tracts for the Times. By Rev. W. Kennedy Moore, D.D. (Protestant Alliance, 430, Strand, W.C.) A little book that should have a large circulation. It contains a number of papers reprinted from the official organ of the Protestant Alliance. Here are eye-opening facts and timely warnings. Friends of Gospel truth and simplicity should put copies of this book in the way of the multitudes who are being led astray.

The writings of President Finney should be read by all earnest Christians. We cordially welcome Sermons on Gospel Themes, a volume in which twenty-four subjects, all of the highest importance, are treated in a striking manner. The discourses were delivered at Oberlin during the years 1845-61, and contain some of the President's most vigorous thoughts on fundamental truth and Christian experience. (3s. 6d. net. J. Robinson, 24, Bride Street, Manchester.)

A note of timely warning is sounded by Rev. Sidney Harris in his booklet, Pleasure Seeking: The Plague and Peril of the Church. The subject receives serious and thoughtful treatment, and Christians will do well to ponder the terms of the writer's protest and appeal. The Drink Traffic: A Covenant with Sin and Death, by the same author, presents in unmistakable language the magnitude of the nation's great curse, and the duty of the Church in relation thereto. (1d. each. Champness, Rochdale.)

Men of Might in India Missions, by Helen H. Holcomb, is a volume of very readable life-sketches, fully illustrated. Among the worthies are Ziegenbalg, Schwartz, Martyn, Rhenius, Duff, Kellogg, Carey, Marshman, and Ward. The less-known leaders include Gordon Hall, John Scudder, John Wilson, John Anderson, Robert T. Noble, and Isidor Löwenthal. This is a conscientious piece of work, calculated to excite interest in work for God in heathen lands. We trust it will have many readers. (6s. Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier.)

Writing to supply for girls what Dr. Harford-Battersby's "Do you Pray?" has done for boys, Miss Lucy A. Bennett has, without following the same plan, provided in Teach us to Pray (1s. Marshall Bros.) a most attractive and helpful guide-book to simple-hearted communion with God. No form of prayer is introduced, but in a series of short chapters the real nature of prayer is explained in such language as the simplest may understand. A scheme is suggested of more general topics for praise, confession, and supplication for the mornings and evenings of a week; and pages are provided for special requests presented with the answers received.

King Edward's Realm (Educational Supply Association, 42, Holborn Viaduct, E.C.), is a book which describes, in a plain and interesting manner, the growth and greatness of Britain's world-wide empire. It is intended to open the eyes of British boys and girls to the inheritance which is theirs, and to stir their hearts with feelings of admiration for the great men by whom that inheritance has been won. It is published at 1s. 6d.; but in connection with the Coronation celebration the publishers are offering it until June 30 next at the nominal price of 6d. net, on condition that the book is either given away or sold without a profit.

The official report of the Seventh National Council of the Evangelical Free Churches, held at Bradford in March, as now published in the Free Church Year Book (2s. 6d. net. National Council, Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street, E.C.), will sound all over the country the note of progress in the unification of the Free Churches, which rejoiced the hearts of the delegates. A full report of the proceedings is accompanied by Rev. Thomas Law's secretarial report, full lists of the district councils, with the names and addresses of their secretaries, and a store of useful information respecting the affiliated denominations. The book must be a simple necessity to very many ministers and church officials.

Guidance and counsel from those with ripe experience in the Christian life are ever welcome to younger believers and others whose pathway has been beset with difficulties. A compact booklet with a most timely message is The Three-Fold Secret of the Holy Spirit, by James H. McConkey, copies of which may be had on application to "Regions Beyond" Missionary Union, Publication Department, Harley House, Bow, E.—(1) The Secret of His Incoming—Union with Christ; (2) The Secret of His Fulness—Yielding to Christ; (3) The Secret of Constant Manifestation—Abiding in Christ. The style is simple and clear, so that he who runs may read. The pages throb with an intense spirituality; and we feel assured that many a distressed and puzzled mind will find here the finger-posts leading to rest and peace.

May's Handy Guide to May Meetings is also a descriptive guide to London, in compact and convenient form. There is an excellent map, also brief accounts of many religious and philanthropic societies. (1d. 21, St. Bride Street, E.C.)

In Drops of Comfort Mr. Wm. Crotch has issued a few poems, religious in character, of his own composition. Although exception may occasionally be taken to both rhyme and rhythm, it is evident that Mr. Crotch has been actuated by praiseworthy intentions. (2d. From the Author, Cumberland Street, Woodbridge, Suffolk.)
